This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

+ Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.

+ Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.

+ Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.

+ Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. N.B.—The Editor begs to express his regret that the two cases of Moll v. Holmes (12 C.T.R. 1050) and Ndube v. Holmes (13 C.T.R. 813) are both incorrectly stated to have been appeals from the Resident Magistrate of Nqamakwe.

The former case was heard in the Court below by the Acting Assistant R.M. and the latter by the Assistant R.M.

CASES DECIDED IN THE SUPREME COURT, CAPE COLONY.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN, and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

Provisional sentence granted and the property declared executable.

PRINCE, VINTCENT AND CO. V. BROWN.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted as prayed.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence for the sum of £1,800, less £200 paid on account, due on a broker's note, with interest.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed.

HURTON V. KENTNOR.

Mr. Russell moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of the Court for £24 17s. 2d., with interest and costs. The sum of £21 had been paid on account, and there was a sum of £15 11s., interest and costs, now outstanding.

Order granted as prayed.

ESTATE OF VAN DER LITT V. GUARDIAN OF THE MINOR CONRADIE AND OTHERS.

Mr. Gardiner moved for provisional sentence for £1,530 due on certain conditions of sale, with interest. It appeared that the father of the minor had entered into the contract of sale for the purchase of certain property on behalf of his son, at the time a minor, but now of age. The other defendants were one of the sureties and co-principal debtors, and the executors of the other surety and co-principal debtor.

After hearing counsel the Court said that plaintiff must go into the principal case, and in the meantime he should consider whether the son should not be made a party to the proceedings.

BOSMAN, POWIS AND CO. V. SHAWE.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for £67 5s., with interest, due on a cheque drawn by defendant in plaintiff's favour, but dishonoured.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that there was no certificate of presentation of the cheque at the bank.

Mr. Bisset said that under section 49 of Act 19 of 1893 no certificate of protest, as in the case of promissory notes, was required.

Buchanan, J.: All that the section says is that the drawer of a cheque shall not be absolved from liability because there is no protest, but surely when you sue on a cheque you must show that you presented it at the bank and that it was dishonoured?

Mr. Bissett: There is a statement in the summons that the cheque has been duly presented and dishonoured.

De Villiers, C.J.: Has it been presented, and to whom?

Mr. Bissett: To the bank.

De Villiers, C.J.: But where is the proof of that? Of course, I quite understand that a protest is not required as against the drawer of a cheque, but surely for the purpose of obtaining provisional sentence there must be a certificate that it has been presented and dishonoured. There must be something before the Court to show that.

Buchanan, J.: The practice has always been to have a protest, in a provisional case of this kind. Otherwise a person might sue on a cheque which had never been presented at the bank.

Provisional sentence was granted as prayed, subject to the production of a certificate of presentation, the Chief Justice pointing out that in the section referred to there was nothing to say that the Court had not to satisfy itself that the cheque had been presented.

BOSMAN, POWIS AND CO. V. LYNCH. 1903. Jan. 12th.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence for the interest due on a promissory note. The summons was for both the principal and interest, but the principal had been paid that morning.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed.

MUNDER AND ANOTHER V. HAMPSON AND CO.

Mr. Burton moved for provisional sentence upon certain bills of exchange for £103 15s. 11d.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed.

BENDLE V. BENDLE.

Mr. Russell moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of the Court. It appeared that in an action brought against defendant by his wife he was ordered to pay her £5 per month for maintenance, and he had failed to pay for three months.

The case was ordered to stand over.

LYNCH V. HANSLO.

Mr. Greer asked that this matter be allowed to stand over until February 1.

Postponement allowed.

THORNTON V. WATKINS.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence for £16 16s. 4d.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed.

BUCHANAN V. DUGGAN.

Mr. Buchanan moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied provisional judgment of the Court, which had been granted on a judgment of the Supreme Court of Natal. The total amount outstanding was, with costs, £78 8s. 4d.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that the summons had been made for December 12 last, and there was nothing to show that the defendant had consented to the postponement, although it was stated that that was the case.

The matter was allowed to stand over for a day, so that if possible an affidavit might be made, showing that defendant had consented to the postponement.

VERSFELD V. ISAACS.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence for £50, due on a mortgage bond, with interest. The bond had become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. It was also asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Provisional sentence granted as prayed, and the property declared executable.

NOCHAMSON V. GLASSON.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved for provisional sentence for £212 10s., less £30 paid on account, due on a promissory note. The note had been made in favour of one Udwin, and plaintiff was now the legal holder.

Mr. B. Upington appeared for the defendant, who it appeared was seventy-six years of age, and lived on a farm forty-nine miles from Mossel Bay. In an affidavit he denied that he ever signed the promissory note, and said that he knew nothing about it.

Mr. Searle asked that the Court would as usual fix a day for the proof of signature.

It was pointed out that defendant's age would probably prevent him coming all the way to Cape Town, and it was suggested that the matter should be heard before the Circuit Court at Mossel Bay in March. The plaintiff resides at Oudtshoorn.

The Court ordered the removal of the case to the Mossel Bay Circuit Court, and ordered that the costs of this application should be costs in the cause.

ISAACS V. MARKS. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

Mr. Close applied for provisional sentence for £21 for rent for three months due on a certain lease. Counsel put in the on a certain lease. Counsel put in the lease, which, however, was not stamped on execution. The document now bore stamps. In reference to this, counsel referred to Section 12 of Act 3 of 1864.

De Villiers, C.J., said the document should have been stamped on execution. Plaintiff could proceed on payment of a fine of £3 by reason of the document not having been stamped.

Defendant denied that he owed the money. He produced a receipt for rent paid in advance up to the 31st February, 1903. The receipt was signed by Messrs. Litten Bros. and Simmonds, who were, defendant said, the plaintiff's agents. He took the house from them.

Mr. Close said plaintiff knew nothing about this receipt. The firm named were not the plaintiff's agents.

The case was ordered to stand over until February 1, defendant to file an affidavit in the meantime.

S.A. MILLING CO. AND OTHERS V. GRAND JUNCTION RAILWAYS.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

WATSON v. WATSON.

Mr. Buchanan moved to make absolute a rule calling upon Mrs. Watson to show cause why a decree of divorce should not be granted, she having failed to return to her husband as ordered.—Granted.

Ex parte RHODES.

This was an application by one Peter Rhodes, of Kokstad, to have a certain rule nisi, granted by Mr. Justice Buchanan in Chambers on January 1st, 1903, under the Derelict Lands Act made absolute. The applicant had purchased a certain piece of land situate in the town of Kokstad on January 2nd, 1884. He paid transfer duty, and had duly paid quit-rent and such municipal taxes as from time to time became due and payable on the said land. He had endeavoured to ascertain the whereabouts of the original grantee of the land, in order that he might be able to obtain transfer, but had not succeeded in doing so. He now asked that the provisional order granted by Mr. Justice Buchanan on January 1st be made absolute, and an order be granted authorising the registration of the title of the said land in his name.

On the motion of Mr. Buchanan, the Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte SAILEY. { 1903. { Jan. 12th.

This was an application under the Derelict Lands Act by one Peter Sailey, of Port Elizabeth. The petition stated that on July 11th, 1853, the petitioner had received transfer of a certain lot of ground, situate at Port Elizabeth. That in February, 1885, petitioner, accompanied by one Bartholomew Sailey, visited the property and found it in a most unsatisfactory condition, whereupon B. Sailey told petitioner that he (petitioner) would not incur any expense in repairs, but that if petitioner cared to have the property, he might take it. Petitioner accepted the gift, and proceeded to occupy the property and effect improvements thereon. That petitioner has since paid all rates and taxes thereon, but has never obtained transfer. Bartholomew Sailey having been killed, his brother Patrick was appointed executor in the estate. He has since died, and the estate being now unrepresented, petitioner is unable to obtain transfer of the property.

He, therefore, prays for an order directing the Registrar of Deeds to enregister the said property in petitioner's name.

A rule nisi granted by De Villiers, C.J., in Chambers, on December 12, 1902, was made absolute on the motion of Mr. Bisset.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Tredgold, McIntyre and Bisset.]

Ex parte BUDGE. { 1903. { Jan. 12th.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi, granted in Chambers by Maasdorp, J., under the Derelict Lands Act on December 12, 1902.

The petition of Emma Budge, widow of the late George Ryall Budge, and of George H. Runciman, in their capacity as the executors of the late George R. Budge, shewed:

That in 1864 the said George R. Budge purchased from one Emma Tucker certain property situate in Simon's Town. The vendor is still alive. On June 11, 1864, the said vendor passed a deed of transfer by which it was intended to convey to the purchaser the property so purchased by him; but by which, in fact, she conveyed only the remaining extent of certain land, granted to one William Warren on April 8, 1819, the greater part of which forms the garden of the property aforesaid. This land still stands registered in the name of William Warren, and has never been transferred, though the said John Tucker and his executrix have held and possessed the same as of right up to the date of the sale to the said George R. Budge. The petitioners, since the death of George R. Budge, have held this land as of right, and this right has never been disputed. Petitioners, therefore, pray that the Registrar of Deeds may be authorised to pass transfer to them in their capacity as executors of George R. Budge of the remaining extent of the land granted to Wm. Warren on April 5, 1819.

On the motion of Mr. Russell, the rule was made absolute.

Ex parte BORCHERDS. { 1903. { Jan. 12th.

This was an application to have a rule nisi, granted on the 16th of December, 1902, by Maasdorp, J., in Chambers made absolute.

The petition of James William Borcherds, of George Town, stated inter alia:—

Petitioner is the executor dative of the estate of the late Jemima A. Raubenheimer. A certain piece of ground, being the remaining extent of Erf No.

7, situate in Courtney-street, George Town, belongs to the said estate in virtue of a bequest to the deceased by the late William C. Guest and Jemima Guest. In transferring the properties bequeathed to the deceased, the executor of the estate of the late William C. Guest omitted to transfer the remaining extent aforesaid to the above deceased Jemima A. Raubenheimer, the said William C. Guest never having himself received transfer. The petitioner believes that the said W. C. Guest bought this property from one Caroline Schols, together with other erven, of which other erven he received transfer on January 21, 1871. The land in question has been claimed and occupied by W. C. Guest since 1871. On his death, Jemima Guest entered into possession of the said property, and subsequent to her decease it was in the free and undisturbed possession of one Jemima A Raubenheimer until her decease on January 4, 1901 after which date the said property has come into the possession of the petitioner in his aforesaid capacity.

Petitioner therefore prays that the Court may be pleased to authorise the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer to petitioner in his aforesaid capacity of the said remaining extent of Erf No. 7 under the Derelict Lands Act of 1381.

On the motion of Mr. Bisset, the rule was made absolute.

Ex parte LABUSCHAGNE. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

This was an application to make absolute a rule granted by Maasdorp, J., in Chambers, on November 27, 1902, under the Derelict Lands Act.

The petition of Catherine E. Labuschagne, of Embokotwa, Elliot, stated inter alia: Petitioner is the executrix testamentary of the estate of her late husband, Johannes J. Labuschagne. On October 11, 1886, a certain erf of the Embokotwa "European Communal Allotments," situate in the Xalanga district of Emigrant Tembuland, was granted to one Petrus Jacobus Ludovikus van Biljoen. On April 20, 1887, one Martinus A. Oelofse purchased the aforesaid property from P. J. L. van Biljoen, but the attorney who framed the declaration of seller and power of attorney incorrectly described the said P. J. L. van Biljoen as Piet Jacobus van Biljoen. The said attorney is now deceased, and after the sale of the said property was effected, the said P. J. L. van Biljoen left this colony, and his present whereabouts cannot now be ascertained, nor is it known whether he is still living or not. On March 17, 1897, the aforesaid Martinus A. Oelofse sold the said property to petitioner's late husband, J. J. Labuschagne, who paid the purchase price to the vendor. The said vendor signed and completed the power of attorney to pass transfer, and petitioner has paid transfer dues in respect thereof. However, M. A. Oelofse omitted to take transfer, and left the Colony, after he had sold the said property, and his present whereabouts cannot now be ascertained. Petitioner's late husband enjoyed quiet and undisturbed possession of the said property, and paid the Government quitrent dues thereon from the date of purchase by him till the time of his death, and since then petitioner, as executrix in his estate, has paid the said quitrent. The petitioner, in her aforesaid capacity, has now sold the property afore-mentioned, and is desirous of passing transfer thereof. Wherefore she prays for an order for the registration of the title to the said landed property, in the name of her late husband, Johannes Jacob Labuschagne.

On the motion of Mr. Close, the rule was made absolute.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Walker and Jacobsohn.]

ATMORE v. LOUW. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

This was an application to have a certain rule nisi granted by Buchanan, J., in Chambers, on December 19, 1902, whereby the respondent was restrained from alienating by sale, lease, concession, or otherwise, the farm Stikland, or any portion thereof—made absolute.

The Court granted the order, on the motion of Mr. Benjamin, on condition that plaintiff should proceed to trial during February 1903 term, with leave to the defendant to reap the crops on the land, subject to his keeping an account thereof.

Applicant's Attorneys: W. E. Moore and Son.

Ex parte NEL. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

Will—Mutual vesting—Sale of fidei commissary property to an executor.

This was an application for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer of certain property.

The petition of Agatha Gertruida Philip Rudolph Nel (born Fourie) was as follows:

1. The petitioner was married in community of property to the late Pieter Andries Nel, who died on the 15th April, 1896, leaving eight children, issue of the said marriage.

2. Under the will of petitioner's grandparents, Philip Rudolph Botha and Agatha Gertruida Botha (born Gozen), petitioner inherited certain land, which was transferred to her on November 2, 1898, subject to a life usufruct in favour of petitioner's mother, Catherina Maria Fourie, in terms of an order of Court dated September 13, 1898.

3. The petitioner's mother died on December 31, 1900, and the petitioner is now desirous of transfering the said land to her son, Petrus Johannes Nel, and for this purpose the customary deed has been lodged with the Registrar of Deeds.

4. The petitioner and her late husband on July 14, 1886, made a will dealing with their joint estate, which came into operation on April 15, 1896, when the petitioner's late husband died, and petitioner adiated and accepted benefits under the will, a copy of which is hereunto annexed.

5. The petitioner begs to refer the Court to the petition lodged in connection with the Order granted by the Court on September 13, 1898 (5, Sheil, 472), for particulars regarding the conditions upon which the said land was bequeathed to her.

6. The Registrar of Deeds has raised the question whether the land transferred to petitioner on November 2, 1898, falls within the joint estate of petitioner, and her late husband, and is subject to the terms of the joint will of petitioner and her late husband, and he requires an order of Court before he will pass the transfer.

7 The petitioner contends that the land was vested in her after the death of her late husband, and that it does not form part of the joint estate, and consequently that she is free to deal therewith as she shall think proper. Wherefore the petitioner prays for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer of the said property at present registered in petitioner's name, by virtue of the Deed of Transfer of November 2, 1898.

The clause in the joint will of P. A. Nel and A. G. P. R. Nel (his wife), on which the present application turned, was as follows:

"4th. We leave and bequeath to our children born in our marriage, or who may still be born, and on the predecease of one or more of them, then to his or her lawful descendants by representation, all our immoveable property or properties, which at our death shall belong to our joint estate, including not only such immoveable property as shall be in our possession at our death, but also such as shall then be in expectancy, on this condition, however, that the said legatee, shall not be entitled to demand transfer of the said immoveable property or properties, or to take possession during the lifetime of the survivor, but only after his or her death; it being our express will and desire that the survivor during his or her lifetime shall remain in full and undisturbed possession of all our immoveable property or properties, and shall enjoy the usufruct thereof, in order to enable them the better to maintain and educate the minor heirs till their majority.

The report of the Registrar of Deeds was as follows: "The property which forms the subject of this application was acquired by the petitioner as one of the fidei-commissary heirs under the will of her grandparents subject to the conditions of the said will, and to the further condition that should she pre-decease the fiduciary, her mother, her share should devolve upon her issue. The transfers executed on November 2, 1898, to the fidei-commissary heirs were made subject to the latter condition in accordance with an order of Court; for although the fiduciary had renounced all her interest in the property, it would, in the event of any child pre-deceasing her vest in terms of the will, in his or her children. The deed was further made subject to conditions of the will of the fiduciary and her husband, but, as these only affect such of the property as was directly acquired from them, they may be left out of consideration. On July 14, 1886, the petitioner executed a joint will with her husband, P. A. Nel, to whom she was married in community of property, and thereby they bequeathed to their children all their immovable property, which at their death should belong to the joint estate, including not only such immoveable property as should then be in their possession, but also such as should then be in expectancy, subject to a usufruct in favour of the survivor and to the condition that transfer could not be demanded until after the death of the longest living. Nel died on April 15, 1896, and the petitioner adiated and accepted benefits under the joint will; but, notwithstanding this fact, she sold the fidei-commissary property to one of her sons on February 11, 1899, and proposes to pass transfer thereof to him; and she bases her right to do so on the fact that, as the fiduciary, her mother died after her husband on December 31, 1901, the property only vested absolutely in her on that date, and she is, therefore, at liberty to dispose of it without having regard to the provisions of the will of herself and husband. The question, therefore, arises whether she is not bound by its terms, and I have deemed it advisable to require that the point should be submitted to the Court for decision."

The Master's report stated inter alia that, as Catharina M. Fourie (born Botha) had survived the testators, it would seem that the property had vested in her absolutely. That, if this were so, it would appear that the joint will of Catharina M. Botha and her late husband, Petrus J. Fourie, governs the disposition of the property. That it would appear that on the death of P. J. Fourie (petitioner's father) the property vested in the petitioner. Strydom v. Strydom's Trustee (11 S.C.R., 425).

[Mr. Benjamin (for the petitioner): The whole question is whether this was a fidei-commissary bequest or not. If it was not it went into the joint estate. If it was, as Mrs. Nel survived her husband, it was no part of the joint estate. The case came before the Court in 1898, when your Lordships regarded Mrs. Nel's interest as fidei-commissary dependent upon Mr. Nel surviving her mother. (5 Sheil, 472).]

[De Villiers, C.J.: That decision only shows that the Court regarded the interest as usufructuary.]

Yes, Mrs. Fourie's interest was a fiduciary interest.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the Master's report?]

[Mr. Benjamin read the passages of the report cited above.

[Maasdorp, J.: I don't quite follow your case.]

Mrs. Nel has sold the property to one of the children.

[Maasdorp, J.: That is not under the will?]

No, if the property falls into the joint estate, it must go to all the eight chil- Fourie died, leaving Mrs. Nel survivwas fidei-commissary. When Mrs. Fourie died, leaving Mrs. Nell surviving her, the property vested in Mrs. Nel.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I do not see how there can be any question of fidei-commissum; the substitution, according to the Master, is direct and not fidei-commissary. I gather from the report that Mrs. Botha was a usufructuary and not a fidei-commissary.]

The point I want to put is that Mrs. Fourie was a usufructuary, and that on her death her interest was to go to her children.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But what right had she to dispose of the property?]

We say that now it has vested in her absolutely as a grandchild of the original testators. Had she not survived her mother (Mrs. Fourie) it would have gone to the children, but now it has become absolute in her.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Under which will do you claim?]

Under Botha's will. Mrs. Nel is the posterity therein referred to. She survived her mother (Mrs. Fourie), and hence the property could not have vested in the joint estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Mrs. Fourie took an unburdened property, and then left a will; is not that the will to which we should look?]

I rely on the words "in case our daughter should die after the death of the testators."

[De Villiers, C.J.: The will speaks only of a direct substitution; there is no fidei-commissum. What does Fourie say in his will?]

He ratifies the bequest in the will of the original testators. Mrs. Nel took no interest until the death of her mother, she surviving.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you admit that if Fourie's will refers to this property you have no right to succeed?]

Yes; but Fourie's will could not modify Botha's Will.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Your only course is to bring an action, so that we may have all the points before us.]

Ex parte WALSTON. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi, granted by the Court on December 19, 1902, authorising the cancellation of a certain mortgage bond on a piece of ground situate at Caledon. By a mutual will the petitioner, Elizabeth Walston, and her late husband had bequeathed the said land to their two daughters. The petitioner was appointed by the said will executrix testamentary to her late husband. The said beneficiaries are now desirous of taking transfer of the said land, and petitioner is ready and willing to pass such transfer, but finds that in the books of the Debt Registry a certain mortgage bond, dated April 19, 1852, is still registered. This bond is in favour of one Johannes J. Tesselaar. Petitioner was informed by her late husband that the only burden on this property was a bond in favour of one Bourhill, which her said late husband paid off shortly before his decease, and she believes this latter bond to be identical with the one registered in the Debt Registry. To the best of petitioner's belief, her late husband never paid interest to the said Tesselaar, of whom she never before heard. She, therefore, asked for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to cancel the aforesaid bond.

On the motion of Mr. Benjamin, the Court made the previous rule nisi absolute, and granted an order as prayed.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Van Zyl and Buissinné.]

Ex parte DE WET.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the appointment of a curator to Pieter C. de Wet, who was deaf and dumb and incapable of managing his affairs.

An order was granted as prayed, and the parties mentioned in the petition appointed curators.

MAGGS V. THE TATI CONCESSIONS.

Mr. Close moved for the dismissal of the appeal which had been noted in the above case, the plaintiff having failed to proceed with his appeal within the prescribed time, and not having given security for costs.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte POWRIE AND ANOTHER. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

This was an application for an order authorising the petitioner to sell a certain farm.

The petition of Frank W. Powrie, Amy Powrie (born Carlisle), to whom he is married in community of property, and the said F. W. Powrie in his capacity as father and natural guardian of the marriage, shewed:—

That the petitioners executed an ante-nuptial contract on May 26, 1891, by which contract F. W. Powrie agreed to transfer a certain farm, situate in the division of Barkly East, called Elfin Glen, to Edward V. W. Cotterell, as trustee for his wife (should she survive him and not contract a second marriage) and the issue of their marriage. The farm had never been actually transferred to the trustee, and the said F. W. Powrie had been offered £2,800 for it, and desired to sell it and to hand over the proceeds to the trustee to be invested on first mortgage for the benefit of the beneficiaries under the ante-nuptial contract. The intending purchaser wished to pass a kusting brief for £1,500, leaving a balance of £1,300 for investment. The farm was let for £72 per annum, and the lessee was willing to cancel his lease. Wherefore the petitioner prayed for leave to sell the said farm on the above-mentioned terms.

On the motion of Dr. Greer, the Court granted an order as prayed.

[Applicants' Attorneys: Scanlen and Syfret.]

TOUISSANT V. TOUISSANT.

Mr. Gardiner moved that the rule nisi granted in the above matter by the Court on December 19, 1902, be made absolute, giving the plaintiff leave to sue her husband in forma pauperis.

Rule made absolute, Mr. Gardiner being appointed counsel and Mr. Scholtz attorney for the petitioner.

VENTER v. VENTER.

Mr. Burton moved for a commission to take the evidence of the plaintiff in this case, as well as that of another witness, at Philip's Town. In the principal case the plaintiff is suing his wife for divorce on the ground of her adultery. In her plea the defendant had admitted all the allegations made. The plaintiff is 82 years of age, and the defendant 40 years of age.

Mr. Russell appeared for the defence to consent to the application.

An order was granted as prayed, and the Magistrate at Philip's Town was appointed Commissioner.

Ex parte PROCTOR.

Mr. Gardiner moved for an amendment of a deed of transfer, in which the petitioner's name had been wrongly given.

Order granted as prayed.

COETZER v. COETZER. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for the applicant in this matter, and asked for a suspension of a writ of arrest. The applicant had been in gaol for over a month, and he had no means to pay the debt in connection with which the writ of arrest had been granted. The debt was for maintenance of his wife, from whom he had been judicially separated.

Mr. De Waal appeared for the respondent, and asked for a postponement of the case until February 1, as he had not yet had time to reply to the petitioner's affidavit.

Mr. Searle objected to the postponement until February 1.

The Court directed that the matter be mentioned again on Tuesday or Wednesday, if the replying affidavits could then be put in, otherwise the case would have to stand over until February 1.

LANDESHUT v. KOENIG.

Mr. Upington appeared for the applicant to move that the award of arbitration be made a rule of Court.

Mr. Searle, K.C., with him Mr. Alexander, appeared for respondent.

The matter was, by consent, ordered to stand over until February 1.

Ex parte GREEN. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

This was an application for an order authorising the sale of certain property.

The petition of George Thomas Green, formerly of Oudtshoorn, but at present of Ladybrand, shewed that he was the father and natural guardian of Edward Green and Laura Green, both minors, aged 19 and 16 years respectively. The former of these minors was practically emancipated, living away from his parents and earning his own livelihood, and the latter, though still living with her mother, was earning her own livelihood. On April 27, 1895, transfer of a certain piece of property was passed to petitioner in his capacity of the father and natural guardian of, and in trust for his said minor son, E. Green, and there was also passed on July 28, 1896, a similar transfer of another piece of property to and in favour of L. Green. Shortly before the late war broke out, petitioner migrated to the Orange Free State, and he now wished to have his family there with him to reside. The aforesaid properties were not of much beneficial use to his aforesaid children, and it would be to their advantage to dispose of the same. Petitioner undertook to invest the proceeds thereof at more remunerative returns.

Petitioner, therefore, prayed for an order sanctioning the sale of the aforesaid two properties by public auction and authorising the passing of transfers to the purchaser, or purchasers.

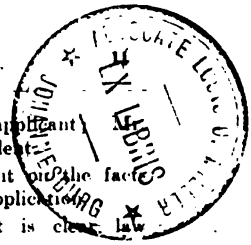
The Master in his report did not object to the sale of these properties by public auction, or in such manner as might be most to the advantage of the minors, but recommended that the proceeds of the sale be paid into the Guardians' Fund until the minors attain their majority.

On the motion of Mr. P. S. Jones, the Court granted an order as prayed.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Tredgold, McIntyre and Bisset.]

TELFER v. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. Buchanan moved for leave to sign judgment against plaintiff for not proceeding with his action within the time allowed by rule of Court.—Granted



TOWN COUNCIL OF CAPE TOWN v. CAPE GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS. { 1903. Jan. 12th.

Arbitration — Award — Enlargement of time fixed for award —Waiver—Remuneration.

A deed of submission provided that the award should be given within a period of three months, but owing to the evidence taking up more time than was anticipated, it was agreed by the parties verbally and in the presence of the arbitrators to extend the time without however fixing any period. After that several months passed without any award being given and one of the arbitrators had to go to Europe for four months for the benefit of his health. On his return one of the parties to the submission applied for an order directing fresh proceedings and appointment of arbitrators.

Held, that the applicant had waived his right to take advantage of the fact that the award had not been given within the time agreed upon and the application was accordingly refused.

This was an application upon notice calling upon the Government to show cause why they should not be required to submit to a deed of submission for the purpose for assessing the compensation to be paid to the Town Council in respect of the expropriation of certain property in Rutger and Stuckeris-streets. The Town Council made the application on the ground of a delay in the award of the arbitrators beyond the time allowed by law, but it was alleged by the Government that the Council had agreed to an extension of time in which the award was to be given, and that the arbitrators were now prepared to hear argument, and give their award. A number of affidavits and a quantity of correspondence were read.

Mr. Gardiner for applicant. Mr. Searle, K.C., for respondent.

After hearing argument on the facts the Court refused the application.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is clear law that a person may renounce or waive any right given to him by law. In the present case, there was a deed of submission providing that the award shall be given within a period of three months, and unless that period had been enlarged, either by the arbitrators in the manner required by law, or by the parties themselves, the arbitrators were bound to give their award within the three months, and the applicants would not have been bound to accept any award made afterwards. But it is common cause that the time was enlarged, and the only question is whether the applicants consented to an indefinite enlargement. Well, upon this point we have the affidavit made by Mr. Fairbridge, in which he says that in the month of January, 1902, the arbitrators sat and heard evidence, and that as a considerable time had already elapsed it was agreed by the parties verbally, in the presence of the arbitrators to extend the time in which the award was to be given, no further period, however, being fixed. Well, if this is correct it is clear that the applicants have waived the right to take advantage of the fact that the award was not given within the time fixed by the deed of submission, or within the time fixed by the Act of 1898. They have consented verbally to an extension without fixing a time, and I think under these circumstances they are not entitled to come in and ask that everything done by the arbitrators shall be set aside and new proceedings initiated. I really do not see anything to gain by making the order which must be refused with costs.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ADMISSION. { 1903. Jan. 13th.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the admission as a translator of Philip Albertus Myburgh Cloete.

Granted.

PROVISIONAL CASES.

BENDLE V. BENDLE.

Mr. Russell applied for an order for civil imprisonment against one Henry J. Bendle, who, under a separation order, had been ordered to pay his wife £5 per month for her support and that of her children.

Defendant appeared, and said he refused to contribute to the support of his wife because she was living with another man.

The case was ordered to stand over until February 2, defendant to file an affidavit setting forth his allegations in the meantime.

Postea (February 2).

Respondent alleged that he had never received the summons.

De Villiers, C.J.: But have you made an affidavit as directed?

Defendant: I made one, and I got an answer from Mr. Gately, Acting Registrar, that the Chief Justice could not see his way clear to re-open the case.

Mr. Gately: That is not so. He alleges he never received anything beyond the summons. He entered appearance personally, and all process was served at the address he gave. I received no notification of a change of address.

In reply to the Court, defendant said that he earned 10s. a day as a carpenter at Robben Island, and out of that he had not saved anything. He did not see why he should pay his wife £5 per month, as she was living with a man named Shelby. He could not say whether she lived with that man as his wife or housekeeper. He would not give her one farthing as long as she was with another man under one roof. He alleged that she occupied the same bedroom as Shelby. He had not had time to make an affidavit, although when the matter was last before the Court, the presiding Judge had advised him to do so.

Defendant was sworn, and then repeated that he had saved no money to meet the judgment.

Mrs. Bendle was present in court, and on being interrogated by the Chief Justice, denied that she lived with Shelby as his wife. She merely kept Shelby's house, and in return received 15s. per month, and a home was also provided for her children. Her husband had paid her nothing for four years, although he had always appeared "flush of money." She did not wish to see him in prison, as she could not afford 1s. per day to keep him there, and she would accept £3 per month if the defendant could not pay more.

The Court granted a decree of civil imprisonment, but suspended execution, pending payment of £2 10s. per month.

BUCHANAN V. DUGGAN.

This was an application for a decree of civil imprisonment.

Mr. Buchanan appeared for the applicant.

Defendant appeared in person and said he was prepared to pay £10 a month.

A decree was granted, suspended on payment of £10 a month, the first payment to be made on or before February 15.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte FOUCHE AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Howel Jones moved for leave to pass transfer of certain property within the district of Robertson to C. Fouche, who was an executor in the estate, and had purchased the said property. All the heirs were majors and had consented to the transfer.

The application was granted, subject to the production of the Master's certificate as to the consent of the heirs.

COETZEE AND OTHERS V. GAVIN.

This was an application for an interdict ordering the respondent to remove an obstruction in a certain water-course, to repair damages done thereto, and to abstain from further interference therewith.

The petition of the applicant stated that the parties were owners of adjoining farms in the Oudtshoorn district. Between the properties were a dam and a water-course, to the use of which applicants alleged they had enjoyed a right since 1863. In October last part of the course was washed away, and seeing the impractibility of the immediate reconstruction of the same in the same place as before, the applicants approached Gavin in the matter. Respondent protested against any re-construction except on certain conditions. Petitioners caused the course to be re-constructed with a slight deviation from the original course, but Gavin subsequently obstructed the free flow of the water by effecting a breach, thereby causing the water to run to waste. Gavin had refused to submit to arbitration. Petitioners contended that no damage had accrued or was likely to accrue to defendant's property by reason of the deviation; if it could be shown that Gavin suffered any damage they were prepared to pay compensation. The applicants' farm was absolutely dependent for its existence upon the water running in the water-course in question. They prayed for an order calling upon the respondent to remove the obstruction and to repair the breach and restraining him from interfering with the free and unobstructed flow of the water. The petition had been submitted in Chambers in November to his lordship the Chief Justice, who made no order. His lordship then stated that the evidence before him was not sufficient to justify the granting of the order prayed for, but that the application might be renewed in Court, in which case it should be clearly proved that it was quite impossible to reconstruct the course and dam as they existed before the wash-away.

In affidavits filed on behalf of the respondent it was stated that the reconstruction of the dam and course in the manner effected by applicants caused damage to respondent's property and was a source of serious danger. Respondent alleged that extensive encroachments had been made on his property and that had the applicants adopted the suggestions and friendly advice given by him (respondent) the breakage would not have occurred. He had offered to consent to the re-construction of the course in a certain manner which was necessary in order that his property should be protected. This method of construction would be advantageous to the applicant. Respondent prayed for an interdict restraining the applicants and all others from trespassing on his property and from using the water-course in an unauthorised and illegal manner. It was stated on affidavit that it was not possible to restore the course and dam as they originally existed. It was contended by the respondent that applicants had no servitude in regard to the water-course. In 1863 a small furrow was made, the two farms being then owned by the same proprietors, but it was stated that the course and dam now in question were established in 1885.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers) for the applicants; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Searle, K.C.), for the respondent.

After counsel had been heard in argument on the facts of the case, the Court granted an interdict restraining the respondent from preventing the applicants from reconstructing the furrow as it existed prior to October, 1902, and from interfering with the flow of water therein.

Buchanan, J.: The applicants in this case are co-proprietors of the farm Nooitgedacht, and the respondent is the proprietor of the farm Welgedacht, situated immediately above Nooitgedacht, on the Oliphant's River, in the district of Oudtshoorn. From 1863, at least, by arrangement between the co-proprietors of these two farms the water for the lower farm Nooitgedacht, had been taken out of the Oliphant's River by means of a dam and furrow situated on the upper farm, and led down to Nooitgedacht. This furrow and dam, as is not unusual in the district, were liable to be washed away or destroyed by the floods occurring in the river. In 1885 it appears that the old furrow which had existed from 1863 was washed away or destroyed, and by permission of the owner of the upper farm, instead of reconstructing the old furrow as it had existed up to that time, the proprietors of the lower farm were allowed to go a thousand yards higher up the stream and construct a new dam and a new furrow, led over what is now the respondent's property to the applicant's property. This new furrow lasted until 1891, when another flood again interfered with it, and washed part of it away, and in that year, after communications between the parties, the respondent allowed a further deviation to take place on payment to him of an amount of compensation which though small, was amicably arranged between the parties. In October last another flood occurred, and the result of this flood was to wash away the existing furrow to the extent of about fifteen yards causing a breach in the furrow to that extent. At the end of that month negotiations took place between the applicants and the respondent for making a further deviation. The respondent, as owner of the upper farm, suggested and pointed out a further deviation which he was willing to give on payment of an amount of compensation and on certain terms which he specified. The applicants refused to take this deviation on the terms stated, but they themselves went on the respondent's farm, and violently, and without the consent of the upper proprietor, constructed a new furrow of the length of 51 yards, by means of which they avoided this wash-away of 15 yards. The respondent objecting to what had been done, broke away portion of the original furrow of 1885, some 260 yards above where this new furrow was made. The applicants again went on the farm, repaired the furrow, and caused the water to flow by means of the new furrow which they had constructed down to their farm. After that date respondent closed the loop furrow which had been constructed, but it does not appear that after that date he interfered at all with the old furrow of 1885. The applicants now come into Court and pray for an interdict calling upon the respondent to remove the obstruction which he has placed in what is called the loop, and also for an interdict restraining him from interfering with the free flow of the water down this furrow to the applicants' farm. In answering affidavits filed the respondent in the first place raises the question whether any servitude existed over the upper farm to allow any furrow whatever to be constructed on the property. However, from the affidavits before us we are of opinion that a sufficient prima facie case has been made out to show that the lower proprietors are entitled to a flow of water from and over the upper farm down to the lower farm. It may be that when the facts are gone into by action, the respondent may be able to show that what was in existence at the time of the grievance complained of was only a matter of leave and licence, and not a matter of right, but on the affidavits as they stand, there seems to be sufficient ground for holding that there was a right in the lower proprietors to lead their water from the upper farm. An ex parte application was made to a judge in Chambers for an interdict such as is now applied for, and his lordship then pointed out that the evidence before him was not sufficient to justify the order applied for, and he also said that there was no proof before him sufficient to show that it was impossible to construct a watercourse as it existed before the flood of October, 1902. The evidence brought before the Court now on affidavit leaves a great many questions of fact open, but on the affidavits as they stand, we cannot say that the old furrow which existed in 1885 cannot be restored to its original condition. The objections to its being so restored seem to be questions of expediency and economy, and not of necessity, and these are not sufficient grounds for saying that the applicants are entitled without the consent of the upper proprietors to go and make any deviation they think fit. They have done so; they have taken the law into their own hands, and made this deviation, and now they come into Court and say: "We have made this deviation; it is necessary and expedient; and if you have suffered any damage thereby, we will pay you for any damage which the Court or arbitrators may assess." But there is no law which justifies any private individual encroaching on the property of another and then saying, "I have taken what I wanted and I will pay you for any damages you may have sustained." Therefore, as the affidavits stand in this case, it appears to us that the applicants had no right whatever to make this loop furrow against the wishes of the respondent or without his consent. That part of the application therefore cannot be allowed. But the respondent sets up the question distinctly in his affidavit, and to some extent in the argument, that the applicants have no right whatever over the farm, and an interdict to a limited extent ought to be granted, and this will be that the respondent will be interdicted from preventing the applicants from re-constructing the furrow as it existed prior to the flood of October 24, 1902, and from interfering with the flow of water therein; that is, the applicants can come upon this farm, reconstruct this 15 yards and take their water down as before. Leave will be reserved both to applicants and respondent to bring any such action as they may be advised. The only question which remains is the question of costs. Now, if the respondent had not in any way interfered with this furrow we should have refused the application altogether, but as he sets up the right to do as he has done in reference to the old furrow, and as the evidence before us shows no such right, we will not give him his costs. Then comes the question as to whether we can give the applicants their costs. There are several reasons against this, one is that the applicants acted ri et armis. Then the applicants came into Court not so much on account of the injury done to the old furrow as to obtain the right of using this new furrow. The Court cannot, on the facts before it, uphold any right to use the deviation. As the true condition of things may be elucidated in an action to be brought by either party, it will be open to either party in any action which may be instituted to recover the costs of this application, but whatever the result of such action may be we think it right to exclude the costs of the affidavits of the applicants. We have repeatedly pointed out that affidavits from Oudtshoorn are abusive, irrelevant, argumentative, lengthy, and unnecessary, and to check this practice the costs of these affidavits will not be allowed under any circumstances. The order will be: "That the respondent be interdicted from preventing the applicants from reconstructing the furrow as it existed prior to the flood of October 24, 1902, and from interfering with the flow of water therein, with leave reserved to either applicant or the respondent to bring such action as they may be advised and in such action to recover the costs of this application, excepting the costs of the affidavits filed by the applicants."

BUAS V. EDWARD SEARLE AND CO.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., who with Mr. Schreiner, K.C., appeared for the plaintiffs in this matter, and applied for a commission de bene esse to examine certain witnesses for the plaintiff at Antwerp, Belgium.

Mr. Searle, K.C., who with Mr. Benjamin, appeared for the defendants, and said that they did not oppose the application.

The application was granted and the British Consul at Antwerp appointed commissioner.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

REX V. LAUBSCHER. 1901. Jan. 11th.

Mr. Burton applied for the release of Jacobus Johannes Laubscher upon bail. The applicant had been arrested as a prisoner of war, and taken to Ceylon. He had recently returned, and had been arrested for treason, and was now detained in gaol at Malmesbury.

Mr. Nightingale appeared on behalf of the Attorney General to consent to the application upon condition that the petitioner furnished personal bail in the sum of £500, and two sureties of £250 each; further, that as he had not yet been committed for trial, he must when required appear before the Resident Magistrate of Malmesbury for preparatory examination, and that if committed for trial he should accept service at Malmesbury. The last act of treason alleged occurred in November, 1901, so that applicant did not come under the jurisdiction of the Treason Court.

Bail was granted in terms of the consent of the Attorney-General; bail to be to the satisfaction of the Resident Magistrate of Malmesbury.

Ex parte HUGO AND ANOTHER.

Mr. B. Upington appeared on behalf of two executors in the estate of the late F. H. M. Hugo, and moved for the confirmation of the proposed sale of certain property. There was a consent paper signed by the major heirs, and the report of the Master as to the interests of the minors concerned was favourable.

An order was granted as prayed.

Ex parte PITTS AND WIFE.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the execution of a post-nup tial contract. The parties were married on December 12, 1901 Prior to the celebration of the marriage, it was agreed between them that they should be married without community of property, and with a provision that certain four lots of land, furniture to the value of £300, and a life policy for £100, should be settled upon the wife. The petitioner was wrongly informed by friends that a contract could be entered into at any time after the marriage, so long as it had been agreed upon before then. He had found out his mistake, and now wished to have a post-nuptial contract carrying out the ante-nuptial agreement.

Buchanan, J., pointed out that the contract proposed to be entered into should have been set out. On the petition before them the Court could only authorise a contract in terms of what had been set out.

The matter was allowed to stand over to enable the petitioner to make a more definite statement as to the agreement which he desired to enter into, Buchanan, J., pointing out that it would be just as well to submit a draft of the agreement.

Postea (February 2). The order was granted as prayed.

FINKELSTEIN v. FINKELSTEIN. { 1903. { Jan. 14th.

Marriage — Funds to prosecute action for judicial separation.

A woman who alleged that she had contracted a valid marriage in Russia now applied for an order to compel her alleged husband to furnish her with money to enable her to prosecute an action for a judicial separation from him. The respondent denied the legality of the alleged marriage, but (1) as he produced a document by which he and the applicant had agreed to come together and marry and be husband and wife" (2) and as after the parties separated the respondent demanded that the applicant should return to him and also that he should have the custody of their children and (3) as the respondent had tendered £20 to the applicant.

Held, that he should forthwith pay to her £25 towards enabling her to prosecute her action. The Court declined to express an opinion as to the legality of the marriage.

Mr. Benjamin moved that the respondent, Moses L. Finkelstein, be ordered to pay his wife, Anna Finkelstein, a sum of £25, to enable her to bring an action against him for judicial separation, and also for a contribution by way of alimony to enable her to maintain herself and children pending such suit, and, further, for costs of the application. In her affidavit applicant said that she was married in community of property to Moses Finkelstein in 1884 in Russia, and there were six children of the marriage, the eldest being sixteen years old and the youngest one year old. She intended to institute an action for judicial separation against her husband on the grounds of continued cruelty and drunken habits, and as he had advertised in the public papers, stopping her credit, she had no means of carrying on the action. Defendant was a general merchant and ostrich feather buyer at Oudtshoorn, and she believed he had sufficient means.

Mr. Upington appeared for the respondent, and read a replying affidavit, in which the respondent denied that he had been legally married to the applicant, and he put her to the proof of the marriage. He said that about May, 1884, they made an agreement in Russia by which they agreed to live together, and he was to care for her in the same way as a husband did for his wife, and in the event of their separating or his dying before her she was to receive 200 roubles Russian money, or about £20. This agreement was signed by two witnesses, but not by the parties themselves. Respondent now said that he was willing to pay that £20, and had tendered the amount.

He also denied the allegations of cruelty and drunkenness, and further said that he was not a man of means.

To this applicant replied by affidavit that she had been legally married to respondent by a Jewish Rabbi in Russia, according to the law of Russia, and she further said that defendant had never repudiated the marriage until notice of this application was served upon him.

Mr. Upington submitted that before a woman could come into court and ask for judicial separation there must be proof of the marriage before the Court.

Maasdorp, J., pointed out that in the agreement referred to the ceremony was called a marriage.

Buchanan, J.: This is an application on behalf of Mrs. Finkelstein, who wishes for an order upon her husband to pay over to her a certain sum of money to enable her to institute proceedings against him for judicial separation, also for alimony for herself and children. In answer to this application the respondent says that applicant is not his wife, and he produces a document which, as far as one can understand, shows that in Russia the parties did agree to come together and marry and be husband and wife. As far as this document is concerned it certainly does not support the contention of the respondent that there was no marriage. Further, after the parties separated at Oudtshoorn the attorneys for the respondent wrote to applicant's attorneys requesting the wife (applicant) to return to respondent, and also requesting the children to be returned to him. Now respondent says there was no marriage, and if so he has no claim whatever to these children, although the woman would have an action against him for the support of the children who, he alleges, are illegitimate. On the face of the affidavits as they stand, marriage or no marriage, the applicant would have a right of action. Besides, we have it that the respondent has tendered the £20 under the agreement to be quit of the applicant. The Court will, therefore, order the respondent to pay forthwish to the applicant's attorneys the sum of £25 towards enabling her to prosecute her action. As to the question of the legality of the marriage we cannot now decide. Costs of this application to be costs in the cause.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

FRIBERG V. FRIBERG.

This was an application upon notice calling upon Theodor Friberg to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay £30 to enable applicant to institute proceedings for judicial separation and for payment of £15 a month.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the applicant; Mr. Buchanan for respondent.

It was stated in the petition that the parties were married on May 4, 1882, and there were five children of the marriage, of whom the eldest was 19 years and the youngest eight. Applicant intended to sue for a judicial separation on the grounds of long continued intemperance and cruelty. Respondent was an aerated water manufacturer, and jointly with one Tait, was the proprietor of the Table Mountain Aerated Water Factory, at Woodstock. He owned certain immovable property.

Respondent denied the allegations of intemperance and cruelty. The aerated water business was still young, and any interference with the funds thereof would probably result in the loss of the whole. He had instructed his solicitors to consent to a notarial separation, but this was refused. He was willing that the estate should be investigated with a view to the equitable division of the estate.

The Court ordered payment of £15, to enable applicant to institute her action, to be tried next term, and payment of a sum of £10 as alimony on or before February 1.

SOTONDOSCHE V. SOTONDOSCHE.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the applicant; Mr. Upington for the respondent.

The application was one to make absolute a rule calling upon respondent to show cause why he should not restore to the applicant certain cattle pending an action to be brought by applicant to establish his ownership. Applicant alleged that respondent unlawfully seized and removed the cattle from the applicant's kraal during his absence.

The respondent Sotondosche, brother of the applicant, alleged that he removed certain cattle from applicant's kraal. These cattle belonged to respondent and another, and were removed with the knowledge and consent of applicant. Applicant had been placed in charge of cattle belonging to respondent, and had unlawfully sold some of these, upon which respondent and the other party removed the remainder.

Buchanan, J.: The question to be decided was whether the respondent and his friend acted the part of spoilators. There were the affidavits of the applicant and his wife to the effect that the cattle were removed in the absence of applicant, and there was the affidavit of the respondent, who said that applicant was present and consented when the cattle were removed. Seeing that criminal proceedings were pending in respect to the disposition of some of the cattle, the Court could not now say that this was an act of spoilation. The rule could, therefore, only be made absolute so far as it prevented respondents from disposing of the cattle, pending an action to be brought forthwith. Costs to stand over.

REX V. GAGIANS AND OTHERS.

Mr. Burton moved for an order authorising the expunging of certain names in the criminal record book of the R.M. Court, Namaqualand. The applicants were convicted of an offence under martial law, and their names were entered as having been convicted in the criminal record of the R.M. Court of O'okiep.

Mr. Nightingale, for the Government, consenting, the application was granted.

DALTON V. DAY.

Mr. Searle, K.C., moved for an order on respondent to pay costs. The original application was for ejectment, but since the proceedings commenced, respondent had given up possession.

An order was made for costs.

VON HOLDT V. REYNOLDS.

This was an application by Reynolds, defendant in the above action, for leave to sign judgment against plaintiff, Von Holdt, for not proceeding with his action within the prescribed time.

Mr. Buchanan appeared for the applicant, Reynolds; Mr. Benjamin appeared for the respondent, Von Holdt.

The affidavit made on behalf of applicant stated that summons was issued on July 12, 1902, and plaintiff had failed to proceed with his action within the time laid down in the Rules of Court. It had also been pointed out in correspondence that the wrong person was being sued by plaintiff.

The respondent in his affidavit stated that in the summons issued in July last he claimed £180, being the value of certain six tons of steel sold by him to the plaintiff. During the month of November, however, applicant accepted a proposal to take half the steel and pay for the same. Afterwards notice of this application was given, but then it was arranged that it should be withdrawn, and each party pay his own costs. This was not done, and respondent was now compelled to ask the Court to refuse the application.

In a replying affidavit, Walter Charles Reynolds denied that he accepted the proposal which plaintiff made in November last. He absolutely denied that six tons of steel were ever purchased, although it had been agreed that from a half to one ton of flat steel springs should be purchased at 27s. 6d. per 100 lb. The respondent had agreed that if the application did not come into Court he would pay all the costs, but applicant found that the matter was already in Court.

Counsel having been heard on the facts,

Buchanan, J.: In July last the plaintiff took out a summons against the defendant, and immediately thereafter, on service of the summons, defendant's attorneys wrote, stating that they had entered appearance, and informing plaintiff that he had sued the wrong person. No further action was taken by the plaintiff, and in January he was informed that in consequence of his not proceeding any further, he would be barred, and he was asked to pay the costs incurred, it being stated that if he did not an application would be made to the Court to sign judgment against him. No reply was received to this letter, and thereafter the defendant applied for leave to sign judgment against the plaintiff. Respondent now comes into Court and asks that this order be not made on the ground that he had personally seen the applicant, and they had agreed that there should be no further proceedings, and that each party should pay his own costs. This the applicant positively denies. Considering that there were attorneys on both sides, and that there was no such communication between them, we cannot as the case now stands support the allegations of the respondent that the applicant had agreed that each should pay his own costs. The respondent was clearly in default, and there is no ground why the application should not be granted with costs. An order will therefore be made as prayed.

OLIVIER V. GERICKE AND OTHERS. 1903. Jan. 14th.

This was an application for an order on the respondents to give up possession of a certain farm, and restraining them from interfering with the said property.

The affidavit of Gert Cornelis Olivier, the applicant, was as follows:—

1. That deponent craves leave to refer the honourable Court to his affidavit of December 6, 1902.

2. And deponent says, that since the making of the aforesaid affidavit, the deponent has been credibly informed by some of his tenants, and verily believes that the respondent Wanneburg, who was accompanied by the respondent Gericke, took possession of oats which had been cut, and set aside for deponent's use, notwithstanding the protests of deponent's tenants; stored the same in certain premises and locked the doors thereof.

The defence was that the said ground had been bequeathed to the respondents by their deceased parents, to take possession thereof after the death of the survivor and that under the said will the said property was burdened with a perpetual fidei-commissum, ne exiret extra familiam.

On the motion of Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Searle, K.C.), the application was granted.

Respondents were in default.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Tredgold, McIntyre and Bisset.]

Ex parte GIBSON.

This was an application to have a certain rule nisi, granted on December 23, 1902, by the Hon. Mr. Justice Buchanan in Chambers, made absolute.

The petition of Harry Gibson, secretary of the South African Association, as one of the executors testamentary in the estate of the late Johan Conrad Silberbauer, showed:—

1. That the petitioner, in his aforesaid capacity, was appointed by the late J. C. Silberbauer, together with C. C. Silberbauer and C. F. Silberbauer, as executors testamentary in his estate.

2. That the deceased was the registered owner by deed of transfer of certain land at Bloemendal, Mowbray, in the Cape division, purchased by him from the executors of the late E. J. Syfret. This land consisted of lots 3, 4, and remainder of lots 6, 9, and 12.

3. On September 28, 1849, the remainder of lots 6, 9 and 12 were transferred to one J. H. van Reenen, and by a subsequent transfer became vested in one T. W. Hudson.

4. On May 3, 1860, the said Hudson transferred the said lots 3, 4 and remainder of 6, 9 and 12 to A. J. Zeederberg; but prior to the transfer Surveyor Cameron, in 1860, provisionally deducted from the diagram attached to the transfer made in favour of J. H. van Reenen an extent of 17 square roods for a road across lot 6 to afford access to the Liesbeek River.

5. That such deduction was never used for a road, nor was any road ever made, nor was the deduction noted on the official diagram filed in the Deeds Office with Van Reenen's transfer. Nevertheless, transfer was passed with the reduced extent, and has been so passed in subsequent deeds, including that in favour of the testator.

6. That the correct extent of lots 3 and 4 and remainder of 6, 9 and 12 is 1 morgen 434 square roods and 36 square feet, or 17 square roods more than was actually transferred.

7. That there is no record that the 17 square roods reserved for a road has been transferred by the said Hudson to any one.

Wherefore petitioner prays for an order upon the Registrar of Deeds under the Derelict Lands Act, No. 28 of 1861, authorising him to transfer the said 17 square roods to the estate of the deceased.

On the motion of Mr. Upington, the Court granted an order as prayed.

COWLEY V. COWLEY.

Mr. Bisset moved for removal of trial to Oudtshoorn.

The matter was ordered to stand over until the return day of the citation—the 6th February.

Postea (February 6). The application was granted.

Ex parte FOURIE. { 1903. Jan. 14th.

This was an application for an order authorising the passing of certain transfers.

The petition of Ockert Marthinus Fourie, of Swanepoel's Kraal, in the division of Uitenhage, showed that the said petitioner had been appointed tutor dative over the minors Phillipus Jacobus Fourie, Theodora D. Fourie, Lucas J. Fourie, and Cecilia J. Fourie. That the first of the said minors had attained the age of 21 years, and the second had attained her majority in virtue of marriage. That the remaining two minor children were part owners, in their individual capacities, of the farms Kremlin, Swanepoel's Kraal and Slag Boom, situate in the division of Uitenhage. That there are eleven other co-proprietors in these properties. That the said properties are thickly covered with fire and other wood, and that the cutting and sale of firewood and other wood was one of the sources of livelihood carried on by all the owners of the said properties. Owing, however, to the farms being held in undivided shares, disputes in regard to trespass on wood-chopping and grazing areas, which had been mutually agreed upon constantly arose between owners, and dissatisfaction and disagreement prevailed generally, and in order to put an end to this state of things it had been decided between all the co-proprietors to subdivide the said farms. Thereupon the said farms were surveyed and subdivided, each proprietor receiving in the subdivision a defined share equal in extent to the undivided share held by him or her. The value of the defined shares thus awarded to the said minor children was quite equal to—if not greater than—the value of the undivided shares held by them. Should the passing of the partition transfers of the said properties, in accordance with the subdivision made by the joint owners and duly carried into effect by Surveyor Rostall, be sanctioned by the Court, petitioner will be able to work and farm the portion of the ground allotted to the said minor children to much greater advantage than he otherwise could.

Wherefore the petitioner prayed for an order authorising the passing of the said partition transfers, and further authorising petitioner to assist the two minors to whom he is tutor in the execution and completion of all or any powers or declarations, or other documents as shall or may be necessary or requisite, and generally to act on their behalf in the completion of the partition and sub-division of the said properties aforesaid.

The Master's report was favourable, and on the motion of Mr. Buchanan, the Court granted the order as prayed.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller.]

Ex parte DAMERELL.

This was an application for an order confirming the sale of certain property at Port Elizabeth to the petitioner, Wm. Ewart Damerell, the executor dative of the estate of the late Alexander Mack Masterton, of which estate the property in question formed a part. The said property was sold by public auction on July 29, 1902, and knocked down to the petitioner at a full and fair price, as was shown by the affidavit of the auctioneer and one of the major heirs of the said estate. Certain minors were, however, interested and hence the present application.

The Master recommended that the application be granted.

On the motion of Dr. Greer, an order was granted as prayed.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Scanlen and Syfret.]

VAN AARDT V. BEKKER AND MAYNIER.

Application was made by the defendant Bekker for removal of this suit to the Circuit Court, at Aliwal North.

Mr. Upington appeared for the applicant.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Burton), appeared for the respondent (plaintiff in the action).

Mr. Benjamin appeared on behalf of the second defendant to consent to the application.

It was stated on affidavit for the applicant that the parties and witnesses, of whom there were about fourteen, all resided at Aliwal North, with the exception of one.

After hearing counsel.

Buchanan, J., said the application was made under the 34th rule of Court. His lordship read the rule, and said that in this case the plaintiff, the defendants, and all the witnesses resided in the district of Aliwal North, some 600 or 700 miles from Cape Town, and the defendant now applied to have the case removed to the Circuit Court of Aliwal North, where the case could be more conveniently and more economically tried. The only answer to this is that there has been no Circuit Court in Aliwal North since war was proclaimed. That really was no answer, because the war is now over, and there would be a Circuit Court there. It was said the case was one of great importance, and that there were important questions of law. He had looked over the papers, and the question seemed to him to be one of fact. There would no doubt be a conflict of evidence, but if such a case could not go to circuit, the Circuit Court might as well be abolished for the purpose of civil work. No reason had been shown why the case should not be removed, and the application would be granted, costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte D'OLIVEIRA.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the Board of Executors to pay out certain moneys.

The matter was ordered to stand over, so that formal notice might be given to the Secretary of the Board of Executors.

LEVIN v. COCHRANE AND CHERRY.

Mr. Benjamin moved that the Court make final the provisional order granted by the Chief Justice restraining the respondents from parting with the proceeds of the estate of their firm, saving such portion as is required to satisfy a certain mortgage bond, pending an action to be instituted by applicant to recover a sum of £1,250. It appeared that the respondents being in need of financial assistance applied to the applicant who guaranteed them to the bank, receiving in return an option to purchase certain property for £6,000, with the further understanding that if the property were sold for a higher sum than that he should share the profit with them. The property had, before the expiry of the option, been sold for £8,500, and it was the half of the sum in excess of £6,000 that applicant intended to bring an action to recover.

Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for the respondents.

After the affidavit had been read and counsel had been heard in argument, the Court granted an order making the rule absolute to the extent of £1,250, pending an action to be brought forthwith, costs to be costs in the cause.

Buchanan, J.: The respondents in this case, being in financial difficulties, applied to the applicant, Levin, for assistance, and a written document is produced which shows the agreement come to between the parties. The document says that Levin, in order to assist the firm, had given a guarantee to the African Banking Corporation for any advances made to them up to the extent of £1,000. As a fact, Levin had given a written guarantee to the bank in the terms stated. In consideration of this guarantee, the firm gave Levin the exclusive right of pre-emption over their property in Roeland-street for the sum of £6,000. This right of pre-emption lasted till the 3rd of April this year. The agreement also provided that if Levin did not buy the property himself, and if the firm could get an offer for not less than £7,000, Levin was to consent to a sale and was to share with the firm any surplus over £6,000. The property went up in value, and Mr. Mouat, the inspector of the firm, has now sold the property within the time during which the option lasts for the sum of £8,500. Levin, under the agreement, claims that one half of the difference between £6,000 and £8,500 belongs to him. It is stated in the affidavits that in consideration of the guarantee given by Levin to the Bank, the Bank gave to the firm financial assistance to the extent of over £900 - the guarantee being for £1,000. The firm say now that Levin undertook to continue his guarantee for a period of twelve months. Levin says that it is not so. He alleges that it was intended that the assistance should be temporary, and that the respondents had told him they were getting money by the middle of April from the Mossel Bay Harbour Board. When in April the firm did not liquidate their liability to the Bank, applicant put pressure on them through the Bank, which resulted in the overdraft being cleared off in May. As the documents stand, there was the right given to Levin to stop his guarantee at any time on giving notice of his intention to the Bank. The guarantee given by Levin to the Bank was referred to in the agreement between applicant and respondents. When we look at the guarantee to the Bank, we find it a guarantee terminable at any time Levin may give notice to the Bank. There is nothing in the written document to assist the Court in saying for how long this guarantee was to last. As the document stands, Levin was quite within his right in terminating the guarantee. The firm now wish on the ground of alleged breach of contract to prevent the money now in the hands of Mouat being paid over to Levin, but as the documents stand the half surplus belongs to Levin. A rule nisi having been granted against Mouat parting with the proceeds of the property, we think that to the extent of £1,250 it should be made absolute, pending an action to be brought forthwith; costs to be costs in the cause. His Lordship added that the Court would suggest that instead of wasting money on the law which would come out of the pockets of creditors, the parties should come to some arrangement.

Ex parte EXECUTORS OF THE LATE DANIEL JOHANNES VAN WYK.

Mr. P. S. Jones applied for confirmation of the sale of certain property to one of the executors. Certain minors were interested, and the Master's report was favourable.

Granted.

REX V. STANLEY. { 1903 Jan. 14th.

Expulsion from licensed premises — Disorderly conduct — Act 28 of 1883, Sec. 78.

Under the term "disorderly conduct" employed in Sec. 78 of Act 28 of 1883, is included the use of language which would tend to create a breach of the peace in the bar of a hotel. The hotel proprietor is justified in ejecting any person using such language, even if he is sober.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., appeared for the appellant; Mr. Howel Jones for the Crown.

The appeal was one against the conviction of appellant, who is the landlord of the Commercial Hotel at Paarl, for an assault upon one De Villiers, in that he seized hold of him and pushed him out of the bar of the hotel.

Sir Henry Juta said that the whole case turned upon section 78 of the Liquor Licensing Act of 1883, which provided that any licensed person might refuse to admit or might turn out of the premises in respect of which the licence was granted, any person who is drunk, or who is violent, quarrelsome, or disorderly.

The record of evidence was read, from which it appeared that there was a discussion in the bar in reference to the defence force. The appellant alleged that De Villiers made use of language which tended to create a breach of the peace, but the Magistrate held that the conduct of De Villiers was not such as to justify the defendant in ejecting him.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the appellant): The question is whether the language used by the appellant was likely to lead to a disturbance or not. The language used by De Villiers certainly was. A number of the District Mounted Police were about the place, and some very uncomplimentary things were said of them and of others by De Villiers. Boshoff (who was with De Villiers) went out quietly when requested to do so, but De Villiers had to be forcibly ejected. A licensed person may eject anybody who is likely to cause a disturbance; and the language used by De Villiers was very likely to do so, more particularly as he was with Boshoff, who had been in charge of a rebel commando. A quarrel does not necessarily mean coming to blows, and if a publican were to wait till blows were struck before ejecting people, he would most likely lose his licence.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown): I quite agree with the view that the Court should protect publicans who try to maintain order on their premises. It has been said by counsel for the appellant that De Villiers came into the bar with the leader of a rebel commando; but that is not the offence with which he is charged. Boshoff seems to have been somewhat of a braggart, but he did not try to cause a breach of the peace. He simply tried to get up an Afrikander drink, and his intentions seem to have been rather pacific than otherwise.

Sir H. Juta in reply.

Buchanan, J.: In this case the appellant, who is a hotel-keeper, was charged with assaulting one De Villiers by seizing hold of him and attempting to put him out of his bar. He was convicted by the Magistrate, and fined 10s. He now appeals against this conviction on the ground that he was doing what he had a right to do under the 78th section of the Liquor Licence Act. By that section any licensed person may refuse to admit or may turn out of his premises anyone who is drunk, or who is violent, quarrelsome, or disorderly, whether such person be drunk or not. The hotel keeper here says that the complainant was disorderly in his bar; the Magistrate has found that he was not so disorderly as to justify the act of the appellant in turning him out. What took place seems shortly to have been this: The complainant and one Boshoff came into the bar, where there were a number of members of the late Defence Force, that Boshoff and another man entered into a conversation which certainly would, as far as the evidence goes, have led to a row and, indeed, Mr. Jones, for the Crown, seems inclined to admit that if Boshoff had declined to go out when asked, there might have been justification for the landlord turning him out. But the plaintiff only seems to have made one casual remark, which certainly does not seem to me to have been likely to lead to a disturbance. Boshoff showed his good sense when requested to leave by going out, but the complainant refused to leave the bar. Boshoff probably thought he had rendered himself liable to be ejected. This is one of the cases on the border, and if the Magistrate had found that the complainant had rendered himself liable to be ejected I don't think the Court would have interfered with his decision. But the Magistrate had all the parties before him, he heard all accounts of what took place, and it is quite possible he may be right in saying that the plaintiff did not do anything to justify his being turned out. I quite agree with what Sir Henry Juta has said that disorderly conduct would include language which would tend to create a breach of the peace, and if a person goes into a bar and uses such language, that would be disorderly conduct, and would justify the proprietor in turning him out. Boschoff seems to have been guilty of such conduct, and when remonstrated with he left the bar, but the plaintiff does not seem to have been guilty of this. The only thing against him appears to be that he came in with Boshoff, and refused to leave when the latter left. The appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp concurred.

LANDESHUT v. KOENIG. { 1901, Feb. 1st.

Arbitrator — Award — Evidence — Irregularity — Mistake of arbitrator.

It is no valid objection to the award of an arbitrator that the arbitrator heard the evidence of a witness of one party to the submission in the absence of the other party if the evidence was so heard with the previous consent of both parties. Nor is it a valid objection to the award that the arbitrator has made a mistake in his award unless the mistake is so gross and manifest that it could not have been made without some degree of misconduct or partiality on the part of the arbitrator.

Mr. Upington moved to have a certain award of an arbitrator (Mr. Maynard Nash) made an order of Court.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with whom was Mr. Alexander), appeared for the respondent, and opposed the application on several grounds. It was alleged that the arbitration was wrong in form, certain material evidence having been taken when respondent was absent, and without notice having been given to him, and it was also contended that the award was wrong in substance, the arbitrator not having taken into consideration or given weight to certain agreements. The matter arose out of the financing of a certain company of juvenile theatrical performers.

After hearing counsel on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The objections to the award are that the arbitrator heard the evidence of a witness of one party to the submission in the absence of the other party, and that in the estimation of the damages awarded to the applicant he proceeded upon an erroneous basis. In regard to the first of these objections, I am satisfied that it was with the respondent's previous consent that the evidence of Mrs. Conway's claim was taken in the absence of the respondent, and that it is not competent for him now to raise this objection to the award being made a Rule of Court. In regard to the second objection, the affidavits certainly throw considerable doubt on the correctness of the award, but that is not sufficient to impugn the award. It is not a valid objection to an award that the arbitrator has made a mistake in his award, unless the mistake is so gross and manifest that it could not have been made without some degree of misconduct or partiality on the part of the arbitrator. The views of the text writers of our law on this point are as conflicting as the English cases, but the tendency of this Court from its establishment to the present time has been, if possible to uphold the awards of arbitrators where they have acted honestly, impartially, and within the scope of the reference. The mistake in the present case, if a mistake at all, was upon a very immaterial point, and was certainly not a manifest one, for it does not appear on the face of the award, and it relates to facts about which there is still, after all that has been said, considerable obscurity. The award must be made a Rule of Court, with costs.

KOENIG V. LANDESHUT.

Mr. Schreiner applied on behalf of Julius Koenig for an order for security to the amount of £1,260 pending the settlement of an action against the respondent in respect to fees for the alleged hire and use of certain playrights. He stated that there were several matters in dispute between the parties, and the respondent was now on her way to Australia.

The respondent's attorneys answered that she had only temporarily left the Colony, and would shortly return to settle here. The present visit to Australia was an enforced business visit. There was a considerable sum of money in the hands of Julius Koenig belonging to the respondent.

The applicant's replying affidavit stated that he admitted that he had a sum of £4,248 16s. 10d., said to belong to the respondent, but if the award were made final there would be no assets left in the Colony belongng to the respondent.

The Chief Justice suggested that the money be placed in the hands of the Registrar of the Court.

Mr. Schreiner: I have no objection at all to that course. Of course, there will be the question of costs, but that may remain to abide the result of the action.

Mr. Upington opposed the application, and pointed out that the respondent had declared her intention of returning to this country.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court cannot allow the applicant to retain this money in his own hands, but there is sufficient reason for ordering that the money be paid to the Registrar. The respondent has left the Colony, there is no proof that she has any domicile in this colony; as far as one can judge she was a temporary visitor, and it is only right if the applicant has a bona fide claim against the respondent it should be secured, more especially as under the order of the Court the applicant is ordered to pay over a sum of £4.200 to the respondent. If he has a bona-fide claim against her it is only right that a portion of that amount should be in some way or other secured to him in order to meet any claims which he may have against the respondent. The Court will, therefore, order that the sum £1,400 be paid over by the applicant, Koenig, to the Registrar to abide the further order of the Court. As to costs, I think they should be costs in the cause.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

TENNANT V. ISAACS.

Mr. Upington appeared for the plaintiff in this application for provisional sentence.

Mr. Wilkinson appeared for the defendant, and said that there were some other applications for provisional sentence against defendant, but a provisional order for the sequestration of defendant's estate had been granted, and it would be better for these applications to stand over until Thursday, the return day of the provisional order. Counsel also stated that owing to the granting of the provisional order defendant could not deal with certain two properties, and it was alleged that if he could deal with one of these properties he could satisfy the debts for which he was now being sued.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that that would be a ground for refusing the application when it was sought to make the provisional order of sequestration final. If defendant could then show the Court that if he were able to sell the property he would have more than would suffice to pay his debts, then he was not insolvent, and the Court would not make the order final.

All the applications for provisional sentence were ordered to stand over until Thursday.

He also asked for an order declaring certain funds, the property of the club, in the hands of Mr. T. J. O'Reilly, executable in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim. Counsel pointed out that on a previous occasion an application was made to the Court for leave to wind up the club under the Companies Act. That application was refused. Mr. O'Reilly had been appointed liquidator, and as such had certain funds belonging to the club in his possession, but inasmuch as he was not an official liquidator, but simply a third party having funds in his possession, it was necessary to apply to the Court for an order declaring the funds executable.

In reply to the Court, counsel said he did not think Mr. O'Reilly had had any notice of the application.

Provisional sentence granted, but as to the second prayer the Court ordered that any funds in the hands of Mr. O'Reilly belonging to the defendants in their capacity as representatives of the club be declared executable in satisfaction of the plaintiffs' claim.

Ex parte WINTERBACH. { 1903. Feb. 2nd.

This was an application for the amendment of an Order of Court granted on April 15, 1901, under the Derelict Lands Act of 1881, whereby the Registrar of Deeds was instructed to register a certain erf at Ceres in the name of Johan Carel Winterbach (the petitioner). A rule nisi was granted on the aforesaid date, and made absolute on May 23, 1901. Petitioner, however, owing to incorrect information, stated that the said piece of land was still registered in the name of Jan Hendrik Munnik, from whom petitioner's father had purchased it; but the petitioner has since ascertained that at the time of the said purchase the said land was registered in the joint names of the said Jan H. Munnik and Hendrik Lodewyk de Lange Vos, and was erroneously included with the remaining extent of a certain place Riet Valley, which was transferred by the assignees of the estate of the said late Jan H. Munnik and the trustees of the said late Hendrik L. de L. Vos to one Adolph Arnholtz, on March 30, 1880, and thereafter having been registered in the names of different persons, at present stands registered in the name of Caroline Armicia Boyes. Wherefore petitioner prayed that the aforesaid order granted to him might be amended accordingly.

On the motion of Mr. De Waal, the Court granted an order as prayed.

GRAHAM BROS. V. STRASBURGER. { 1903. Feb. 2nd.

This was an application for leave to substitute one Arthur Pavitt, of 26, Rue du Mont Thabor, Paris, for that of Arthur Septimus Browne, of 370, Rue St. Honore, Paris, as the Commissioner authorised to take the evidence in France of certain witnesses connected with the above suit. The applicant also called upon the respondent to show cause why the hearing of this case should not be postponed from February 26, 1903, until such later date as should allow of the return of the said commission from France. From the affidavits filed, it appeared that the estate of Graham Bros. had been sequestrated since proceedings in this action had been commenced. It also appeared that Arthur S. Browne was no longer in practice in Paris, but that A. Pavitt was now acting for him.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for defendant): This is an application for the substitution of one Commissioner for another. I submit that we are entitled to oppose this motion. (See Sec. 24 of the Insolvent Ordinance.) The action has been stayed, and the case cannot go to trial just now.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (for plaintiff): We come into Court on the merits. Defendant applies to have evidence taken on commission. Apparently last Friday or Saturday an order was granted, but it was never expected that there would have been such excessive delay in bringing on the case.

Mr. Schreiner in reply was not heard.

The Court intimated that judgment would be postponed until after the hearing of the application to make the provisional order of sequestration final.

VAN BLERCK V. VAN BLERCK.

Mr. Benjamin moved for the personal attachment of the respondent, one Van Blerck, a carriage painter, of Wellington, a young man who is about to be sued by his wife on the ground of his adultery with one Wilhelmina Hoffman, with whom, it is alleged, he is now living. Last September the defendant was ordered to pay his wife £20 to enable her to proceed with her action, but he had not yet paid anything.

Respondent appeared in person, and said his only defence was that he could not pay so much. All he could afford was £3 per month. His wages were anything from £2 to £3 per week.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out the defendant's neglect to put by anything, and his offer now to save up came somewhat tardily. If he could pay and would not he must be punished for contempt.

Defendant denied that he was living with the woman Hoffman.

The Court granted an order of £3 10s. per month until defendant shall have paid £20 and costs.

CONSTABLE V. CONSTABLE.

Mr. Benjamin moved for substituted service of citation, it having been found impossible to effect personal service, as ordered.

Application granted, two publications to be made in a Johannesburg newspaper and one publication in the "Government Gazette," and the return day of the citation extended to May 1.

FORBES V. TIMBER SUPPLY CO.

Mr. Schreiner mentioned the case of Forbes and the Timber Supply Co., which was an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council from a judgment of Court.

Mr. Buchanan said he was instructed to consent to the application if the leave were granted on the usual conditions, but he was bound to say that he did not know anything as to the previous history of the case.

De Villiers, C.J., said that the conditions were not the usual ones, and that the case would stand over until Thursday next.

SUPREME COURT

WASSERMAN V. WASSERMAN. { 1903, Feb. 3rd.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, for divorce.

In this case the summons, intendit, and other documents were served by substituted service in Paris. At one time it was thought that personal service could be effected, but that had been found impossible. Plaintiff claimed an order for the restitution of her conjugal rights, failing which, for a decree of divorce and custody of the minor children of the marriage. She did not claim maintenance or costs.

Mr. Buchanan for the plaintiff; Defendant in default.

Rachael Wasserman (born Fletcher) said she was married to Michael Wasserman at Johannesburg on January 10, 1895. She lived with him there until 1897, when they came to Cape Town, where her husband obtained work. In 1899 defendant left witness and her children, and proceeded to Europe. He said he was going for two months. She wrote to him repeatedly, but only received from him one letter from Paris, giving his new address. She wrote often to that address, but received no reply. He left her with £2 only. There were three children of the marriage, aged seven, six, and five years respectively.

By the Chief Justice: Witness worked at tailoring, and intended to support her children in that way. She had heard that defendant was living with another woman in Paris, whom he had since married.

The Court granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before May 15; failing which, to show cause by May 31 why a decree of divorce should not be granted, and why plaintiff should not have the custody of the children of the marriage; order to be served in the same way as the original citation.

SAMPSON V. SAMPSON.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which, for divorce, forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage, and costs, brought by Mrs. Sampson against her husband, Solomon F. Sampson. Substituted service had been effected, in accordance with an order of the Court.

Mr. Alexander appeared for the plaintiff; the defendant was in default.

Charles William Henry Smith, clerk in the Colonial Secretary's Office in charge of the marriage registers, produced the original certificate of the marriage of plaintiff and defendant.

Wilhelmina Christina Sampson said she was married to defendant at Vryburg on April 17, 1893. After the marriage they resided for a little in Kimberley, and then came to Cape Town, where they lived together for six years. On September 15, 1900, defendant left plaintiff, and went to Pietermaritzburg, Natal, and five months later he sent her £7. That was the last she heard from him. There were no children of the marriage.

By the Chief Justice: She believed defendant was now in Johannesburg, but did not know his address.

The Court granted an order calling upon defendant to return to or receive plaintiff on or before May 15, failing which, to show cause by May 31 why a decree of divorce should not be granted; personal service to be effected, if possible, failing which, substituted service, as directed in regard to the citation.

YATES v. ESTATE YATES. { 1901. Feb. 3rd.

Fiduciary relation — Contract — Independent advice—Executor's commission.

On the death of his brother, the plaintiff, who was an Attorney-at-law, agreed with the defendant, who was his brother's widow and executrix, that he would administer the estate and that, in consideration of such administration, she should allow him the executor's commission of 5 per cent. on the gross assets of the estate.

Held, that the contract was not voidable by reason of the plaintiff not having seen that the defendant had independent legal advice before entering into the contract.

This was an action to recover the sums of £439 6s., being commission in respect of services rendered in administering the estate of the late John James Yates, with interest on the same, and £70 9s. 11d., disbursements made.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff resided at King William's Town and the defendant at Kei-road. On June 6, 1895, John James Yates died, leaving defendant, his widow, his sole heiress, and she was duly appointed executrix of the estate. On July 25, 1895, at Mount Frere, it was agreed between the plaintiff and the defendant that in consideration of the former administering the estate the latter would allow him the executor's commission of five per cent. on the gross assets, this sum to be paid to the plaintiff by defendant's executors upon defendant's death, or by the defendant upon her remarriage, if such should ever take place, and until that time to bear interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum. The plaintiff, in pursuance of that agreement, administered the estate and made disbursements in so doing on behalf of the defendant to the extent of £70 9s. 11d. This estate was realised by July 1, 1896, and realised £8,785 3s. 6d. for the gross assets, and the amount coming to plaintiff as his commission of five per cent. was £439 6s. About June, 1896, defendant remarried, and the amounts then became due and payable. Plaintiff therefore sued for £579 11s. 11d., being the amount of the commission, interest, and disbursements.

Defendant in her plea said that after the death of her husband the plaintiff, without stipulating for any remuneration, and proferring to act towards her as a brother, promised to undertake to advise her and represent her in and about the liquidation of her husband's estate, and acting as such from time to time laid before her documents for signature, which she in all good faith signed. As to the document purporting to be an agreement between her and plaintiff, she said she was wholly ignorant of it until after her re-marriage. That defendant's signature to this document was obtained by plaintiff acting then as her adviser by the exercise of undue influence and by wrongfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently taking advantage of her confidence in him as her adviser, and its contents were at no time by him explained to or understood by her, and it was contended that, therefore, the agreement was null and void in law. That the plaintiff did act as her adviser and representative in connection with the liquidation of her late husband's estate, and that she submitted to his guidance and control in all matters. She was aware that the plaintiff must have made certain disbursements on behalf of the estate, but did not admit the amount alleged to have been so disbursed, and she specially denied that the plaintiff did administer the estate and prepare for her signature any proper and legal account of such administration duly supported by necessary and proper vouchers, upon which account alone so supported it could be determined what sums had been properly disbursed on account of the estate and what allowance by way of commission or remuneration the Master of the Court would make in accordance with law and practice. She said that even if the document did embody a valid agreement, the plaintiff was not entitled to have and maintain an action against her therein until he should have complied with the conditions thereof, and should have prepared an account supported by the proper vouchers, and until the Master of the Court should have allowed a sum by way of executor's commission for the administration of the estate, and for the purpose of permitting the plaintiff, should he desire it, to prepare such an account she was willing that he should have at all times reasonable access to all documents now in her custody order, or disposition. She admitted that she remarried in June, 1899, and that she refused to pay the sum claimed, or any sum. Wherefore she prayed that the plaintiff's claim might be dismissed.

For a claim in reconvention the defendant (now plaintiff) said that the plaintiff (now defendant) was in possession of documents connected with the titles or deeds of transfer of landed property situated at Mount Frere, or elsewhere in the native territories, which she was entitled to as heir of her husband, and wrongfully refused to deliver up these to her possession. Wherefore she prayed for an order compelling the plaintiff (now defendant) forthwith to deliver up to her all the said documents or deeds, together with the costs of suit.

In his replication plaintiff said that a balance sheet and account were prepared of the estate of the late John James Yates, upon which the sale of the business took place, and this balance-sheet was signed by the defendant. All books and accounts were kept by one Miller, the bookkeeper to the estate, and were and are under the control and custody of the defendant.

For a plea to the claim in reconvention the plaintiff admitted that he was in possession of certain documents connected with the titles or deeds of certain landed property to which the defendant would be entitled, and he said that he had always been ready and willing, and hereby again tendered to deliver up the same upon payment to him of the sums due to him by the defendant.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), for the plaintiff. Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan), for the defendant.

Joseph John Yates, the plaintiff, said that for seventeen years he had carried on business as an attorney at King William's Town. His brother, defendant's husband, died on June 16, 1895, leaving three businesses in his estate. He left a will, which had been drawn in witness's office. It had been understood that witness would be the executor, but when the will was discovered, it was found that the wife was the executor. Witness took steps to look after the businesses, there being no one else to take control. Witness detailed the steps he took. In the course of these he went for a couple of weeks to Mount Frere, where the principal business was established, and made himself thoroughly conversant with the whole business. When he found the extent of the work involved, he represented to the widow that it could not be expected that he would undertake without remuneration the administration of the estate. At the same time he saw that the business could not be drained of too much money, and after they had discussed the whole thing, the agreement now in question was duly signed and witnessed. He could not remember whether Mrs. Tetlow, the witness to the agreement, was present when defendant actually signed it, or whether she merely heard the signature acknowledged. Mrs. Tetlow was not present when the nature of the document was explained to defendant by witness. Witness found his brother had left certain instructions as to the manner in which his estate was to be wound up. Witness carried out those instructions as far as possible, but if he had followed out those instructions in their entirety, the estate would have been bankrupt. One Miller was the bookkeeper at the principal business at Mount Frere, through which place all the accounts from the other two businesses passed. Witness's work in connection with the estate involved considerable correspondence with Miller and others. Nearly all the indents were sent through witness. Then a large number of debts of small amounts belonging to the estate had to be collected Witness tried in every way possible to realise the estate, but nobody would have anything to do with the business. He offered it for sale to defendant's brother, but he would not buy it. Ultimately witness effected an arrangement with Dyer and Dyer, who were practically the only creditors of the business. On July 21, 1895, the indebtedness on the capital account was £5,022 10s., and by April 18, 1896, that had been reduced to £3,700. On the current account, the indebtedness was £1,007, and by June 30, 1896, that had been reduced to £586. On July 1, 1896, by arrangement with the chief creditors, Dyer and Dyer, the business was taken over by witness's brother. He might mention that the business had been offered to others at less money than his brother paid for it. An agreement was entered into in regard to the purchase of the business by witness's brother. This was the first time witness had ever heard that the estate had been realised ruinously, or that witness had not done his best for it. Defendant secured out of the estate all the landed property, in addition to a house which had never been brought into the estate, as it had been ceded to defendant by ante-nuptial contract. Defendant had got about £2,200 out of the estate. The gross assets were over £6,000, and the difference between that amount and the £2,200 represented the debts in the estate. Witness never had charge of the books of the business, which were in charge of Miller at Mount Frere. Witness produced his books to show how his disbursements of £70 odd had been incurred. The principal items were telegrams, and witness's and defendant's postcart fares to Mount Frere. For many of the items, witness had not vouchers. It was erroneous to state that the property was not sold to the best advantage. The widow got £100 per year out of the property by the sale of the business to witness's brother.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: Defendant stopped with witness's mother after her husband's death. Witness never cared much for her. After her husband's death, he told her he would do all in his power for her. He did not go to Mount Frere on his own business, although he went home by Natal. At the time there were farms at Mount Fletcher for sale, and witness considered he had lost over £2.000 by not being there to buy them. As to the agreement, witness did not think he brought it with him to Mount Frere. He believed he wrote it out at the table there. He read the agreement over to defendant. At that time witness had read the instructions left by his deceased brother, who had desired Mr. Cross to act as liquidator, but the latter refused to do so. Those instructions also directed that Mr. Murray should act as solicitor. It did not occur to witness to advise defendant to see an independent person in regard to signing the agreement. He claimed 5 per cent. on the Mount Frere property, but he did not know they had the title for it. He had refused to hand over the title to the defendant. Being a solicitor, he had a lien on the titles for his claim. He had not had the name of deceased in the documents changed to the name of the person to whom the property had been sold. He did not give the defendant a copy of the agreement. She wrote to witness when she was going to be married. He did not state his claim before the marriage, because he was not taken into defendant's confidence, and, in fact, was not even invited to the wedding. It was untrue that witness went to defendant one day with the agreement to sell the business to his brother, and said that she must sign it. She said she must inquire into it, but he would not say that she was reluctant to sell. It was not true that witness said that, unless she signed the agreement, he would wash his hands of the whole matter.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that the cross-examination of witness as to the sale to his brother raised the question of maladministration of the estate, which could never have been anticipated from the plea.

Mr. Schreiner pointed out that in his examination-in-chief, at any rate, witness had gone into that question in considerable detail.

De Villiers, C.J.: That was to show the amount of work done.

Re-examined: At the time he claimed 5 per cent. on the whole he did not know that there were any immovables in the estate.

Miss Mary Ann Yates, a sister of the plaintiff, said she lived with him at King William's Town. Witness knew defendant, and often spoke with her about the affairs of her late husband's estate. Defendant told witness that she had signed a document to the effect that she would pay plaintiff something for his trouble. She told witness that on two occasions. That was shortly after she returned from Mount Frere.

Cross-examined: Witness could not give the date, but one of the conversations was before defendant started housekeeping. The other was after that time. Witness first heard of the document from defendant.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

For the defence Mr. Schreiner called

Mrs. Kate Wheeldon, the defendant in the action, who said that she was married to her present husband in community of property, but with her first husband, John James Yates, she had an antenuptial contract. At the time of her first husband's death, on June 6, 1895, witness was on her way to Natal, having received news that he was ill. About a month later witness went to Mount Frere. In the interim she stayed at the house of Mr. Yates's mother. During that time plaintiff never talked anything about business matters with witness. He said she was to look upon him as a brother. Witness was on good terms with plaintiff, and he never showed that he disliked her. She thought they were very good friends. When he spoke about accompanying her to Mount Frere, she said it was very kind of him to go up and do anything for her. There was nothing said about what would be done by him. He told witness then that he was going up to buy farms. He gave witness no idea that he was going to make any charge for what he did for her. At Mount Frere witness and plaintiff stayed in the same house. Mrs. Tetlow, a very old friend, was also there. Plaintiff was there for two or three weeks. She did not remember signing the document in question. She remembered signing several documents that were put into her hands by Mr. Yates. She had perfect confidence in Mr. Yates at the time. She did not inquire into anything that sh signed. She had no recollection whatever of the document, a copy of which was sent to her in July, 1899. She knew that she signed a document to which Mrs. Tetlow was a witness.

Mr. Schreiner: That document is before the Court. Do you remember the occasion on which Mrs. Tetlow witnessed the document?—I remember Mrs. Tetlow did witness a document.

Is that your signature on the document?—Yes.

You see Mrs. Tetlow signs as a witness?—Yes.

On the occasion on which Mrs. Tetlow appeared as a witness to the document did Mr. Yates explain to you when you were alone what a business matter should be and how he should be paid in the way set out in this document?—No.

Did he ever say to you that he was to be paid?—Never.

You want to be very careful about that, you know, Mrs. Wheeldon. Has Mr, Yates ever said to you during that time you were to pay him for his services?—Never.

He says that on that date he explained to you fully the terms on which he would do the work, that he would not make any charge until you should either die or remarry, and that he should then receive 5 per cent. on the gross assets?—He did nothing of the sort.

Of that you are positive?—I am positive. I asked him afterwards if I had to pay him for anything he had done. He replied, "Nothing whatever." He was only too glad to be able to do what he had done for me; it had been little or no trouble, because the business had been left in such perfect order.

Witness further stated that she was living at Kei-road when she met her second husband, and that shortly before she was married she wrote to Mr. Yates informing him of her engagement. He sent her a very nice letter in reply. He made no mention of any claim that he might have against the estate, and the first intimation that she received was a copy of the document that she got in July 1899. It was a great surprise to her. She only saw the first sheet at first, and the amount that appeared there was £40 or so. She said to her husband at the time that she did not know that she owed Mr. Yates anything at all, but if he claimed this sum for any services he had rendered she supposed she would have to pay it. Her husband then told her to look further on, and on doing so she found that the account amounted to something like £600. He never consulted her with regard to the expenses which he had put down for telegrams, horse hire, and so forth. As to the item of £10 for a visit to Natal, he simply told her that he was going to speak to the doctor about the operation that her late husband went through to satisfy himself that everything had been done that could have been done. She was glad that Mr. Yates went to Natal, but she did not ask him to go. She subsequently removed from Mount Frere to King William's Town, where she was asked down to Mr. Yates's office on a little matter of business. Willie Yates was there, and an agreement was then produced under which Willie Yates was to take over the business. He was to pay a rent of £100, this covering the shop and two cottages. She told him that she thought that she should have something extra for the cottages, even if it were only £20 a year, but he said he could not think of paying any more. Mr. W. P. Yates was also present, and he said something to the same effect as the other Mr. Yates. Mr. Yates, the plaintiff, took that document away. She hesitated to sign the document because she was not satisfied with the terms, and Mr. Yates then seemed to be in great concern, and he said that if she did not sign he would wash his hands of the whole business. Mr. Yates was not speaking the truth when he said that nothing of the kind took place. There was no one at that time whom she could consult except her brother-in-law, and he did not care about having anything to do with Mr. Yates. She knew Mr. Murray, the attorney, but she had not employed him as a legal adviser. All that he had done on her behalf was to make her will. She did not go back to Mount Frere till about two months after her first husband's death. Nobody had asked her for the key of her husband's drawer for the list of instructions that he had left. She knew that the drawer must have been broken into. She left her business matters entirely in the hands of Mr. Yates, in fact, she added, "they did just as they liked." Miss Yates's statement that witness had told her that Mr. Yates was to be paid by her for his services was absolutely untrue.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: She did not remember exactly when she was first married. She was married about three years to her first husband before he died. She was about thirty years of age at the time of his death. When she was in England she lived with a lady for a while, but she did not do any secretarial work for her. She was prepared to pay the amount that she saw on the first sheet of the account, but she did not think for a moment that he would charge her £600. She had always said that she would be prepared to pay him a reasonable sum, but she did not think that £600 was a reasonable sum.

Sir H. Juta: You know that he transacted a good deal of work in connection with the business after your husband's death, that there were three branches, and that he looked after them all. You know that the executors of this country get paid a reasonable amount for their trouble?—Yes.

I suppose that you are perfectly willing that he should be paid a reasonable sum as an executor?—I don't know about that. Of course, being a brother-in-law, he told me he was doing this as a brother. He was not an executor, you see.

But he was doing all the work of an executor?—Yes

And also an administrator?—Yes.

Supposing in the Master's Office there was a tariff on which they pay executors, you would be willing that he should be paid according to that?—I don't know about that; he was not an executor. She added that she did not remember signing the document, but she admitted that the signature was hers. At the time she signed this document she was in the habit of signing documents that she knew nothing about. She did not ask what it was about.

Sir H. Juta: But supposing it was to sign away £5.000 of your own?—But I did not take the precaution to examine the document, as I had perfect confidence in him as a brother.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is a very short document, a very simple document; did that there was to be such a postponement of the payment, it was arranged that this six per cent. should be paid. I think, however, that it is right that this six per cent. interest should run only from the time that the amount of the remuneration was ascertained and communicated, and I am not inclined, therefore, to allow any of this interest except from the date of the summons. Before considering the question as to the amount of commission I must consider the question of the disbursements. The claim is for £70 odd, but in my opinion the Court should allow only for such disbursements as the plaintiff has tendered vouchers for, which I find amount to £24 12s. 6d. Then as to the commission, I am of opinion that there should be no commission charged upon the immovables. It was not a case in which the Master would have allowed the defendant any commission as executor under the circumstances, even if there had been other heirs. As to the movables, however, I am of opinion that the plaintiff should receive his commission at the rate of 5 per cent. upon £6,528. The Master's explanation was not perfectly clear to me. He admits that 5 per cent. would have been allowed upon the capital account and current account reduced, but he seemed to say, with some hesitation, that as to this amount of £3,700, which represented the debts which were owing at the time when plaintiff's brother took over the business, the amount should only be 2½ per cent. I confess that I cannot see any reason for distinction between this £3,700 and the remaining portion of this claim. In my opinion, therefore, there should be a commission charged at the rate of 5 per cent. upon £6,528, which makes £326 8s., add to that £24 12s. 6d. disbursements and the sum total is £351 0s. 6d., and for this sum judgment should be given for the plaintiff with interest from the date of summons. There is only one other point, and that is in regard to the claim in reconvention. Sir Henry Juta has candidly admitted that the plaintiff cannot dispute the right of the defendant to the possession of these documents, and if it had appeared that the retention of these documents had anything to do with the present lawsuit or added in any way to the costs, the fact that judgment is given for the defendant on her claim in reconvention would affect the case, but under the circumstances of this case it could not in any way affect the costs.

Mr. Schreiner having been heard on the question of costs,

De Villiers, C.J.: My view is that the main question the parties came into Court to decide was whether or not this was a valid contract. There is a charge, a very serious charge, made in the plea to the effect that the defendant by wrongfully, unlawfully and fraudulently taking advantage of defendant's confidence in him as her adviser, got this document, and that its contents were not explained to her by him or understood by her. On this distinct charge the Court has found in favour of the plaintiff, and therefore the plaintiff must have his costs. Judgment will therefore be given for the plaintiff as indicated with costs, and judgment for the defendant on the claim in reconvention.

SUPREME COURT

MOOLMAN v. MOOLMAN AND ANOTHER. } 1903. Feb. 4th.

This was an action for divorce brought by Petrus Johannes Moolman against his wife, the first-named defendant, on the ground of her adultery with one Willem Adriaan Moolman, plaintiff's brother, the second-named defendant.

There had been a claim against Willem Adriaan Moolman for damages, but this claim was not now proceeded with. Plaintiff, in his declaration, stated that he was married to the first-named defendant in 1882, and there were seven children of the marriage, six of whom were still minors. He alleged that in August, 1901, his wife, while living apart from him, committed adultery with the second-named defendant, and on May 25, 1902, gave birth to a child, of which plaintiff was not the father. Plaintiff therefore claimed a decree of divorce against his wife, custody of the minor children, and forfeiture by the first-named defendant of the benefits of the marriage.

The plea did not admit the allegation of adultery, and put the plaintiff to proof thereof.

Mr. Searle, K.C., for plaintiff. Mr. Benjamin for the first defendant.

Mr. Benjamin said he came into Court merely on the questions of costs and custody of the children.

Mr. Searle called,

Petrus Johannes Moolman, the plaintiff, who said that he lived at the farm Graspan, in the Fraserburg district. The first-named defendant was his wife, and there were seven children of the marriage. The eldest was married, but the remaining six were minors, their ages being 14, 13, 11, 8, 6, and 3 years respectively. On May 8, 1901, witness was removed from his farm by the military authorities. He was taken first to Calvinia, then to Clanwilliam, and then to Malmesbury. He was not allowed to return to his farm until August 2, 1902. He had not seen his wife during the interval. Witness had a brother, Willem Adriaan Moolman, who lived about an hour and a half from witness's farm. Witness's wife and children were left on the farm when witness was removed by the military authorities. While he was at Malmesbury witness heard something about his wife, and when he came towards his farm a child was brought to him. When he came on his farm he saw his wife, and she admitted that the child was hers, and that Willem Adriaan Moolman was the father. Witness said to her, "Then I don't recognise you as my wife any longer." Witness and his wife after that lived in the same house for some time, but did not cohabit. Witness claimed the custody of all the children of the marriage, but was now willing that his wife should have two of the children, viz., Martha Maria, aged eight years, and Johanna Catherina, aged three years. Witness was married in community of property. At the time of their marriage his wife had £80, a horse, a chest of drawers, and some other articles. Witness was willing to give his wife for the support of herself and the two children mentioned, a school erf at Bramvlei, 400 sheep and goats, a cart and two horses and harness, a wagon and span of eight donkeys and harness, and her bedroom furniture. The value of the property he was willing to give his wife would be between £900 and £1,000.

Cross examined: Witness was not willing to give his wife the custody of the boy 14 years of age. The boy should still be at school, and besides, the boy was not willing to go to the mother.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Before witness was removed by the military he and his wife had not lived very well together. There had been trouble in regard to men, not witness's brother, but others.

Martha Helena Louw said that she was a daughter of the last witness, and was married in January last. She remembered her father being taken away from his farm by the military. That was on May 8, 1901, and he returned on August 2, 1902. Witness remained on the farm all the time he was away. On May 25, 1902, during her father's absence her mother gave birth to a child. Her father's brother was often at the farm during her father's absence, and her mother was at his farm for one or two days.

The Court granted a decree of divorce, plaintiff to have the custody of all the minor children, except Martha Maria and Johanna Catharina, of whom the defendant shall have the custody with liberty of access to the children on the part of either party at reasonable times and places, plaintiff to give to defendant for the maintenance of herself and the two children mentioned, the school erf at Bramvlei, 400 sheep and goats, a cart and pair of horses and harness, a wagon and span of eight donkeys and harness, and the bedroom suite; plaintiff to pay the costs of the action.

ALIE v. CARR, BROS. AND ASH. { 1903. Feb. 4th.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Acting Resident Magistrate for Cape Town in an action in which the plaintiffs sued the defendant for £10 9s. 7d., being balance of an account for goods sold and delivered as follows: June 11, £2 5s. 6d.; July 2, £7 9s. 5d.; August 2, £2 14s. 8d.; total, £12 9s. 7d.; by cash, November 21, £2; balance due, £10 9s. 7d. The principal evidence for the plaintiffs was that of Patrick George Thornton, who stated that he was traveller to the plaintiffs, and received the orders for June and July, some from defendant and some from men in his shop. Defendant told witness that he was selling his business. Witness did not remember the date. Defendant asked him to transfer his account to another man, which witness refused to do, and said that if defendant wished he would give the goods in his (defendant's) name. Defendant said "Yes," and witness commenced to supply the goods. Defendant himself paid witness £2 on account. He had never disputed the account, which had been rendered to him regularly. Some of the goods were delivered to the corner of Grey and Combrink-streets by defendant's orders, and some to defendant's shop, at 62, Hanover-street. For the defence Sheik Alie stated that he kept a shop at 62, Hanover-street, but he did not buy any goods from plaintiff in June and July. He sold his shop thirteen months ago to Izak Esau. He did not owe plaintiff a penny at that time, and he did not pay £2 on account to plaintiff in November. He did not tell the last witness to supply the other man for his account, nor did he say he would stand security for the same. The signature to the delivery book was not defendant's, but that of Izak Esau, who bought the shop. After witness sold the shop he had no transactions with the last witness. Izak Esau had left for Johannesburg four months ago. Witness did not live at 62, Hanover-street, now. Further evidence was called to show that the licence for 62, Hanover-street, for 1901, was taken out in the name of Sheik Alie, and for 1902 by Said Alie. It was stated, however, that in their register they had the same man down in 1901 as 1902.

The Magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiffs for £7 14s. 11d., and set forth the reasons for his judgment as follows: The books of the plaintiffs were produced, and the entries are in the name of the defendant for June and July, the item of August having been withdrawn by the plaintiff's attorney. Mr. Thornton, the traveller for plaintiffs, swears that he received orders from defendant and also from some of the men at defendant's shop, that defendant told him he was selling his business, and he wished to transfer the account to another man, which he refused to do, but said he would supply the other man with the goods, but to be debited to the defendant, to which the defendant agreed, and Mr. Thornton swears positively that defendant paid him £2 on account, with which he has been credited in the account at the back of the summons. The defendant denies all the allegations, and says that he never received the goods, that he had sold his business to one Izak Esau, and that the signatures in the delivery book are those of Izak Esau, which are signed in Indian, and that Izak is now in Johannesburg. I believed Mr. Thornton, who gave his evidence in a most straightforward manner, that the defendant did pay him £2 on account of the debt, and that the goods were ordered by defendant and some of his men in his shop, and that the goods were delivered as described, and I did not believe the defendant at all. It is my experience that men of the defendant's class, whenever a delivery note is signed by someone else than the person who ordered and bought the goods, the debt is generally denied, and everything else which is stated by the plaintiffs, and the individual who signed the delivery note has generally gone to Johannesburg or cannot be found. I am quite satisfied also that the licences taken out were in the name of the defendant, although the spelling may be different. It was not certainly taken out in the name of Izak Esau, to whom the defendant alleged he had sold his business, and under these circumstances, my judgment is for the plaintiffs for £7 14s. 11d., with costs.

Against this judgment the defendant now appealed.

Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for the appellant; Mr. Benjamin appeared for the respondent.

After hearing Mr. Searle, and without calling on Mr. Benjamin, the Court dismissed the appeal, with costs.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is impossible for the Court to disturb the judgment of the Magistrate. There was clear evidence before him on behalf of the plaintiffs that orders for the goods were given by the defendant and by some persons in his shop, and Thornton goes further and states that afterwards the defendant himself paid £2 on account. Now it is said that Thornton may not have been able to recognise the defendant, but upon this point also it is clear he had seen the defendant several times. It was not as if he had only seen the defendant casually, for he had seen him several times, communicated with him, and received money from him. As to the delivery of goods at other places than the shop at 62, Hanover-street, there is Thornton's direct evidence that the goods were delivered at these places by the express instructions of defendant, and as the Magistrate believed Thornton, the Court cannot disturb his decision. The appeal must therefore be refused, with costs.

BROWN v. McDONALD. { 1903. Feb. 4th.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Assistant Resident Magistrate at Vryburg in a case in which the plaintiff Brown sued one McDonald for the delivery of a certain cow, failing which, for its value, £20. From the record, it appeared that the plaintiff lost a cow on October 1, 1902, and afterwards a cow was discovered on the farm of one Smith, which plaintiff said was the one he had lost. Smith said he held the cow for one Featherstonehaugh, a conductor in the Repatriation Camp at Vryburg. Plaintiff interviewed defendant, as the head of the Repatriation Department thereat, and received from him a note to a Conductor Williams, saying that the cow was to be restored to him if it was not a bad case. This note was given to Williams, but the cow was not handed over to the plaintiff. The defendant was now sued for the return of the cow in his personal capacity, and admitted in the course of the case that the cow was still in his possession. No explanation was given to defendant as to why the cow was not returned to him. Several witnesses for the plaintiff swore positively as to the cow being branded with plaintiff's, his father's, and brother's marks. These three persons and a servant in their employ also identified the cow as the one which had been lost on October 1, 1902. For the defence, it was stated positively by several witnesses that the cow in question had been handed over to the Repatriation Department by the Army Service Corps on September 29, 1902, two days before the plaintiff lost his cow.

The Magistrate gave judgment for the defendant, and in his reasons for doing so, stated that he found that the cow in question had been handed over to the Repatriation Department by the Army Service Corps on September 29, 1902, and further, that no cause of action had been disclosed against defendant in his official capacity. On the merits of the case, he was satisfied that the cow was not in defendant's private possession, and therefore gave judgment in defendant's favour, with costs.

Against this decision plaintiff now appealed.

Mr. Upington appeared for the appellant; Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for the respondent.

After hearing Mr. Upington, and without calling on Mr. Searle, the Court gave judgment for respondent, and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Magistrate in his reasons for his judgment says: "After hearing all the evidence, I found that the cow in question was taken over at Vryburg from the Officer Commanding the 37th Company of the Army Service Corps, on 29th September, 1902, by the Repatriation Department, on account of the Transvaal Administration, and properly accounted for, and is now in the possession of the Transvaal Administration." The cow which the plaintiff lost was lost on the 1st of October, and if the statement of the witnesses for the defence is correct the cow could not be the same one that was lost by the plaintiff. Well, upon this point the Magistrate had the evidence of two witnesses, viz., Davies and Williams, and both of them swear to the identity of this cow as the cow which was taken over from the Army Service Corps on the 29th September. There is no doubt that the evidence of the plaintiff's own witnesses is in conflict with this testimony, but I think we should take the Magistrate's decision as final upon this point, he having heard the witnesses. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the further question as to whether, assuming the identity of the cow to have been proved, there would have been an action against the defendant in his individual capacity in respect to a cow claimed by the Repatriation Department. This raises an important question of law which it is not necessary not to consider. The decision proceeds upon the facts, and it is not clear that the Magistrate was wrong in holding that the cow, which was in the possession of the defendant, was the cow which came into his possession on the 29th of September, 1902, two days before the plaintiff lost his cow, and for these reasons the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

REX v. HILLIARD. { 1903. Feb. 4th.

Obstructing public thoroughfare —Sec. 5 of Act 27 of 1882— Prescription—Costs.

The appellant had been convicted by an Acting Resident Magistrate of having obstructed a public footpath in front of his shop by placing sundry goods thereon. Defendant pleaded that though the public had free access to this footpath he had acquired a prescriptive right to so use the said footpath and that he had so used it during some 22 years, the whole tenancy of the said shop.

Held, that the said user for 22 years gave the appellant no such prescriptive right and that, while the Court would give no opinion as to the proprietary rights of the owners of the said premises, over the said footpath, the appellant had been rightly convicted and that the appeal must be dismissed. As, however, the Court held the appeal not to be of a frivolous character they refused to make any order as to costs.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Cape Town in a case in which A. Hilliard was summoned for having contravened section 37 of the Cape Town Municipal Regulations by having on September 1, 1902, wrongfully and unlawfully placed or permitted to be placed on the public footway outside his premises in Church-square, Cape Town, 12 packing-cases, 13 large rolls of oil-cloth, and one hand-cart without permission in writing from the Corporation. Defendant's counsel at first objected, and excepted to the jurisdiction of the Court as a title to land was in dispute, but on the Court drawing attention to a decision of the Supreme Court, withdrew his objection. The evidence for the prosecution was to the effect that the diagrams showed the land in question to have been public property as far back as 1789. For the defence, George Smith stated that he had known the property in question for the last 50 years, and remembered a small wall and railing enclosing the property now in dispute. Inside this enclosure was a garden. The railing was removed more than 40 years ago. He knew that the defendant had occupied the premises for more than over 20 years, and the ground had not been enclosed during his occupancy. A. A. Jurgens gave evidence as to his having known the property for 60 years, and when he first knew it it was enclosed, and trees were growing inside the enclosure. Two or three of these trees still remained. Dr. Fuller's garden was in line with the property. The defendant, A. Hilliard, deposed to having occupied the premises for the past 22 or 23 years, and during that time the stoep had always been the same as it was now. He had only removed one small tree. There was a lawsuit about this property in Mr. Crosbie's time. Since then Mr. Van Zyl, the owner of the property, had planted the trees, and had not been interfered with, and witness had put up a verandah without interference by the Town Council. He had used the stoep for plasing packing-cases, etc., on. These did not prevent the public from using the stoep.

The Magistrate's reasons were as follows:

In this case defendant, Mr. Hilliard, was summoned for contravening Regulation No 37 of the Cape Town Municipality in that he did on the 1st September, 1902, wrongfully and unlawfully place, or permit to be placed on the public footway outside his premises in Church-square 12 packing-cases, 13 large rolls of oil-cloth, and one hand-cart, without the permission in writing from the Corporation. Defendant's counsel (Mr. Advocate Gardiner) admitted the fact of the goods being on the footway as alleged and proved, but set up a prescriptive right as a complete defence. It is clear from the evidence that as early as 1789 the property in question was public property according to documentary evidence, and had not been transferred or alienated since. Up to about 30 years ago this piece of ground, extending from defendant's shop wall to the curbstone on the Church-square side was enclosed from a time not ascertained. The enclosure was then removed, the shop lowered and levelled to the corner of Spin-street, and a pavement constructed and maintained by the owner or lessee, forming a continuous open space from Spin-street to 46 feet beyond defendant's premises to a projecting wall, and thereafter used by the public as a public footway ever since without any protest or restraint by the owner or occupier. It appears that during the last 22 or 23 years, from defendant's occupation, he had used the sidewalk at least once a week in the course of business in the manner complained of, and thereby interrupted the free passage of the public on such occasions, but it is evident that during the preceding 8 or 9 years the stoep had never been in any way obstructed to public use, consequently no prescriptive right was maintained during that period. The fact is established beyond doubt that the property in question is public property and used as a public footway for at least the last 30 years, according to the evidence of a defence witness. The defendant admitted that the public had the concurrent use of the property as a footway during his tenancy, that he never placed the cases there to prevent the public from going there, and never turned people off the stoep or did anything to test the validity of his right to use it. It appears that the defendant never actually asserted any prescriptive right; but what he did was merely done in the ordinary course of business. There is no evidence to show when and under what circumstances this piece of ground was enclosed, and whether or not the enclosure was removed because it was improperly constructed. We have it on record that as soon as this space was thrown open, it was utilised by the public as a side-walk, and is still being used as such. In my opinion defendant has failed to establish a prescriptive right, and even had he succeeded, it is doubtful whether it could override the Council's right to control such footways and open space under their regulations. In the case of Lawley v. The Town Council (No. 9 Juta, page 8), where the applicant sought to obtain an interdict restraining the Council from removing the signboard in front of their premises in Longmarket-street upon the ground that the same had been in existence for upwards of thirty years, the Chief Justice, in refusing the application, expressed the opinion that the property in the pavements and sidewalks was vested in the Council, and that in any event they had control over them, and that such control carried with it the right of control over all projections and over such footways or sidewalks. In the case (Town Council v. Maxwell) for contravention of the regulation under which defendant is charged, the Supreme Court, in confirming the conviction, decided that if the public had a right to use land as a street, then it came under the municipal regulation. In the case of the Queen v. Adams (10 Sheil, 756), relied on by counsel, defendant was convicted under the Police Offences Act for driving a wagon in what was alleged by defendant to be a private footway in Sir Lowry-street, Cape Town. The Chief Justice, in allowing the appeal, is reported to have said in effect that the defendant, having acquired a prescriptive right could not be found guilty under the Act, but added that it was quite possible there could have been some municipal regulation under which the appellant might have been convicted. In view of the above decisions, in so far as the principles are applicable to this case, the extensive powers vested in the Council for the public welfare in respect of footways and sidewalks for over fifty years, and realising the far-reaching and prejudicial effect a judgment in favour of defendant may have upon the public interest, I find the defendant guilty of the offence charged.

Mr. Gardiner for appellant. Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the Crown.

Mr. Gardiner said that the evidence should be really strong in order to establish actual ownership of the property in question, and he submitted that it was not necessary for him to go so far for the purpose of this Act as to show actual ownership. But they had for over thirty years used this property in the way charged, and a sort of servitude might be obtained even over a sidewalk. His case was that acts of ownership had been exercised over that property for over fifty years. The property was enclosed until 1872, then the railings were taken down, and trees had since been planted, a verandah had been erected, and the pavement had been kept in repair by the appellants. There was no adverse use against them on the part of the Council. The registered owner of the particular property was the Town Council, but the appellants had acquired a prescriptive title by exercising the rights of owners as tenants.

[[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing this regulation was not ultra vires, was there not a contravention?]

Mr. Gardiner said he would not say that the public had no right of access. He afterwards contended that this particular property was not a side walk, and it was not a stoep which the regulations had power to deal with. As it was a criminal charge, there was sufficient evidence of title to justify the defendant being given the benefit of the doubt.

Mr. Schreiner briefly addressed the Court in support of the conviction.

De Villiers, C.J.: At this stage it is not advisable to express any opinion that might prejudice any case which might be afterwards brought as to the ownership of this property, or as to any right that the applicant might have to put these packages on the pavement. For the purpose of such an action, I should think that the owners of the property, Messrs. Van Zyl, should be the parties. Nothing that the Court can now say will affect any case that may be afterwards brought, and for the present we have only to deal with the case as it came before the Magistrate. The applicant was charged with a contravention of the 37th regulation of the Municipality, prohibiting the placing of goods on any "public street, square, lane, or upon any stoep, pavement, or sidewalk." I suppose we might take it that the "stoep, pavement, or sidewalk," here referred to is such stoep, pavement, or sidewalk as the public has access to. My opinion is that, upon the evidence, the public had a right of access to the stoep in question. It is said that the property had been enclosed up to 30 years ago, but there is no evidence as to when this enclosure began; there is no evidence at all events that this enclosure existed for 30 years before it was removed, and that in that way the owners of the adjoining property had acquired a right by prescription to the property itself. That is not alleged. But then it is alleged that there was such an enclosure up to 30 years ago. Then it was moved, and for a time the public had free access to this stoep, until Mr. Hilliard acquired a lease of the premises, and from the time he acquired a lease of the premises, that is 22 years ago, he was in the habit of placing packages on the stoep when he chose to do so. But in my opinion, that is not sufficient to prove a prescriptive right, either by way of servitude or by way of ownership. The public still had access to the stoep, and although there is no one who did complain of these packages being placed there, still the mere fact that the packages were placed there for a period of over 22 years did not give the applicant any servitude or any right of ownership. The Magistrate, therefore, in my opinion, was right, upon the evidence before him, in convicting the appellant, and it will be now for the applicant, in communication with the owners of the property, if he is advised that he can establish a right, to have this whole matter threshed out, and nothing that is said in the present case will affect the decision of any future case. Upon the evidence before the Magistrate and now before the Court, I think the only course is to confirm the conviction.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

Mr. Schreiner asked for costs.

Mr. Gardiner argued that the appeal had in no way been a frivolous one, and that no order as to costs should be made.

The Chief Justice said there had been cases in which the Court had allowed costs, but they had been cases in which appeals had been rather of a frivolous nature. He thought, however, that it was not possible to say that the appeal in the present case was of a frivolous nature, and the ordinary course would be followed of making no order as to costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.

REVIEW.

REX V. WISEMAN AND ANOTHER. { 1903. Feb. 5th.

Spliting of charge.

Buchanan, J., said that a case had come before him, as Judge of the week, in which Joseph Wiseman and Dorah Wiseman were charged under what was called the Immorality Act. In the one case they were charged together with having kept, managed, or assisted in the management, and knowingly received a share of the money taken in a brothel. On the evidence they were properly convicted and sentenced. Immediately thereafter the man Joseph Wiseman was charged as a separate offence with knowingly living wholly or partly on the earnings of prostitution. It was clear it was the same charge, and the Magistrate ought not to have split the charge into two in this way. One conviction must be quashed. The woman was sentenced to three months' imprisonment with hard labour, and that would be confirmed. The man was sentenced to three months imprisonment with hard labour on the first charge, and on the second charge to eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labour, to take effect at the expiration of the former sentence, and to receive fifteen lashes. The sentence on the more serious charge would be allowed, and the sentence of three months' imprisonment quashed.

ADMISSION.

Mr. Upington moved for the admission of Benjamin Arthur Tindall as an advocate.

Order granted and the oaths administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

VAN REENEN V. ISAACS.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent.

Mr. Wilkinson appeared for the defendant.

Mr. Buchanan said that this matter stood over from Tuesday, so as to enable an answering affidavit to be filed to defendant's affidavit. That affidavit had been made and filed, and as the defendant made continual reference to his agent an affidavit had been obtained from that agent. In this matter a provisional order of sequestration was granted on January 16 last upon a summons, which set forth that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff in the sums of £100 and £150 on two promissory notes, with interest due, for which judgment was obtained on April 12, 1902, and on which, on September 5, 1902, a writ of execution was taken out, to which a return of nulla bona had been made.

Mr. Wilkinson read the affidavit of the defendant, in which the latter said that during the last three years he had bought a number of lots of ground, to the value of £15,450 or thereabouts, and on one of the properties he had expended £1,100. That property had been sold for £3,500, which, to the best of his belief, left him a profit of £900. The price of the property had been paid to his agent. Other properties sold gave a profit of £475, which money, to the best of defendant's knowledge, had been paid to his agent, he (defendant) never having received any part thereof. For the property which he held he had been offered £14,450, but he valued it at £16,000. The bonds on the property amounted to £10,900, leaving him a credit balance of £3,550, taking the value at the offers that had actually been made to him. To the best of his knowledge and belief the bonds of £10,900 were his only debts, except a few small debts, not exceeding £200. He had applied to his agent and tried to get the documents connected with his property from him, so that he might sell part of it and pay his debts, but his agent had always refused to let him have them. He also alleged that his agent had received and collected on his behalf a large sum in rents and also a sum of £1,000, and he had not yet received that. There was also a large sum of money belonging to him in his agent's hands arising from the leases and from the sale of the properties mentioned. He had instituted an action against his agent for a proper account, and had received from him a statement purporting to show him to be indebted to his agent. Defendant alleged that his agent had omitted from this account large sums of money owing him. As to Van Reenen's claim, he said that instead of owing plaintiff the latter owed him a small sum, and he said that Van Reenen had admitted that.

A replying affidavit made by the plaintiff was read, in which the latter denied defendant's allegations as to his owing him money. He also said that at various times since the judgment had been taken out the defendant had begged him (plaintiff) to allow the matter to stand over and had never set up any claim. When plaintiff wanted him to admit his liability in a document drawn up by an attorney, defendant had said that his word was enough and had refused to sign such a document. The statement that plaintiff had admitted his liability was, he said, an absolute falsehood.

In an affidavit A. W. Steer said that he had acted as defendant's agent up to October last, and considerable moneys had passed through his hands on account of the defendant, for which accounts had been rendered from time to time. The statement in defendant's affidavits as to his not receiving those moneys or any part thereof was an absolute falsehood. In deponent's opinion the value placed by defendant on his properties was excessive. With regard to defendant's allegations that his only debts besides the bonds did not exceed £200, in deponent's own knowledge defendant was heavily indebted in excess of that amount. Deponent had handed to plaintiffs attorneys in November last all the documents in his possession connected with the property, except one on which he had a lien. He had duly accounted for all rents received by him on defendant's account from his several tenants, and the whole amount had been paid by him to defendant in cash during his agency. Deponent denied having received the £1,000 mentioned by defendant. When the summons was issued calling upon him to furnish a full and true account, deponent had put at the inspection of the defendant's attorneys all the vouchers held by him, and had tendered delivery of the said vouchers, but no further action had been taken by the defendant in connection therewith. Defendant was indebted to deponent in the sum of £1,050 2s., of which sum £250 was secured by a mortgage bond.

Mr. Wilkinson said he opposed the application to have the order made final on the ground that the defendant had established, at least in his own opinion, his solvency by the particulars given in his affidavit. Counsel took it that if the solvency of a debtor was clearly established the Court would not take the extreme measure of making the order final, when the result would be the absolute ruin of a man who, if the statements in his affidavit were correct, had been for two or three years carrying on a successful business with regard to the buying and selling of land.

De Villiers, C.J.: If you say that an adjournment of a fortnight might lead to a satisfactory settlement of this, then that would be the best course, because it does seem a pity to sequestrate an estate when a man may have a large balance to his credit.

Mr. Wilkinson suggested that the adjournment be for a month, as a fortnight might be too short a time for the purpose of advertising the sale. He also pointed out a great difficulty that had arisen through the arrest of defendant on Wednesday night upon a Magistrate's Court judgment for a debt of some £60. This was to be paid in monthly instalments of £10 each, and a few days ago the first instalment of £10 had been tendered to the attorneys of the plaintiff in the case in question, but refused, and yesterday it had been again tendered and refused, whereupon defendant was immediately arrested.

Buchanan, J., said that the chances were that the creditor who arrested him ran a very great risk.

Mr. Wilkinson said that it appeared that unless otherwise provided in cases of Magistrate's Court judgments the instalments should be paid into court, and not either to the creditor himself or the creditor's attorney. He mentioned this matter of the arrest to show the difficulties that might arise if the adjournment were made for a fortnight only.

A postponement for a fortnight was allowed, and several other cases in which Isaacs was the defendant, and in which provisional sentences were asked, were also postponed for a fortnight, as well as a case in which Isaacs was the plaintiff.

HEATLIE V. CAISSE.

Mr. Benjamin asked that this matter be allowed to stand over for a fortnight.

Postponement allowed.

BROAD V. JOCHELSOHN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved that the provisional order for the sequestration of defendant's estate as insolvent be discharged.

Provisional order discharged.

RIDDELL V. CLEWS.

Mr. De Waal moved that the provisional order for the sequestration of defendant's estate as insolvent be superseded.

Provisional order superseded.

GARLICK AND OTHERS V. LEVINE.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate as insolvent.

Order granted as prayed.

STOLTENHOFF V. BRINK.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved that the defendant's estate be sequestrated as insolvent. The provisional order was granted by the Chief Justice in Chambers on January 27 last.

Order granted.

ASPINALL V. HOWARD.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £21 15s., value received.

Provisional sentence granted.

HEINEMANN V. RIPSTON.

Mr. C. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £450, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. from May 28, 1902, and also that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable. The bond had become due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked for judgment under Rule 329d for £28 1s., less £13 10s. received on account, due for money lent and advanced.

Provisional sentence and judgment granted as prayed, and the property specially hypothecated declared executable.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

KELLER AND OTHERS V. RAPEMEYER. { 1903. Feb. 5th.

Mr. Gardiner moved, under Rule 329d, on a claim that the defendant forthwith transfer to each of the respective plaintiffs their respective shares in a farm. Costs de bonis propriis were also asked for.

Judgment granted as prayed.

MITSCHE V. MITCHELL.

Mr. C. de Villiers moved, under Rule 329d, for judgment for £48 10s., for board and lodging.

Judgment granted as prayed.

SAPIERI V. MALGAS.

Mr. Buchanan moved, under Rule 319, on a declaration for judgment in default of plea, for the transfer of certain property bought by plaintiff from the defendant, the plaintiff tendering the purchase price.

Judgment granted as prayed.

BOLUS BROS. V. JACOBSOHN.

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the plaintiff in this matter, and said that he understood that a communication had been made to the Registrar by the defendant to the effect that he was too poor to enter an appearance. In addition, counsel was not quite sure whether this was a matter in which he could ask for judgment under Rule 329d, and therefore it might be better that it should stand over. Judgment was asked for £820 14s. 9d., being the amount of loss and damage sustained by the plaintiffs on the resale of two Coronation Syndicate shares, which the plaintiffs bought at the defendant's request, and which purchase was wrongfully and unlawfully repudiated by the defendant.

De Villiers, C.J.: I think you ought to lead evidence. It is a case which must go to trial.

The matter was allowed to stand over.

REHABILITATIONS.

Mr. Russell moved for the rehabilitation of Paul Drescher. The estate was compulsorily sequestrated on March 13, 1901, by the Eastern Districts Court. All the claims of creditors, amounting to £660, had been paid in full, leaving a balance in favour of the insolvent. In one paragraph of his report the trustee referred to certain payments as having been an undue preference.

De Villiers, C.J.: There cannot be an undue preference if the creditors are paid in full.

An order was granted as prayed.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the rehabilitation of Nicolaas Albertus Koelenberg, whose estate was surrendered on March 26, 1898, when the schedules showed liabilities, £256, and assets, £142. Debts amounting to £70 4s. 7d. only were proved, and the assets realised £92 10s., so that the creditors claiming against the estate were paid in full.

An order was granted as prayed.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BLAKE v. BLOMSON. { 1903, Feb. 5th.

This was an application to have a rule nisi made absolute.

The applicant's petition set forth that he was a contractor carrying on business in the village of Piquetberg, and he entered into a contract with the respondent, Herman Blomson, to make certain alterations and additions to his premises for the sum of £700, payments on account of which were to be made from time to time. There was some delay in the work owing, applicant alleged, to the fault of the respondent, and when the work was finished there was some dispute as to the amount to be paid for certain extra work which had been performed. Applicant alleged that there were £300 due to him, and he offered to hand over the keys of a certain bar and billiard room on the premises provided the respondent gave security for that amount, so that they could go to arbitration to fix the exact sum due. Respondent did not accept this offer, and it was alleged that he wrongfully and unlawfully upon receipt of the letter broke into the bar and billiard room and took possession thereof, thereby depriving applicant of the possession to which he was entitled as his lien until the money due was paid. It was, therefore, sought to have respondent restrained from continuing in such unlawful possession, and ordering him to quit and forthwith deliver up possession pending an action to be instituted.

The respondent, Herman Blomson, in his affidavit denied that there was any delay on his part, and he also said that the claim of applicant for £300 was excessive in respect of the extra work done. He admitted his liability for a certain amount, and stated his willingness to go to arbitration as to the amount as provided in the contract. He put in a deed of submission to arbitration, which had been signed by him on January 26 last. He also said that he had entered into possession of the bar and billiard room with the full consent of the applicant. He was quite prepared to abide by anything awarded by the arbitrators.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the applicant. Mr. Benjamin for the respondent.

After hearing counsel in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: At this stage it is difficult to decide the question of fact as to whether there was any agreement between the parties with regard to the taking possession of the premises. The probabilities, however, appear to me to be that the respondent did take forcible possession, and the fact that the applicant still possesses the keys seems to show that he had no intention of parting with the possession of the premises. The Court will, therefore, make the rule absolute, but direct the possession of the premises to be restored to the respondent upon his giving security to the satisfaction of the Magistrate of the district for the sum of £300. It is possible, however, that there was this arrangement, and that there was no forcible possession, and therefore on the question of costs the respondent should be given a chance to recover these if that should be the case. The question of costs will therefore stand over.

ARDERNE V. THE TREASURER GENERAL.

Stamps Act—Noting of protest by master of ship—Sea Protest.

On the 8th of September, 1902, the master of a ship which had just arrived in Table Bay, signed a document in the presence of a notary public notifying his intention to execute a sea protest. On the 25th of November a formal Notarial protest was executed by and in presence of the Notary.

Held, that the Sea Protest was executed on the 25th of November and that as the document bore an adhesive stamp for 10s. and was tendered for execution on that day, it was not subject to treble stamp duty.

This was an application upon notice given to the respondent, calling upon him to show cause why he should not be ordered to cancel the stamp of ten shillings affixed to a sea protest of the British barque Glencairn, and why he should not pay the costs of the application.

The affidavit of the applicant, H. R. Arderne, stated that on November 25, 1902, the master and several members of the crew of the British barque Glencairn called at his office and executed a sea protest, to which a stamp of 10s. was, in the terms of Act, No. 13 of 1870, schedule No. 5, affixed, and the same was tendered on November 25 to Gordon Cloete, Superintendent of Stamps, Licences, and Excise branch of the Treasury for cancellation. The said Gordon Cloete declined to cancel the said stamp, alleging that the sea protest was insufficiently stamped, stating that in doing so he was acting upon the instructions of the respondent.

The replying affidavit of Gordon Cloete was read, in which he said that he refused to cancel the sea protest on the ground that the first note of protest was executed on September 8, 1902, and that the extended protest should have been stamped with a stamp of the value of £2 10s., in accordance with the provisions of Section 14 of Act No. 3 of 1864. He went on to say that it was the custom in fixing the date of execution of a sea protest for the purposes of the said section to take the date of the first entry, note, entry or declaration as the date of execution of the protest, the extended protest, and the note of entry forming one instrument for stamping purposes.

H. R. Arderne, in a further affidavit, said that Mr. Cloete was entirely in error in stating that it was the custom in fixing the date of execution of the sea protest for the purposes of Section 14 of Act No. 3 of 1864 to take the date of the note of protest as the date of the execution of the sea protest. This statement would be amply borne out by a reference to the protocols of the notaries, C. A. Fairbridge, Edward Hull, J. R. Reid, J. S. Merrington, and others filed of record in the office of the Registrar of the Court. Deponent had been in practice in Cape Town as a notary for over 20 years, during which period very many sea protests had been prepared and executed before him. These sea protests had in the majority of cases been executed beyond the period required by the above section for the affixing of the stamp assuming that the date of the note of protest was taken as the proper date from which to reckon such period, but in no case had a fine been asked or sought to be imposed. Deponent submitted that all the officers appointed by the Government to cancel stamps on notarial deeds had taken the date of the execution of the sea protest as the proper date from which to reckon the period for the purpose of the said section. Mr. Cloete was the first gentleman appointed to cancel stamps who had taken up the present attitude in regard to the stamping of sea protests. The sea protest was not a continuation of the note of protest. They were separate and distinct documents.

The affidavits of several attorneys in Cape Town and Port Elizabeth were read, supporting the contentions of the applicant as to the custom in regard to the stamping of sea protests.

H

. J. A. Reid deposed that he was an attorney-at-law and notary public, practising in Cape Town, and was the senior partner of the firm of J. H. Reid and Nephew. A considerable number of sea protests had been executed before him, and it had been the custom for some years past, in stamping the extended protest, to take the date of the first note of protest as the date of the execution of the extended protest, and the deeds executed before him had been stamped accordingly.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the applicant. Mr. Evans for the respondent.

After hearing counsel,

De Villiers, C.J.: It is common cause in the present case that the document in question is a sea protest, and that as such it would require a 10s. stamp if tendered within 21 days after its execution, that it would require a £1 stamp, if tendered after 21 days and before 42 days expire, and that it would be liable to a stamp of £1 10s., that is treble the original stamp, if tendered after 42 days and before 62 days had expired. Now the question to be decided in this case is, was this document tendered within 21 days? The date of the instrument is November 25, 1902, and it was tendered for cancellation on November 25, 1902. If, therefore, it was executed on the date on which it purported to be executed the stamp of 10s. was sufficient. But it is said on behalf of the Crown that, although this instrument purports to be executed on November 25, the date of execution must be taken to be September 8, because on that date the master of the ship had notified to the notary his intention of making a protest. Well, on a reference to that document itself, which has been produced before the Court, it is seen that that document is not in any sense a notarial protest. It is simply a document executed by the master, not certified to in any way by the notary, and the master simply gives notice of his intention to protest. In my opinion, that is not in any sense of the word a sea protest. The term sea protest implies that there has been a protest of some kind, a protest by or before a notary, and here no protest whatever has been made until November 25, when this document was executed. It is said that if there has been a wrong practice up to the present time, that is not a reason why that wrong practice should continue. I quite agree with that argument, but the fact that for nearly 40 years notaries have been in the habit of treating noting of protest as not being a formal protest would go very far to show what the real effect of noting of protest is. In my opinion, the noting of the protest by the master does not constitute the formal sea protest which requires a stamp, that it is not a notarial document in any way, that it is not necessary that it should be a notarial document, and that it is not a protest by a notary which would justify the Court in holding that stamp duty is payable in respect of the document in question. The application, therefore in my opinion, must be granted with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

MCBEAN V. SOUTHERN LIFE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. Russell, on behalf of the defendant, moved for leave to sign judgment against the plaintiffs for not proceeding with their action, and also asked for costs of the present application.

Order granted as prayed.

FORBES AND OTHERS V. TIMBER SUPPLY CO.

This was an application for leave to appeal to the Privy Council.

Mr. Schreiner (with him Mr. Searle) said that the only question that arose practically was in what way the Court would direct that the judgment would in the meanwhile be dealt with. Judgment had been given in the Court below for £7,000. The defendants were now asking for leave to appeal so as to keep open their rights, though it did not necessarily follow that the appeal would be prosecuted.

Sir H. Juta, for the respondents, said his instructions were to consent on the usual conditions, but it seemed to him that this was only a side issue to obtain an expression of opinion from the Court as to what would be the amount which out of the £7,000 would have to be distributed.

The Court granted leave to appeal, and suspended execution on the payment of £7,000 on the liquidators, giving security to the satisfaction of a judge of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia to abide the judgment of the Privy Council and the costs of the appeal.

LEIBBRANDT V. THE TOWN COUNCIL OF CAPE TOWN. { 1903. Feb. 5th. „ 6th.

Trespass—Interdict—Town Council—Act 26 of 1893, Sec. 138—Compensation.

The Town Council of C. had entered upon applicant's property for the purpose of constructing certain drains. They were willing to pay compensation for any damage done, when the work should have been completed, but not before. Applicant now sought to have a rule nisi which had been granted, interdicting the Council from trespassing on applicant's land made absolute.

Held, that as the Council was justified in its action by Sec. 138 of Act 26 of 1893 and as it was a responsible body well able to pay such damages as might be awarded to applicant, the rule must be discharged.

This was an application to have a certain rule nisi restraining the respondent Council from trespassing on the applicant's property made absolute.

The applicant's affidavit showed that she was the owner of certain premises in Jameson-street, and that the Council were constructing a large brick drain along the said street. The Council had given her notice that they proposed to construct a drain across her premises in order to carry away the storm water, but they had already certain land near by where they could construct the drain. The Council's employes had already trespassed on her premises in order to commence the excavations.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for applicant. Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for respondent.

Mr. Schreiner said that the Council's position was that section 133 of the Act of 1893 empowered them to construct sewers and so forth as should be necessary from time to time so as to effectually drain the municipality, that due notice was given to the applicant of their intentions, and that no objection was raised until some time afterwards. The Council contended that the works proposed were not calculated to impair, but rather improve, the value of the applicant's property, and that they would be prepared to pay such compensation for any injury or damage done as the applicant was entitled to. Besides, this drain would go underground and would replace a ditch on the surface.

Sir H. Juta said that there were two points that he wished to bring before the Court. He maintained that this section gave the Council no power to expropriate land. According to his learned friend's arguments, if he had a piece of property in Cap Town, and the Town Council wanted to run a sewer through it, they could take up as much of his land as they chose, only paying for the damage, not expropriation.

[Buchanan, J.: That would generally come under costs. It is only another way of doing the same thing.]

Sir H. Juta said the Council had got clauses dealing with expropriation, but this was not an expropriation clause, and therefore it did not deal with any new sewerage works and entitle them to go and cut up any person's land. What about all the months when the plaintiff would not be able to use the land owing to the works proceeding?

[Buchanan, J.: That would come under the compensation.]

Sir H. Juta said that was not how the Council read the clause. They regarded it as a clause simply for the payment of damages. They said that the applicant's property would be improved by the sewer and they would have everything nicely filled up again, and that she could use it for building purposes and where, then, was the damage done? Their position was not that they were going to pay, or that they were bound to pay one penny for all the time that the applicant was kept out of possession. They had no right to go and take private property to make a sewer across it. If they wanted to do that they wanted an expropriation power, just as the Government or any private railway would to lay two rails across a person's land.

[Buchanan, J.: If she suffers damage by the work being done she is entitled to compensation.]

Sir H. Juta: That is not their view. The Council must also have right of access to the sewer for maintenance. Then how, I ask, is the applicant to build on the land. Are we going to have arbitration proceedings every time the Council wants to inspect the drain? I submit that this particular clause was never intended to apply to cases where new sewers were being laid through private property.

[Buchanan, J., said he would take time to consider his judgment.

Postea (February 6th).

Buchanan, J., in giving judgment, said: This is an application to make absolute a rule nisi which was granted interdicting the Town Council of Cape Town from trespassing on the property of the applicant, Mrs. Leibrandt. The Town Council now justify what they intend to do under the 153rd section of their Municipal Act, which provides that where the Council find it necessary to cause sewers, drains, and pipes to be made or laid for the purposes of the Municipality, they may, if needful, carry such sewers, drains, pipes, etc., through and across private lands or beneath or against private buildings, and make compensation for any damage done, which compensation shall, if not mutually agreed upon, be settled by arbitration. In this case the applicant says that no agreement has been come to between her and the Corporation as to the compensation to be paid. The Corporation contend that under this section they are entitled to carry out their works, and afterwards, when the works are completed, and when the damage done can be correctly ascertained, they will pay compensation. There are two principles generally adopted by the Legislature when entrusting powers to public bodies affecting private property. They generally lay down that the interest of the private individual must give way to the public interest, but they safeguard this by the rule that where private interests have suffered, due compensation is to be made for any injury caused. These principles have been regarded in the case of the Cape Town Municipal Act. In this case the persons who are going to do the injury are a responsible body, and can well pay for any injury which may be done at any time, either before or after the injury is done; and thus there is no risk run by the applicant of not getting compensation. It is true that the section in question does not in express terms give the Corporation authority to enter before the question of compensation is settled, as is given to the Government in the Railway Acts, but after careful consideration, I think that by implication this section gives a similar power. It says that compensation is to be made for any damage done. Now until the work is completed, it is not easy, even if not impossible, to ascertain exactly what damage may be done by the proposed work. As I said before, the applicant is quite secured in having a responsible body against which she can recover, while the amount to be paid cannot be satisfactorily settled until after the work is done. No doubt, the Corporation wish to restrict the damage to such damage as may ultimately result to the property after the whole work is done; but I think Sir Henry Juta is right in contending that the applicant is entitled to any damage which she may suffer through the work being done, whether suffered while the work was being done or ultimately. Only that the amount of such damage can be better ascertained when the work is completed. Therefore, I think that the Corporation was entitled to enter upon the property and do the work, and then, when the work is completed, to either agree with the applicant as to the amount to be paid, or, if the parties cannot agree, to refer the matter to arbitration, and let the arbitrators settle the damage suffered by the applicant by the invasion of her private rights. Under these circumstances, I think the rule nisi granted in the case must be discharged, with costs.

SAACKS BROS. V. RONDEBOSCH MUNICIPALITY. { 1903. Feb. 5th.

Municipal regulations—Sanitation.

Applicants called upon the Municipal Council of R. to show cause why they should not be ordered to pass and approve of plans for certain 22 cottages which the applicants wished to build on a certain piece of land measuring 180 by 200 feet which was their property. The Municipal Council objected to the erection of so many cottages on a small piece of land on the ground that they would be necessarily insanitary, unless one access was given for necessary sanitary purposes to the back of these cottages. The applicants were willing to provide a 6 foot passage but nothing more.

Held, that the Council had not acted unreasonably in refusing to approve of the plans, and that the Court therefore would not interfere with the exercise of the powers vested in them by the legislature.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., moved on behalf of the applicants, who are builders, for an order directing the Rondebosch Municipality to pass certain plans which they had sumitted to the Council. Mr. Schreiner, K.C., appeared for the respondents

The applicant's affidavit set forth that they submitted to the Council for their approval plans of nine cottages and a shop in Duinefontein-road, and twelve cottages facing a road running parallel therewith, and that for sometime they heard nothing further from the Council about the plans. Subsequently, after certain negotiations, they received a letter from the Council stating that they required a road 20 feet wide running on the north and south of the property, or one in the centre, instead of the lane 6 feet wide shown on the plan, and a 20 feet road running east and west, and connected with the other 20 feet road, so as to give access for the sanitary carts to call and discharge their duties. The Council also intimated that, unless the said roads were constructed, they would not undertake to carry out any sanitary services. The applicants said that the plans showed proper access to the property by a 6 feet cemented passage way in the centre of the block, and that such access was in excess of the requirements of Cape Town and other municipalities. Considerable open space was provided for each cottage in excess of the requirements of the Cape Town regulations, which were very stringent on this point. In the event of the adoption of a proper drainage system, which was in contemplation, the roads which were proposed by the Council would be of no use whatever.

The affidavit filed on behalf of the Council set forth that the plans were rejected for sanitary reasons, and the plans had been taken away, to be re-submitted with amendments. The roads required by the Council would give the necessary facilities for dealing with the refuse from the property. The plans submitted by the applicants showed that the houses which they proposed to erect were designed in such a way as to give an extremely narrow width to each house. It was also pointed out by the Council that there had been an outbreak of typhoid fever in the vicinity of the property.

Sir H. Juta said the Council, by not expressing their approval or disapproval within the time laid down by their own regulations, were estopped from raising any objection to the plans. The regulations were perfectly clear that within fourteen days of receiving notice, plans, sections, and schedules, they must either approve or disapprove of the plans, and if they did not disapprove within fourteen days, they should be deemed by these regulations to have sanctioned such plans, sections, and schedules. He had been through the regulations from A to Z, and there was not a word to show that the Council could insist on a road being constructed so that the sanitary cart could go to the back door, or the back yard, or wherever the refuse may be.

Two points have to be considered in this case. (1) Whether the Council have not by not objecting within 14 days estopped themselves from objecting now. The Council have no regulation providing that I must make a road to enable them to bring their carts to my back door, and that is my second point.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C.: In reference to this case, see sections 47 and 96 of Act 20 of 1890. Clark v. Town Council of Cape Town (4 Sheil, 42). Heynes v. Rondebosch Municipality (11 Shiel 792). In that case the same defence was set up as in the present case. People have no right to put up a number of cottages without any sanitary conveniences. We do not say that you must make roads, but we do say that if you put up small cottages, you must give access to the sanitary authorities. It is quite possible that there may be worse places than these cottages, but I submit that this Court will support the Council in its action. It is absurd to say that because 14 days had elapsed before the Council objected that they could not thereafter object. A municipal body must be allowed a certain amount of discretion, and unless mala fides can be shown in the exercise of this discretion, the Court will not interfere.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): The Municipality does not object to these places. The houses are not said to be insanitary; but the Municipality want a road of 22 feet wide that the sanitary men may not spill stuff. The case of Clarke v. Town Council of Cape Town is not in point. In that case the house was insanitary. Here the only objection is as to access to the houses. There is no bona fide objection as to the building itself. Any typhoid fever which may exist in the neighbourhood can be traced to the washhouse of the Municipality. As to the second point urged on behalf of the defendants, if the Town Council has once approved of these buildings, it cannot afterwards withdraw its approval.

Buchanan, J.: This is an application calling upon the Rondebosch Municipal Council to show cause why they should not be ordered to pass and approve of plans for 22 cottages, which the applicants wish to build upon a piece of land, some 180 feet by 200 feet, situated between Duinefontein-road and another road in the Rondebosch Municipality. The Government of this country have vested local bodies with the control and regulation of their different Municipalities, and have given them certain powers. The Rondebosch Municipality under the Act have the power to regulate building and sanitary matters within the Municipality. The Act also allows them to make regulations for carrying out these purposes, and regulations have been duly passed. Under these regulations application was made to the Council to sanction the erection of certain cottages. The applicants allege now that as their plans submitted to the Council were not disapproved of within the fourteen days mentioned in the regulation, the consent of the Council must be taken as implied. If that be so, and the consent of the Council has thus been given, there is no necessity for the application calling upon the Council to show cause why they should not give their consent. But I take it on the affidavits that this question does not now arise, as it is not clear that the fourteen days mentioned have expired. It is stated positively on the one side that after the plans were first lodged they were taken back for amendment and then returned, and that fourteen days had not expired between then and the notice of disapproval of the plans. Now a Council or public body must not act unreasonably in the exercise of the powers entrusted to them for public purposes, nor may they act on improper motives in refusing to give their consent in cases like this. The question we have to consider is whether or not the Council was unreasonable in refusing its assent to the plans, or has been actuated by improper motives. A case has been decided in this court in which the Municipality were held entitled to prevent the cutting up of land within the Municipality for building purposes in such a way as to interfere with the due sanitation of the buildings which might be erected upon small lots of land. In this case the applicants do not wish to cut up the land into small lots for building purposes. The Municipal Council of Rondebosch, in the exercise of the powers vested in them for securing the welfare and well-being of the inhabitants, say that the building of a number of small cottages on a small piece of land would necessarily be insanitary unless due access were given for necessary purposes to the back of these cottages. Some of these cottages, it has been pointed out, would only have a 14-foot frontage altogether, and it will be necessary to get to the back of these for the purpose of sanitary removals. The Council say, "We will not object to your crowding the property to this extent if you will give us a proper road to enable our carts to get to the back," but the applicants object to this and say, "We will only give a 6-foot passage." I only go into these details to show whether there was such unreasonableness on the part of the Council as to justify the Court in granting the order, and I cannot say that the Council has acted unreasonably in refusing to approve of the plans. No improper, sordid, or any other irregular motives are imputed. As there is no want of bona fides, the Court cannot under these circumstances interfere with the Council in the exercise of the powers vested in them by the legislative authority to protect the interests of the inhabitants. The application will therefore be refused.

[Applicants' Attorneys: Tredgold, McIntyre and Bisset; Respondents' Attorneys: Reid and Nephew.]

DE KOCK V. BAILEY.

Mr. Russell appeared for the applicant De Kock in this matter, and asked leave to withdraw the election petition filed by the applicant against the return of Mr. Abe Bailey as member of the Legislative Assembly for the district of Barkly West. Applicant now confessed that he was not in a position to deny the qualifications of the respondent for election as a member. He therefore desired to withdraw his election petition, and said he was willing to pay all costs incurred.

Mr. Schrener, K.C., who with Sir Henry Juta, K.C., and Mr. Benjamin, appeared for the respondent, consented to the application.

Buchanan, J.: Of course there is no collusion.

Mr. Schreiner said there was not, and he pointed out that while the Court had power to direct that a rule nisi be issued calling upon all concerned to show cause why the application should not be granted that was not necessary here. It was simply a question of qualification upon which the petition had been filed and no improper conduct was alleged against the respondent.

The application was granted, applicant to pay all costs incurred.

SUPREME COURT

TROMP V. BROWN. { 1903. Feb. 6th.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Fraserburg in a case in which the present respondent, Brown, sued Tromp for the return of certain eleven Africander sheep, or their value, £11. In 1901 Brown was employed by Tromp as his overseer on his farm, and there was also a shepherd there by the name of Jefta Witbooi. In September, 1901, Tromp was sentenced to a period of imprisonment by a military court at Fraserburg, and was sent away, leaving Brown and one Solomon van Schalkwyk to superintend his farm business. During his absence the shepherd, Witbooi, left his service, and before doing so he demanded his stock, which were running with those of his master. Neither Tromp nor Witbooi had any specific ear mark or any other mark distinguishing their animals, and in the presence of Brown, Van Schalkwyk and Mrs. Tromp, Witbooi picked out his sheep and goats from the kraal, and they were satisfied that the animals were his property. Thereafter Brown made an exchange with Witbooi, giving him a cart for ten sheep and one goat. Witbooi took the cart and left, while Brown left the sheep and goat with those of his master. On the return of Tromp he was informed of the transaction of Brown and Witbooi, and he then told Brown that seven of the sheep and the goat were his property, and stolen from him by Witbooi, and he demanded them back. At the same time he had Witbooi arrested and charged with the crime of theft. Brown, believing his master left the sheep with those of Tromp, who had afterwards taken the other three sheep as well. In the meantime Witbooi awaited his trial, which, owing to martial law, could not come on at the first circuit. When the trial took place before the Circuit Court at Beaufort West, Witbooi was found not guilty, and Tromp was ordered to restore his property. Witbooi went to Tromp's farm to obtain his stock, but Tromp purchased them from him. Even then Tromp did not know Witbooi's stock from his own, as they had no distinguishing marks. Thereafter Brown demanded his sheep from Tromp, but the latter refused to give them up. Seeing that the sheep had been in Tromp's possession all the time, and that Witbooi had been found not guilty of stealing the very sheep which Tromp detained, the Magistrate gave judgment in favour of the plaintiff Brown for the delivery of the sheep, or their value, £11. Against this judgment the defendant Tromp now appealed.

Mr. Burton appeared for the appellant; Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for the respondent.

After hearing counsel on the facts, the Court dismissed the appeal, with costs.

De Villiers, C. J.: It is not denied in this case that the plaintiff has given full value for the sheep. On the return of the plaintiff from his banishment he claimed the sheep as his own. The question of the ownership of these sheep was directly tried by the Circuit Court, because Jefta Witbooi, who had handed these sheep to the plaintiff, was tried for the theft of these very sheep, and he was acquitted. After that this action was brought. In my opinion the Magistrate was justified in holding upon the evidence that the sheep belonged to Jefta Witbooi. There was evidence before the Magistrate that the fendant's own overseer, Schalkwyk, counted out these sheep, and was present when Jefta took them and raised no objection. Mrs. Tromp was also present, and raised no objection, and these were the persons who had been left in charge by the defendant when he left the farm. In addition to that we have the fact that the jury has found that Jefta did not steal the sheep. Under these circumstances I think the Magistrate was justified in holding that there was evidence that the sheep did belong to Jefta, and that Jefta was justified in selling them to the plaintiff. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Buchanan, J., said that he had only one remark to make, and it had reference to the legal effect of the acquittal of Witbooi. He did not think that the trial of Witbooi for the theft of these sheep necessarily disposed of the case between Tromp and Brown. If Tromp had been able in the civil case clearly to establish his ownership the mere fact of the acquittal would not have prevented him getting the sheep. But the fact that the jury, after hearing the evidence, said that Witbooi was innocent of theft was very strong evidence to go before the Magistrate as to the ownership. His lordship concurred in the dismissal of the appeal.

KAPLAN v. HANEKOM. { 1903 Feb. 6th.

Soldier — Obedience — Order of Superior Officer.

The defendant being a soldier received an order from his superior officer to collect the mules which the Boers during the recent war had left behind and to take them to G. Among the mules so left behind was a mule which the Boers had taken from the plaintiff and which the defendant now collected with others, and took to Garies. The plaintiff did not get back his mule and sued the defendant for his wrongful act in taking the mule.

Held, that the order given to the defendant was not a manifestly illegal one and that as he was bound to obey the order he was not liable for damages.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Namaqualand in a case in which the present appellant (Kaplan) summoned Hanekom for the sum of £30, being the value of a certain mule, the property of the plaintiff, alleged to have been unlawfully removed by defendant. Before the case was proceeded with in the Court below the Magistrate pointed out to the plaintiff's attorney that the amount sued for was in excess of the jurisdiction of the Court, and ultimately an amendment of the summons, reducing the claim to £20, was allowed, the defendant making no objection. The facts of the case were that a mule, the property of the plaintiff, was left on the farm of J. C. and D. J. Coetzee at Doornkraal, and this mule was taken by the defendant from the farm about the middle of August, 1902. The defendant, when removing the mule, was a corporal enrolled in the Namaqualand Border Scouts, a force enrolled under the Imperial Army Act, and was subject to the orders of Captain Hodge, the Commandant of Garies, who also had jurisdiction by virtue of martial law over that part of the district, in which the farm Doornkraal is situated. The mule in question was taken by the enemy from the farm Doornkraal, but ran away from the Boers and found its way back to the farm at the end of July or beginning of August. The defendant Hanekom received orders from Captain Hodge to collect all derelict stock which had been left by the enemy and bring them in to Garies, and it was in carrying out this order that he removed the mule from the farm Doornkraal. The Magistrate, after hearing the evidence, gave judgment for the defendant, with costs of suit.

The Magistrate gave his reasons for his judgment as follows: The defendant was bound to carry out the orders of his superior officer, subject to certain limitations which, with one exception, need not be entered into, as they do not exist in this case. The plaintiff contended that as war had ceased the military authorities had no right to take his mule on the date they did. The question as to whether he had lost his ownership by the seizure of the mule by the enemy need not, in my opinion, be decided in this case. As far as the defendant was concerned the order issued by Captain Hodge seemed to him to have been a reasonable one, and one which, if he had neglected to carry it out, would have subjected him to severe penalties. With this honest belief, with no malice against the defendant whatsoever, and in good faith, the defendant, who is a respectable European farm assistant, when he learnt that the mule had been in the use of the enemy, took it and delivered it at the military camp at Garies. In my opinion, therefore, there is no liability attached to a soldier in carrying out the orders of his superior officer under the circumstances disclosed in this case, and judgment was accordingly entered for the defendant, with costs of suit.

Mr. Burton appeared for the appellant; the respondent was in default.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant was in the position of a private soldier, bound to obey orders given to him by his superior officer. If his military superior gave an order which was manifestly illegal the private soldier would be justified, and in some cases bound, to refuse the order. Now, can it be said in the present case that the order given by the superior officer was manifestly illegal? It is true that the war was over, but it had not been over very long, and the superior officer told the defendant to collect the horses, mules, wagons, and carts that the Boers had had in their possession and had left behind. This mule was one of the cattle which had been in the possession of the Boers, and in one sense the Boers had left it behind because they had gone away, leaving the mule there. It is true that the mule had of its own accord left the Boers, but the Boers had also left it behind, because they left the place without going back for the mule, and therefore this mule, in my opinion, fell within the terms of the order given to the defendant. He obeyed that order, and all he did was to take this mule to Garies. The object of his commanding officer may have been to collect all the stock so as to take it to one place to be claimed and identified by the true owners, in which case the order, so far from being manifestly illegal, would have been manifestly legal. It would have been a different matter if the mule were still in the defendant's possession, for the question would then have arisen whether the plaintiff was entitled to vindicate his property found in the possession of the defendant. The Magistrate was, in my opinion, right in holding that the defendant was not liable for obeying the order of his superior officer, and the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred, and added that the appeal was dismissed totally irrespective of any question arising out of the Indemnity Act.

[Appellant's Attorneys, Michau and De Villiers; Respondents in default.]

Ex parte TURNBULL.

Mr. Alexander moved in the matter of the petition of John Parker Turnbull for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to amend an antenuptial contract. It was stated that the Registrar refused to register a bond for £1,700 on the ground that the petitioner's name was inscribed in the antenuptial contract as John Turnbull, and that an order was now sought authorising the Registrar to alter his name on the contract and register the deed.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte MILLS AND ANOTHER.

This was an application by Mr. Close for an order authorising the transfer of certain property.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte HEMBERT.

Dr. Greer moved on behalf of petitioner for an order authorising the Master to pay to George Peter Heffer, a minor, the sum of £225 out of the estate of his father, who died intestate, in order that the said minor might qualify as a photographic artist.

Order granted as prayed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr Justice MAASDORP.]

DE WIT BROS. V. HARTSLIEF. { 1903. Feb. 9th.

Mr. Gardiner moved for judgment in terms of consent paper for taxed costs up to date of judgment, and a reference of the accounts between the parties to the 6th January, 1903, and further moneys in dispute to Mr. Cameron, bookkeeper, Tarkastad, as arbitrator.

Judgment was given in terms of the consent paper.

ROSENBERG V. HENDRICKS AND ANOTHER.

This was an action for work done, Mr. Benjamin being for the plaintiff and Mr. Russell for the defendant.

Mr. Benjamin moved for judgment for the sum of £275, with costs, in terms of consent paper subject to the consent paper being amended so as to conform to the rules of Court.

Judgment was given in terms of the consent.

GOTTSCHALK BROS. V. FAURE.

Landlord and tenant—Ejectment Damages.

This was an action for ejectment and damages brought by the Gottschalk Bros., shopkeepers, Stellenbosch, against P. H. Faure, also of Stellenbosch.

From the pleadings it appeared that the plaintiff was the lessee of certain premises in Stellenbosch belonging to defendant, and the defendant was the sub-lessee of two rooms in the said premises on a monthly tenancy. On the 30th September last plaintiff gave defendant a month's notice to deliver up possession of the two rooms, but defendant had failed to do so, and the action was for an ejectment order and £30 damages for wrongfully and unlawfully continuing in possession of the rooms. The defendant agreed to let the premises to the plaintiff and his partner, Mr. Lapin, in March, 1899, at a rental of £5 10s. per month for the first two years and £5 15s. per month for the remainder of the term. The plaintiff and Mr. Lapin afterwards dissolved partnership, and the business was continued by the plaintiff. The question between the parties was whether the two rooms were sub-let to the defendant by the month until the plaintiff should require them or whether the rooms were formally given up by the plaintiff and his partner in consideration of the rent of the rest of the premises being reduced by 30s. per month.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Bisset) for the plaintiffs. Mr. Close (with him Mr. Russell) for the defendant.

Herman Gottschalk, the plaintiff, said he went to Stellenbosch in 1898 for the purpose of starting business there, and that he afterwards arranged to lease premises from the defendant for a term of five years.

Mr. Benjamin said that he must draw the attention of the Court to the fact that the copy of the lease produced was not stamped.

Mr. Close said that the original agreement was also unstamped.

Buchanan, J.: What is the amount of the stamp due?

Mr. Benjamin: £2.

The plaintiff, continuing, said that under the lease the tenancy was to commence on the 1st March and three or four months afterwards the defendant came to see him, and said he had got a bottle store licence for the premises, and asked him to let him have two rooms until he could secure a transfer of the licence to the next premises. Witness replied that he would be able to let him have two rooms for the present, and he should require monthly payment of rent, and the tenancy must be by the month. In spring, 1902, witness saw the defendant about giving him notice, and informed him that he should want the premises before the fruit season opened for fruit-packing purposes. The defendant replied he would first see Mr. Bosman in regard to the transfer of the licence, Mr. Bosman was the present licence-holder. Witness's attorney gave the defendant notice to deliver up possession of the two rooms on the 31st October, explaining that he regretted to have to take this step, which was necessary owing to the extension of his premises. At the end of November plaintiff tendered a cheque to Mr. Faure for the full rent, £5 15s.; but a letter was received in response from the defendant saying that the amount was altogether wrong, and that it should be £4 5s. Defendant had not left the premises. While the defendant's tenancy was continuing, it had been the custom for the rent of the rooms to be paid by the defendant, or 30s. to be deducted from the rent paid by the plaintiff to the defendant.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: He had been in partnership with Mr. Lapin. Witness was the manager of the business. Lapin was not present when he made the arrangement as to sub-letting the rooms to Mr. Faure. Mr. Faure asked him for a lease, but he refused to agree to anything beyond a monthly tenancy. For two or three months after commencing the business witness and his partner occupied the two rooms in question for sleeping purposes.

D. F. Bosman, partner in the firm of Bosman, Powis and Co., said that in June 1900 he entered into a lease with the defendant for the two rooms for a term of five years, with the option of renewal for a further term of five years. The defendant called upon him in December last, and did not act quite straight on that occasion. He said that he had had a good offer for his premises from a man in the Free State, but the man did not want to have a bottle store there, and Mr. Faure asked witness if he would be prepared to take two rooms in the next premises. Witness said that he did not care to move in, but he would move in provisionally. He was prepared to remove to another place afterwards, and then he would give the defendant £300. Of course that was subject to the defendant raising no objection to the witness's taking the bottle store to another place. The licence would then be on witness's property instead of on the defendant's. Defendant then said, "Look here, give me a note to that effect." Witness entered into a provisional arrangement accordingly, but later in the day the defendant came to him and said he had told an untruth, and that he had not acted straight; that he was in trouble with the man to whom he had let the property. Witness said he would be coming to Stellenbosch shortly, and he would try to arrange a settlement between the defendant and Mr. Gottschalk. Witness told him that he had let the place to two parties, and that he would give him £300 if he would consent to allow him (Mr. Bosman) to have the licence taken elsewhere, thus giving him back the two rooms. The defendant admitted that he had made a fool of himself, and that he had let the two rooms to two parties. He also admitted that he had hired the place on a monthly tenancy, and explained that he had thought he would never have any difficulty with the plaintiff; but they had some dispute about some chaff.

Cross-examined: He did not think that the licence that the defendant had was worth more than £300. He would have given the defendant £300 if he had consented to the removal of the licence to other premises.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

The defendant, Pieter Hendrik Faure, said he was the owner of the premises. He got a bottle-store licence granted by the Licensing Court on the first Wednesday in March, 1899, and he went and saw Lapin and Gottschalk, who were in the place, and told them that his application for a licence had been successful. He told them that he should like to have the two rooms, and asked if they would be willing to let him have them. The two men had a conversation in German or Hebrew, and then Lapin said that they would be able to let him have the two rooms, and that they would want £2 a month for them. He said that £2 was more than he cared to pay, and then they agreed upon 30s. Before he left he said to the two men: "Then we understand each other well; these two rooms are mine in future, and have nothing to do with the contract." Pointing to the wall, he added, "This wall is our future boundary wall." Lapin said, "They are yours entirely; we have nothing more to do with them." The plaintiff was present at the time this conversation took place. With regard to the cheques which had been produced by the other side in cases where the amount was £5 10s., he returned 30s. per month. In September last he had a dispute with the plaintiff about some chaff, for which the plaintiff had to pay, and next day he received a notice to quit the two rooms on the following day. Mr. Bosman came to see witness in August, and offered £300 to him for his licence. Witness told him that he could not sell at that price as he was drawing £69 a year from the place. Subsequently he received a summons from the Court for £30 damages, and as he did not want to go into Court he determined to see Mr. Bosman about the licence. He told Mr. Bosman that he had had an offer for the premises, and asked him if he would be prepared to go into the next premises. He emphatically denied that he ever told Mr. Bosman that he had made a fool of himself, and had let the rooms to two people, or that he said that he had hired the two rooms from the plaintiff on a monthly tenancy. He was afraid that Mr. Bosman would offer him nothing for the licence, and that was the reason why he resorted to the untruth in order to get the note from him. He took care, however, before he returned to Stellenbosch to go again to Mr. Bosman and tell him the real position of affairs.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He told the untruth to Mr. Bosman in order to get an offer from him.

Mr. Benjamin: Are you telling an untruth now, Mr. Faure, in order to get anything from Mr. Gottschalk?

Witness: No.

Cross-examined: Witness did not accept Mr. Bosman's offer of £300 because he thought it was too low. He asked Mr. Bosman £500 for the licence. He applied for a licence for the two rooms, although he knew that he had already let them to the plaintiff and his partner.

Theodore Lapin, a partner of the plaintiff, said that he was one of the parties to the lease. Mr. Faure told witness he had applied for a licence, and that if he got it he would have to get the two rooms back. Nothing was said about it in the lease. Before the lease was entered into nothing was said about getting the rooms back. It was said then that the matter could be arranged. About a month or five weeks afterwards plaintiff came to them and said that he had got the licence, and wanted the rooms back again. At that time plaintiff could not talk much English, and witness conducted the negotiations. They spoke in German. Witness arranged to let Faure have the two rooms back again as long as the lease continued, as they were useless to them. They were to let him have them back for £2, but afterwards agreed to make it 30s. Witness's partnership with plaintiff was dissolved in August, 1899. Since then witness had been in Port Elizabeth, and had not seen Mr. Faure until he came to Cape Town last week.

Cross-examined: Witness had no particular dispute with plaintiff. He simply said he did not want to be in partnership with him any longer. After the dissolution witness was quite good friends with plaintiff. There was a case against witness in Johannesburg, but witness declined to state particulars of that case.

Re-examined: Plaintiff knew nothing of this case at the time he entered into partnership with the defendant. If the gentleman (Mr. Benjamin) wished to know all about that case witness would tell all about it, as there was nothing against him (witness). The cheques were drawn up for £5 10s. because they did not wish to interfere with the written arrangement.

This closed the evidence.

The argument was chiefly on the facts, but Mr Benjamin cited the case of McNair and Cordiner v. Fachs (12 C.T.K., 1020).

No authorities were cited on the other side.

Buchanan, J.: The defendant in this case was the owner of certain property at Stellenbosch, which he let to the defendant and his partner, one Lappin. The lease, which is in writing, was for five years, commencing from the 1st of March, 1899. Prior to the execution of this lease defendant had applied to the Licensing Board for a bottle store licence, but as he himself stated, he did not expect it would be granted, so that no mention was made of it at the time of the lease. After all he got the licence, whereupon he approached the plaintiff, then in possession, and asked him to surrender two of the rooms. The plaintiff did surrender two of the rooms, and the defendant went into occupation of them. The question in dispute between the parties is the terms upon which these two rooms were surrendered. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant took the two rooms from him as a monthly tenant at a rent of 30s. per month, so that possession could be recovered on a month's notice being given. The defendant, however, said that what was agreed upon was that the two rooms should be given back and that the original contract should be altered to that effect, with a deduction of 30s. per month from the rent, as provided in the original contract. The other partner, Lappin, who has since retired from the partnership, has been called as a witness, as well as the parties to the suit, but none of the three persons gave exactly the same account of what took place on the occasion of giving up the rooms. Indeed, Lappin went further than even the plaintiff or the defendant, and stated: "We gave back the two rooms as long as our lease lasted." Now neither the plaintiff nor the defendant said that was part of the conversation. We have thus the written document of lease and this verbal conversation. Now, the Court has repeatedly laid down that where a document in writing is sought to be varied or substracted from by a verbal agreement, the verbal agreement relied upon must be strictly proved. The written agreement has not been altered by any writing, and as far as the other documents in this case are concerned, they are altogether in favour of the plaintiff. After the alleged verbal agreement was entered into, month after month up to August, the rent was paid by cheque for the full amount of the rent secured by the lease, viz., £5 10s. The defendant himself admitted that, and said that the reason the rent was not reduced to £4 was that the plaintiff had said: "We want to stick to our original document; we want to keep our lease as it is, and you can repay the 30s." Mr. Bosman's evidence also shows that the defendant himself had been under the impression that the rooms were let back to him on a monthly tenancy. He deposes that the defendant not only admitted this to him, but said he had got into a difficulty by letting the premises twice over. From all the facts of the case I am of opinion that defendant had taken repossession of the premises simply as a monthly tenant. Notice to quit had been given him on October 30, but the defendant still retained possession. An order will, therefore, be granted for ejectment, defendant to give up possession on the 28th of this month. As to damages, no special damage are alleged, though £30 are claimed. The Court will award damages equivalent to the rent for the time the defendants have been in possession, viz., 30s. per month for four months, that is £6, together with costs. One other question arises, and that is with regard to the written document of lease which has been put in as evidence between the parties. Under the Stamps and Licences Act any such document put in unstamped as evidence could not be received unless the Court imposed a penalty. The stamp in this case should have been £2, and a fine of £2 would now be imposed. That £2 fine, however, would not stamp the lease, and a further £2 would be required for that purpose, as well as the statutory fine for the delay in stamping, so that the revenue would be substantially enhanced by the lease not having been stamped at the time it was made. That fine of £2 would have to be paid by the plaintiff.

Maasdorp, J., concurred, and said he wished to express an opinion with regard to the conflict of evidence given in this case. He had no doubt that this was in great part due to the fact that the parties in agreeing, as they thought, on what the terms were to be as to defendant's occupation of the two rooms had not the same intention in their minds. If that were so, then no agreement had been come to, and in that case defendant would be in the same position as he now would be under the order of the Court.

VAN DER WESTHUIZEN V. ESTATE VAN DER WESTHUIZEN. { 1903. Feb. 9th.

Joint Will — Children—Bequest to a class—Vesting.

W. and his wife, by a certain joint will, bequeathed a certain portion of their landed property to the children of their son G. C. W. At the time of the testator's death, G. C. W. had five children, now represented by the plaintiffs: since that time six other children had been born to him. The plaintiffs contended that only such children of G. C. W. as were in esse at the time of the testator's death were entitled to share in the inheritance. The defendant contended that the children of G. C. W. born after the death of the testator were also entitled to share; and that, inasmuch as G. C. W. was still alive, and might have further issue, that no distribution of the estate could be made until his death.

Held, that as by the terms of the will the property immediately vested in the then children of G. C. W. and that as these terms were inconsistent with the postponement of the distribution of the estate; judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs in terms of their contention.

This was a special case set down for argument, the plaintiffs being Martheus van der Westhuysen, Alida Maria Raubenheimer (born Van der Westhuysen), Johannes Mattheus van der Westhuysen, and the defendant Johannes Stephanus van der Westhuysen, in his capacity as surviving executor testamentary of the estate of the late Johannes Mattheus van der Westhuysen, and George William Steytler, in his capacity as curator ad litem of all the minor children of Gert Cornelius van der Westhuysen.

The special case was set forth as follows:

1. On the 22nd August, 1882, Johannes Mattheus van der Westhuysen and his wife, Anna Margaretha Elizabeth van der Westhuysen (born Olivier), spouses, married with community of goods, made and executed their joint last will.

2. The testator died on the 26th January, 1883, and his surviving spouse who adiated and accepted the benefits of the said will died on the 12th June 1898.

3. Gert Cornelis van der Westhuysen, a son of the testators, is still alive.

4. On the death of the testator the said Gert Cornelis van der Westhuysen had five children, of whom one has since died, one is still a minor, two are the first two plaintiffs, who are majors, and one Anna Margaretha van der Westhuysen is married to one Rademeyer, with whose assistance she has duly and lawfully disposed of her rights under the said will to the third plaintiff.

5. Since the death of the testator six other children of Gert Cornelis van der Westhuysen have been born and are alive.

6. In 1896 the executors of the testator, being his surviving spouse and the defendant, in accordance with the will transferred the landed property specially bequeathed to the children of the said Gert Cornelis van der Westhuysen to themselves in trust, subject to the conditions of the will (save and except the condition as to the annual payment of £65 to be brought up for the survivor by the shares of the grandchildren, that is, the children of the said Gert Cornelis van der Westhuysen, which condition she waived) and the said property is now held by the defendant as surviving executor of the testator in trust as aforesaid.

7. The amount of £590 for which, in terms of paragraph 8 (b) of the will, the said shares were made liable has been duly paid.

8. The plaintiffs contend that according to the true intent and meaning of the said will, each of them as being or representing one of the five children of Gert Cornelis van der Westhuysen, who were born at the date of the testator's death, are entitled to an equal one-fifth share of the said bequeathed properties, and that it is the duty of the defendant to transfer to each of them one-fifth of the said properties accordingly.

9. The defendant contends that the children of Gert Cornelis van der Westhuyzen, born after the death of the testator, are entitled to share equally with the children of the said Gert Cornelis van der Westhuysen, born before the death of the testator, in the said bequeathed properties.

10. Wherefore the parties pray for the judgment of this Honourable Court upon their respective contentions, and that the costs of this suit may be directed to be paid accordingly.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., appeared for the plaintiffs; Sir Henry Juta, K.C., appeared for the defendants.

Mr. Schreiner cited Breuler v. Kotze's Executors (2, Menz., 444) and In re Henning (7 Juta, 53). These cases are very much in point. In this case Cornelis has no life interest in the estate, nor has the mother of the testator. The will provides for the shares of the grandchildren, but clearly the children were to come in, as the date of distribution was to be six months after the death of the testator. But it must be remembered that a will speaks from the death of the testator, and that therefore children subsequently born could have no claims to share in the inheritance.

Sir H. Juta, K.C.: I cannot follow the argument of plaintiff's counsel, when he says that a will speaks from the death of the testator. That is a rule of English law, but our law is exactly the opposite. Wentzel v. Brink's Executors (9 Juta, 328). See particularly where Voet is cited. Then we are dealing with a mutual will. The will of the survivor cannot speak till his (or her) death. It is true that by massing and adiation the survivor may be debarred from making a new will; but there have been many cases in which the survivor has dealt with the property inter viros, and in all these cases the Court has held that the survivor could alienate inter viros one-half of the property. In a mutual will there are really two wills, but surely the law will not suppose that such a will speaks from the death of the first dying. Again, if we look to Act 21 of 1875, it is clear that no money could be transferred until after the death of the survivor: so it is quite immaterial that in the meantime the whole property was to remain in trust.

Mr. Schreiner (in reply) contended that the passages cited from Voet were rather in favour of his contention than against it.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea. (February 10).

Buchanan, J.: The late Mr. Van der Westhuysen and his spouse made a joint will, in which they bequeathed a specific portion of their landed property to the children of their son, Gert Cornelis. The testator died in 1883, and his surviving spouse died in 1898 without altering the will. At the time of the testator's death the son, Gert Cornelis, had five children, now represented by the plaintiffs; but since that time six other children have been born. Gert Cornelis is still alive, and it is said that he may yet have further issue. The plaintiffs contend that they alone, being the children alive at the date of testator's death, are entitled to the bequest. The defendants contend that the bequest was made to a class, namely, to the grandchildren of the testator, and that the members of the class cannot be ascertained until after the death of Gert Cornelis. No doubt under circumstances inference may be drawn from the nature of the relationship between the testator and the objects of his bounty, but the Court has universally ruled that the intention of the testator must govern the contsruction of the will, and that that intention must be gathered from the will itself. In this case the first point in favour of the plaintiffs is the fact that there is no intermediate estate created between the testators and the beneficiaries. There is no postponement of the vesting. There is also no future time fixed for the distribution of the bequest. From the terms of the will it would appear that it was the intention of the parties that immediately upon the death of the testator the property should become that of the children of Gert Cornelis. The only children that could benefit from the property at the time were those in being. There is nothing in the will to indicate that any any other beneficiaries than those in existence at the time were to come in. But there are, on the other hand, clauses of the will which are inconsistent with the postponement of the distribution of the estate. For instance, in the 8th clause of the will for this property, which was bequeathed to the children of Gert Cornelis, the sum of £590 is to be paid, "and the payment shall be made in the way following, viz.: One-half within one year of the death of the first dying and the remainder within one year of the death of the survivor." Who is to make this payment, but the beneficiaries under the will? If we have to wait until the death of Gert Cornelis before ascertaining who these beneficiaries are, how can the payment be made one-half within one year after the death of the survivor? Then in the 11th clause the property is bequeathed subject to the condition that it shall yield to the survivor a sum of £65 per annum. For the half of the purchase price remaining unpaid the survivor is to get £65, probably as an equivalent of the interest on the amount. It is true that transfer of the properties could not be demanded until the death of the survivor, and that the property was to be transferred to executors in trust. The explanation given as to the clause is a reasonable one. The will shows that the testators did not wish their son Cornelis in any way to benefit or to interfere with the property, and it is said that they wished the executors to take transfer rather than that it should go to their son as the natural guardian of his children. Here, then, we have a bequest in favour of people in being, a bequest which is to vest at once, and for which a sum of money is to be paid over at once; there is no postponement of the distribution, and there is no intermediate estate. We have also the fact that the survivor did transfer the property, and that the purchase price was actually paid some time since, the survivor waiving her right to the annual payment. I think under all these circumstances we were forced to the conclusion that the intention of the parties was that the grandchildren in esse at the time of the death of the testator should have the property transferred to them, and that there should not be a postponement of vesting or of distribution until after the death of Gert Cornelis. We, therefore, think that the contention of the plaintiffs in this case is the true intent and meaning of the will, and judgment will be entered in favour of the plaintiffs in terms of that contention. Costs will come out of the estate.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

CLIFFORD V. CLIFFORD. { 1903. Feb. 10th.

In the divorce suit of Clifford v. Clifford, set down for hearing on the 25th February, Mr. Benjamin applied for the appointment of a commissioner to take the evidence of Dr. Elliott, of Sea Point, who, it was stated, was about to leave for England by to-morrow's mail, and whose testimony was material to the plaintiff's case.

Order granted as asked, Mr. Advocate Van Zyl being appointed commissioner.

CONNELLY V. CONNELLY.

This was an action for divorce by the petitioner, Margaret Louisa Connelly, against her husband on the ground of his adultery. Mr. Benjamin appeared for the plaintiff, and there was no appearance for the respondent.

The petitioner said she was married to the respondent at S. Mary's Church, Bristol, on the 27th November, 1895. He was an architect and civil engineer by profession. After their marriage they lived for some years in several parts of England, and also on the Gold Coast, but they were not on happy terms. Respondent was of very intemperate habits, and at times he treated her cruelly. In July, 1901, he came out to South Africa with the intention of settling here, but she did not accompany him. Whilst in England she heard charges of infidelity against him, and she wished to take proceedings in the English Courts, but was advised that she would have to commence proceedings in Cape Colony. There were two boys of the marriage—one aged 8 and the other two and a half years. Both the children were at home with her parents, and she asked for maintenance from her husband. The defendant had a reversionary interest in his mother's estate, but, apart from that, he had nothing except his earnings. He was formerly in the employ of the Public Works Department in Cape Town at a salary of £35 per month, but at present he was working as managing assistant to an architect named Mr. Walker, at Port Elizabeth. In May 1901 she obtained an order from the Bristol Magistrates against her husband for 15s. a week for the support of her children. Witness came out to this country in August of last year. In reply to the Court, witness said that she had come to this country with the idea of staying here permanently. She last saw her husband three days before he left England, but she had had no communication with him since May 30, 1901. He had only paid one instalment under the Magistrate's order.

Mrs. Annie Mary Schonberg said that her husband obtained a divorce against her last November on the ground of her adultery with a man named Connelly. Witness identified the photo produced by Mrs. Connelly as that of the man who was joined with her as co-defendant. Witness and Connelly were living at an hotel at Woodstock as Mr. and Mrs. Bruce.

A decree was granted as prayed, the petitioner to have custody of the children and the respondent to pay £5 a month towards their maintenance until the younger child should attain the age of 16 years.

MKOKO V. MKOKO AND CROW.

This was an action by John Mkoko, a Tembu, for divorce from his wife on the ground of her adultery with a man named Jim Crow. Mr. Benjamin appeared for the petitioner, and the suit was undefended.

The plaintiff's declaration showed that he was married to the defendant according to native customs at Prieska in 1897, and he afterwards came to Simon's Town, where he got employment. In 1900 he was married at the Baptist Church at Plumstead.

[Buchanan, J.: What made you marry in the Church if you were already married?]

Witness: I got converted. Witness went on to say that after the marriage at the church his wife deserted him in three months.

[Buchanan, J.: You got on much better while you were married under native law than under Christian law?]

Witness: Yes. Witness said that he went in search of his wife with a man named Matross, and they ultimately found her at Grobo, near Sir Lowry's Pass, living in a hut with Jim Crow.

Replying to Buchanan, J., witness said that they did not live any more in peace after they had been married at the church. He did not know why his wife left him. She also professed Christianity.

Corroborative evidence having been given by another native named Matross.

A decree of divorce was granted, petitioner to have the custody of the child.

BOZZETT V. BOZZETT.

This was an action instituted by Joseph Bozzett, of Stellenbosch, for restitution of conjugal rights, and, failing compliance, for divorce.

The declaration set forth that plaintiff was married to the defendant, Agnes Caroline Bozzett (born Watts), on the 14th May, 1899, at Shadwell, in the county of London, and they lived together until November of the same year. Witness was at that time a police constable, and he was transferred to High Barnet, leaving his wife at Shadwell. He sent money to her for her support. About two or three months afterwards he went to Shadwell to see her, but he failed to find her. He had no idea where she had gone, and although he saw her father, he could obtain no information as to her whereabouts. He had quarrelled with her because she was a dipsomaniac. He came to South Africa in 1896, but he did not get to see his wife again before he left, although he endeavoured to trace her. He had paid two visits to England since he had come to this country, but his efforts to trace his wife had been unsuccessful on both occasions. Her parents formerly kept a public-house called the Baker's Arms at Stratford, but on going there he found that they had left.

Mr. Benjamin for Plaintiff; Defendant in default.

Plaintiff stated in evidence that he had had a notice inserted in the "People" asking for information as to the address of his wife, and the result was that she appeared at his solicitors and asked them what they wanted with her. Witness's private opinion was that she thought she was to receive some money. She gave her address as 23, Joshua-street, St. Leonard's-road, Poplar.

Buchanan, J.: Are you willing to take her back provided that she is willing to come back?

Witness: Yes, provided that I don't prejudice my case if she should have misconducted herself in the interval.

Buchanan, J.: You must give her an opportunity of returning. If you can prove misconduct, you can get a divorce.

Witness said he had to sell his business at Somerset West on account of its not paying, as he found it absolutely necessary to have a wife.

An order was granted calling upon the respondent to return to her husband on or before the 1st May next.

Postea. (May 14th. The rule was made absolute.)

ARENDSE V. ARENDSE.

This was an action by Karl Jacobus Fredrik Arendse, for a decree of divorce from his wife on the ground of her adultery with John Rooder and another.

It appeared from the evidence of the petitioner that he was married to the respondent, Sela Francina Arendse, at the Dutch Reformed Church, Wynberg, on April 17, 1893, and that after they had been married about a year and a quarter she left him and went to live in Cape Town with a man named John Rooder. Witness and his wife had not since lived together.

Mr. Gardiner for Plaintiff; Defendant in person.

Defendant did not deny the accusation, but she added that she had no money to pay for her defence.

A decree was granted as prayed.

DE WIT V. LUYT. { 1903. Feb. 10th.

Unlawful possession—Bona fides.

Where the defendant had admittedly been found in unlawful possession of certain ostriches, which by his orders had been plucked "green" and branded with his principal's brand.

Held (on appeal), that the fact that the defendant had, per in-curiam, not observed that these birds were not the property of his principals and that he had therefore acted bona fide, was not a good defence in a civil action.

This was an appeal by De Wit, who was the plaintiff in the court below, against the decision of the Resident Magistrate at Riversdale in respect to a claim brought by the said plaintiff against the present respondent for £8 10s. for the unlawful detention and plucking green of certain ostriches, and £1 10s., the value of certain feathers. The evidence for the plaintiff was that the ostriches were found in the camp, of which the defendant acted as manager or overseer after they had been missed by the plaintiff for some days, and that one of the birds had been plucked green and two had been branded. The defendant's evidence was that he had not seen the birds, and that the reason why they were found to have been branded was that he had given instruction that some young birds were to be branded, and that old birds, whose marks were indistinct, were to be re-branded. The Magistrate's reasons for his judgment were that he gave absolution from the instance on the ground that the defendant did not knowingly detain the ostriches in the camp of his employers; the Court was of opinion that the defendant had no knowledge that the birds were there. No specific damages were proved to have been sustained. The branding of the ostriches was admitted by the defendant, but it was done because the birds in question were mixed with others of the farm that were branded.

Mr. Upington for appellant; Mr. Gardiner for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts of the case,

Buchanan, J., said that the Magistrate in this case seemed to have acted upon an erroneous idea. The ostriches in this case were found with defendant, and while with defendant one of the birds was plucked, and it is not denied that they were re-branded by defendant or his servants with the brands of Reitz and Versfeld, to whom the other ostriches in his custody belonged. The Magistrate had found no mala fides proved, and that seemed to be the ground upon which he gave absolution from the instance. If mala fides had been proved the defendant might have been liable to a criminal action, as well as the civil one. The fact that there was no mala fides did not exclude him from civil liability. However, as the Magistrate had not found specifically upon the facts necessary for a decision of the case, the case would be remitted back to the Magistrate to find specifically upon the facts, more especially as to the plucking of the bird and the offer to give up the feathers deposed to by the one and denied by the other of the parties. It would not be necessary to hear counsel again, as judgment would be given when that report was received.

REX v. CLARKE. { 1903. Feb. 10th.

Evidence—Stock theft Bona Derelicta.

The accused had been convicted by a certain Assistant Resident Magistrate of the theft of a horse from the military authorities. It appeared from the evidence that the horse had been left in charge of a certain farmer by one of the Border Scouts. Eventually the horse got into the pound, being then in very bad condition. The accused released it, fed it up and at the request of one A. sold it to him for £6, at the same time saying it was not his own horse and therefore he could not well sell it. The evidence showed that one of the military officers had given permission to the accused to take the horse and use it if it "picked up."

Held, on appeal, that as the horse was practically derelict, and as the accused had acted quite openly in the matter, the conviction must be quashed.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Acting Resident Magistrate of Namaqualand in a summary trial under Act 35 of 1893, held on December 22, 1902, in which one George Clarke was charged with the theft of stock. It was alleged that during the month of October last prisoner stole from the farm Kraaifontein a horse belonging to the Imperial Government. The prisoner pleaded not guilty, but after evidence had been led the Magistrate found him guilty, and imposed a sentence of five months' imprisonment, with hard labour. Against this decision the prisoner appealed, the appeal being upon the ground that the evidence did not support the conviction. The evidence showed that the horse in question was one that had been commandeered, and used by the military authorities. Afterwards the horse, while in the custody of one of the Border Scouts, became sick, and was left on the farm, from which it was taken by prisoner. Prisoner alleged that he had been told by one Captain McDonald that he could take the horse and use it. He then gave the horse to one Auchenbach, but on the military authorities calling upon him to produce the horse he obtained it back by giving another horse to Auchenbach, and then gave the horse to the military.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the appellant; Mr. Howel Jones appeared on behalf of the Crown.

After hearing counsel, the Court allowed the appeal, and quashed the conviction.

Buchanan, J.: In this case the prisoner was charged with stealing a horse belonging to the Imperial Government, found guilty, and sentenced to five months' imprisonment with hard labour. It appeared that at one time the horse belonged to one Mostert, but was commandeered by the military, and Mostert having been paid the horse became the property of the Government. Afterwards, in November, the horse, which was described as being sick and debilitated, was along with a number of other horses in the custody of one of the Border Scouts. This Border Scout had to take these horses to a certain place, but it appeared that two of them were so bad and in such a weak condition that he had to leave them behind. As he said, he could not leave them in charge of anybody, and he just left them at a farm belonging to one Buys. Afterwards the deputy commandant told Buys that if the horse picked up he could use it, and the matter could be settled afterwards. The horse did not pick up from what the prisoner himself said, and he was supported by two witnesses. Later on Captain McDonald, one of the military officers, told prisoner that he could take the horse and use it if it picked up. The horse got into the pound, and prisoner released it and fed it up, and handed it over to one Auchenbach. According to his own evidence he told Auchenbach that it was not his own horse, and that he could not well sell it. Auchenbach, however, wanted the horse, and he said that prisoner sold it to him, and that he gave him £6 for it. Now, the horse was practically derelict, and according to the evidence of some of the witnesses the custom of the military was to shoot abandoned horses. This horse was not shot. It was true that it did not belong to prisoner, but it was reasonable to suppose from the evidence that he acted without mens rea. He had obtained permission from a military officer to use the horse, and when it recovered from a sore back, and had got into good condition, and was then claimed, prisoner got it back from Auchenbach and gave it up to the police. Under these circumstances it would be going too far to imply that prisoner has been guilty of theft. In all this transaction there was no concealment, and prisoner spoke to the military authorities about the horse. Under all these circumstances, the Magistrate would have been better advised if he had considered that this was a case where the prisoner did not steal the horse. The prisoner seemed to be a respectable farmer, a man in good position, and in communication with the military. Under all the circumstances, I am of opinion that this serious conviction should be quashed.

SUPREME COURT

DAVIS V. DAVIS. { 1903. Feb. 11th.

This was an action for divorce brought by the plaintiff against her husband, William Davis, on the ground of his adultery. Forfeiture of the benefits of the marriage in community and costs were also asked.

Mr. Alexander for plaintiff; defendant in default.

Mr. Alexander called

Charles William Smith, clerk at the Colonial Secretary's Office in charge of the marriage register, who deposed to the correctness of the marriage certificate put in.

Sarah Catrina Davis said she married defendant on August 1, 1893, at Cape Town. There was no issue of the marriage. A week before last Christmas witness went to a cottage at Rondebosch, and as she got there defendant left the place. Witness went into the cottage and saw the woman who was living with defendant as his wife. Witness had been separated from defendant for six years, defendant having left her.

Sam Paulsen deposed that he occupied a room in the same house as defendant and a woman named Lena. The two last named lived together as man and wife.

Decree of divorce granted as prayed, with costs.

HAWKINS AND THOMAS V. EDWARDS.

The hearing of this matter, part heard on November 24 last, was resumed.

The plaintiffs alleged in their declaration that on the 18th February, 1902, they entered into a contract with defendant whereby, in consideration of a sum of £40 to be paid by defendant, plaintiffs undertook to remove and stack certain ship's timber from the wrecked S.S. Hermes. Plaintiffs also alleged that they performed other work, for which it was agreed that reasonable remuneration should be paid. They claimed £15 in respect of this. Certain sums had been paid by defendant, and plaintiffs claimed that £31 7s. 7d. was still due. They applied for judgment for that amount. Defendant admitted the contract, but denied that plaintiffs had properly performed their part thereof. He tendered the sum of £14 7s. 7d.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers for the plaintiffs; Mr. Upington for the defendant.

Mr. Upington said that before the case proceeded he had to make an application upon notice given calling upon the plaintiffs to find security for the costs of the action. He read the affidavit of the defendant, which stated that one plaintiff was now resident at Middelburg in the Transvaal, and the other at Dundee, in Natal.

Mr. De Villiers pointed out that the last hearing of the case had been postponed owing to the defendant having gone off to Madagascar a few days before the trial. He also contended that the defendant had waived his right to ask for security, because when the case was previously before the Court it was known that the plaintiffs were leaving, and no question of security was raised until the end of January last, and it had been found impossible to communicate with plaintiffs on the matter in the time that had elapsed since then.

De Villiers, C.J., said it would be better to go on with the case.

At the last hearing of the case the evidence of the plaintiff Hawkins was taken. Mr. De Villiers now said that he would close his case, as he had no further evidence to lead.

For the defence, Mr. Upington called Morgan Edwards, the defendant, who said he was a salvage contractor, carrying on business in Cape Town. Prior to entering into the contract now in question witness had for some months employed the plaintiffs on other jobs of salving gear from the Hermes, and had in that connection paid them £60, the receipt for which he produced. Then he entered into this contract with plaintiffs to salve woodwork and so forth. Proceeding, witness said that the work set forth in that contract had not all been done, giving details as to what had been omitted. Witness had called for tenders to complete the work which plaintiffs had left unfinished and had received a tender for £27. Witness had, to enable plaintiffs to get a permit to return to Johannesburg, giving them on March 27, 1902, a certificate stating that the plaintiffs had been in his employ for several months, and "have now completed salving the gear." At that time there was a great difficulty in obtaining permits to go to Johannesburg. Witness gave them that certificate as being their last employer.

By the Chief Justice: He did not know how that certificate would enable them to obtain a permit.

Buchanan, J.: You know they wanted to go away, and you gave them a certificate to enable them to do so, and yet you say they have not finished their work.

Witness said that the work referred to in the certificate was that which plaintiffs had done for him before the contract, when they were working for a daily wage. Plaintiffs had to show such a certificate from their last employer before they would get a permit to go to the Transvaal. They worked on board for a day or two after the certificate had been given.

Cross-examined: Witness thought £27 was a heavy sum to pay for having the uncompleted work done, but it was not unreasonable. The man would not take less. Witness's tender of £4 7s. 7d. was arrived at by deducting the £27 from the balance due to plaintiffs. With regard to the salving of gear, previous to the contract, Thomas had been employed from October, 1901, to January, 1902, and Hawkins in January, 1902. They got 12s. 6d. and 10s. per day each, and the coloured men witness employed on the wreck got from 5s. to 7s. 6d. per day. The last payment for the work of salving the gear was made on February 1, 1902.

By the Chief Justice: Witness could not tell how many days the plaintiffs had been employed on the contract. Before they had made the contract they had asked witness to keep them on at the salving, but he had said that he could not afford to give them the same rate of pay for the work that remained, and they then offered to do it cheaper. Witness had made a complaint about some teak wood being taken away, but that was not the cause of his refusing to pay. Witness could not say when the last payment was made on the contract, as he did not get receipts.

William Evans said that he was in the employ of the defendant, and during the work under the contract he was defendant's foreman on the Hermes. When plaintiffs left witness inspected the ship, and found that certain of the work mentioned in the contract had not been done.

Cross-examined: Witness would say that not half the work was done.

H. L. Hyland, master shipwright, deposed that in April last he went with defendant and inspected the Hermes. He corroborated as to a large part of the work mentioned in the contract not having been done. Witness had tendered to complete the work, excluding the stacking of the timber on the shore, for £27.

This concluded the evidence.

After hearing counsel in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: There is great conflict in the evidence given in this case, and the Court should be guided by the probabilities in order to ascertain which side is correct in its statements. This is to be said in regard to the plaintiff's evidence, that he alone has deposed as to what took place, his partner, the co-plaintiff, was not called and no other independent evidence was called to support his statements. The only circumstance which is certainly in favour of the plaintiffs is the fact that this certificate was given by the defendant: "This is to certify that Messrs O. Hawkins and E. J. Thomas have been in my employ for several months, and have now completed salving gear, etc., from the above-named wreck." The defendant states that the reason why he gave this certificate was that the plaintiffs were anxious to obtain a permit to go to Johannesburg, that they represented to him that a certificate of this kind would materially assist them in obtaining such permit, and that the defendant gave this, not intending that the document should refer to the contract at all, and certainly on close scrutiny I think it cannot be said that it includes the whole of the work under the contract. The certificate states that the plaintiffs had been in his employ for several months, but says nothing in regard to the work done under the contract, and then adds that "they have now completed salving gear, etc., from the above-named wreck." The chief work, therefore, to which he refers here is the gear, and that, "etc.," might refer to the machinery and so on without referring to the timber for which they claimed under the contract. On the side of the defendant we have the evidence of the defendant himself and two independent witnesses, who positively state that the work required to be done had not been done. Mr. Hyland, apparently an experienced shipwright, states that in April last year he examined the ship, and he found that a considerable portion of the work they should have done under the contract had not been done, so much so that he would charge £27 for the completion of the work. In the face of that evidence, I do not see how we could give judgment for the plaintiffs for the full amount claimed. The Court will, therefore, give judgment for the plaintiffs for £4 7s. 7d., with costs up to the date of the plea, but the subsequent costs are to be paid by the plaintiffs.

Mr. Upington applied for the costs of the application made that morning.

De Villiers, C.J.: I don't think they should be included.

WALPOLE V. PALMER AND OTHERS. 1903. Feb. 12th.

Defamation—Report of trial—Newspaper comments—Functions of judge and jury.

A preliminary examination having taken place against the plaintiff for a criminal assault on a young girl the defendants published in their newspaper a report of the trial with some comments thereon. These comments were capable of the construction that in the opinion of the writer the plaintiff was guilty of the offence. The plaintiff was acquitted at the subsequent trial and thereupon brought an action against the defendants for defamation. The defendants excepted to the declaration on the ground that it disclosed no ground of action.

Held, that as the comments were capable of the construction, placed on them by the declaration, the Court should not, on exception, decide the question as to whether the article was defamatory or not but leave the question to be decided at the trial, whether the trial should take place before the judges or be held before a jury.

This was an argument on exceptions taken by the defendants to the plaintiff's declaration. The action was brought by Horace George Custance Walpole, residing at Cape Town, against Alfred Palmer, proprietor and editor of "The South African Review," the Central News Agency, the publishers, and Joseph, William Henry, George Impey, and Alfred Renfrew Richards, carrying on business under the style of W. A. Richards and Sons, the printers. The plaintiff was in September last committed for trial on a charge of assault by the A.R.M. of Cape Town, and when the trial took place at the Criminal Sessions in October he was acquitted and discharged. Two articles were published in the "Review," in which the plaintiff alleged that he had been libelled, and he claimed £1,000 damages. The defendants took exception to paragraphs 4 and 5 of the plaintiff's declaration, which were as follows:

4. On or about the 26th day of September, 1902, the defendants falsely and maliciously printed and published of and concerning the plaintiff in the said newspaper the false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory words following, to wit: Men Street-Prowlers!—In Cape Town.—On the Look-out for Girl Victims!—A Matter of Great Importance to Parents and Others!—For some time past it has been known to the police authorities that the streets of Cape Town are infested with well-dressed men, who prowl about the streets for no other purpose than to molest ladies, and more especially young girls between the ages of about 13 and 16 years. I have it on high official authority that several recent cases have come within the cognisance of the police, where gentlemanly-looking miscreants of the class indicated have inveigled respectable girls into hotels and shops of a certain class, and there endeavoured to debauch their victims. These prowling scoundrels only rarely attempt to interfere with adults; their operations are chiefly confined to girls just budding into womanhood, whom they judge to be scarcely experienced enough in the world's wiles to have their suspicions excited, when addressed by strangers in a sufficiently plausible manner, and under sufficiently specious pretexts. The police have good reason to believe that in several cases girl victims have kept their experiences strictly to themselves, either through fear, or a sense of outraged modesty; but in the majority of instances, unfortunately, but quite naturally, the parents or guardians of the victims are deterred from placing these matters in the hands of the authorities, lest they should be called upon to face the glaring publicity of a magistrate's court. So invariably, indeed, is this the case, that the police are practically debarred from dealing effectively with the evil, for it is needless to say that the fiends pursue their trade in so circumspect a manner as to avoid attracting attention; while even if it were otherwise, they could not be brought within the arms of the law except by the co-operation of the victims themselves. This state of affairs has led to the evil becoming too common to be any longer ignored in the press, for these rascally street-prowlers are at present emboldened, by immunity from interference. I therefore make no apology for publishing the facts of one of these cases brought to light in the Magistrate's Court, before Mr. Lotter, Acting A.R.M., on Tuesday, the 9th instant. The evidence as disclosed speaks for itself. The girl victim is the daughter of a highly-respected suburban resident in a good position, to whom the public owe a great debt of gratitude for having set aside all personal inconvenience in a determination to bring the perpetrator of the outrage on his daughter to justice, in the interests of society at large. I have not given the name of the girl, because it is neither desirable nor necessary that it should be known; while of course it remains to be proved whether the accused person is the man who committed the outrage, the defence being, as will be seen, an alibi. The courageous action of the girl's father in bringing the matter into Court will, I trust, lead to the elimination of this moral cancer from our midst, and meanwhile I publish this case with the object of putting not only parents and guardians, but ladies and girls themselves, on their guard, lest they might suffer molestation in a similar manner, for a perusal of the facts disclosed will show that it is high time precautionary measures were taken, especially in the cases of young girls of about the age indicated.

Then followed a report of the proceedings in the Police Court.

5. And the said defendants, on or about the 17th day of October, 1902, falsely and maliciously wrote, printed, and published of and concerning the plaintiff in that said newspaper the further false, scandalous, malicious, and defamatory words following to wit: Outrage on the Wynberg Line—(Wanted—Vigilance Committees): Information has reached this office of a terrible outrage committed in a railway carriage on the Wynberg line. It appears that a young girl, aged 13, living in the Constantia district, was travelling from Cape Town to Wynberg when a man entered the carriage at Rondebosch, and, it is alleged, committed an outrage upon her between that station and Wynberg. The ruffian appears to have decamped at one of the intermediate stations, for the girl was alone and unconscious when the train arrived at Wynberg. The family of the girl are anxious to avoid publicity, but it will be a thousand pities if the monster who perpetrated this outrage should be permitted to escape from justice. Owing to the determination of the parties concerned to keep the matter sub rosa, it is extremely difficult to obtain information, but it is unthinkable that such a miscreant should be permitted to roam at large, and that no attempt should be made to lay by the heels so dangerous a pest of society. In view of the disclosures in a recent issue of this journal concerning the inveigling of young girls into hotels, and the admission on the part of the police authorities that this class of crime is prevalent and on the increase, it is surely time to be up and doing. The reluctance of the girls themselves and of their parents and relations to bring their grievances to the police, naturally hinders attempts to cope with this growing social evil, and it would appear that nothing short of well-organised vigilance committees can effectively bring about a better state of things.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the exceptors), said that to the fourth paragraph of the declaration exception had been taken on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action, in other words, that there was nothing in the article that in any way injured or prejudiced or insinuated anything against the character of the plaintiff. He called their lordships' attention to the fifth paragraph of the declaration headed, "Outrage on the Wynberg line." There was nothing whatever about the plaintiff there. There was the merest reference to disclosures in a previous issue of the journal. But the preceding paragraph was the more important one. He took it for granted that no one was going to argue in this year of 1903 that the proceedings of a Magistrate's Court could not be published in a newspaper. The innuendo alleged was that the defendants did in fact insinuate and state that the plaintiff was guilty of this charge, but that was exactly what the defendant did not do. He was very careful with regard to that. The case, as reported, gave the evidence and the defence of an alibi. What the defendant said was that so far from imputing guilt to the plaintiff or insinuating that he was guilty or insinuating that the evidence of the girl was to be believed, and that the plaintiff was the perpetrator of the outrage; on the contrary, the article said that it still remained to be proved that the accused person was the man who committed the outrage. There was nothing improper where they had a series of crimes going on in a town in commenting upon this sort of crime being perpetrated as long as they did not insinuate that any person who was on his trial for that class of offence was guilty of it. Nobody could cavil at his commenting on the prevalence of this crime and remarking in his article that "the defence is an alibi," and although the girl in her evidence and the other witnesses for the prosecution said that this was the man, notwithstanding this, the article went on, "it remains to be proved that this is the person who committed the outrage." Now could it in any way be said that this article said that the plaintiff was guilty? That was the gist of the whole thing. If the person commenting on these proceedings guarded himself strictly by saying that it was to be proved that the person charged was the person who committed the offence, he submitted that it was impossible to say that there was anything libellous in the statement. The alleged libels were both published before the trial, the plaintiff said he had been acquitted, hence where was the prejudice?

Mr. Upington (for the respondent) said that the first exception that was taken to the declaration was that it disclosed no ground of action. He took it as admitted that newspaper reports of criminal proceedings would be privileged, if they were fair and impartial and accurate reports, and, while the case was still sub judice, without comment thereon. Surely, his learned friend would have to plead his privilege, and would have to plead his fair and bona-fide comment. The statements such as were contained in paragraph four of the declaartion, he submitted, were prima facie libellous. To prefix to the report of the preparatory examination, whilst a man was still on his trial, such sensational headings as "Men Street-prowlers in Cape Town on the Look-out for Victims," he submitted, would be a gross libel. It was exactly as if a report of a preparatory examination in which the charge was one of theft had been headed "Thieves and Robbers," and so forth. If he were asked to give authority for what was unfair and mala fide comment on the proceedings in a Court of Justice, he should refer to an old case which on one point was perhaps not an authority, but which was still interesting. He meant the case of Duncan v. Thwaites. Even the report of the Police Court proceedings was not fair, quite apart from the prejudicial matter which headed the report. The evidence of witnesses called for the defence was suppressed, and the briefest possible resume was given of their evidence. If the remarks did not refer to the plaintiff he challenged his learned friend to say who the perpetrator of these alleged outrages was. He contended that it was unfair comment, that it was prima facie libellous, that the reference there to the perpetrator of the charge was capable of bearing the construction that it was the plaintiff who was the perpetrator of the outrage. He submitted that the Court had not defined whether or not these words were in fact libellous, and did in fact refer to the plaintiff, that that would be a question for the Court or the jury to decide, and that the Court had now only to consider, as it had laid down in previous cases, whether the articles relied upon were capable of defamatory meaning. He submitted that they clearly were. He submitted that the whole tone of the article with the heading "Cape Town Street-prowlers, etc.," preceding the report of the case was prima facie libellous, and then it rested upon his friend to plead his privilege and his fair and bona-fide comment. Unless he could do that, he failed to meet the case. Then again, the article was not the less a libel because certain parts of it might be in favour of the person libelled. A man could not guard himself by making statements which would bear the meaning that the man charged had committed an indictable offence, and then say afterwards that, of course, it remained to be proved that he had committed it. Counsel also contended that the article on the second date referrring to the alleged outrage on the Wynberg line also bore a defamatory meaning.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is the case set down for trial?]

Mr. Upington: No, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose it is not decided whether it shall be tried by jury or not?]

Mr. Upington: No.

Mr. Upington added that if Mr. Palmer had been brought before the Court for contempt he ventured to think that the Court would have taken serious action against him.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that paragraph 5 of the declaration made no reference to the plaintiff.

Mr. Upington admitted that it made no specific reference to the plaintiff, but the plaintiff was the person indicated.

Sir H. Juta said he could not make out now from what his learned friend had said, whether he complained that the report of the proceedings in the Magistrate's Court was false, or whether the report was all right, but that the comments were incorrect.

De Villiers, C.J.: At this stage of the case I do not wish to say anything that might in any way prejudice the defendant at the trial. An exception is taken to paragraphs 4 and 5 of the declaration. In regard to paragraph 4 of the declaration it is impossible for the Court to hold that the passages complained of are not capable of the construction placed upon them by the plaintiff. It is quite possible that either of the parties may desire to have this question tried by jury instead of by the Court, and yet the Court now, by holding that the fourth paragraph discloses no ground of action whatever, would practically be deciding that there was no libel, and although the words are capable of a defamatory meaning, yet the Court would be saying there was no libel, and would be taking upon itself the functions of a jury. If there had only been publication of the report, undoubtedly the Court would have said that such a publication is not capable of being construed in a defamatory sense. But, in addition to the publication of the report, there are certain comments in regard to the trial, and these comments are headed "Men Street-Prowlers in Cape Town on the Look-out for Girl Victims," and, although there is a reservation in one part of the article saying that "it remains to be proved whether the accused is the man who committed the outrage, the defence, as will be seen, being an alibi," yet it is possible that the reader, reading the whole of the comments in connection with the report, might come to the conclusion, I don't say will come to the conclusion, that the plaintiff was indicated as the person who was guilty of the offences named in the article. More than that I do not wish to say at this stage. It is quite possible, if the case came on for trial to-day, that the Court might agree with Sir H. Juta that the defendant is not liable, but in view of the circumstances that this case has still to be tried, and may be tried by a jury, it is better that the Court should not express a further opinion on the point. Moreover, I find in the plea that there is a general defence that the words complained of were printed and published in the public interest on a subject to which is was necessary to direct public attention. The defendants moreover deny that they said or did anything to show that the plaintiff did in fact molest and assault indecently or otherwise ladies and young girls, or that he did in fact indecently or lasciviously assault any young girl, or that the plaintiff was guilty of the said crime. This substantial plea the defendant will have an opportunity of proving at the trial. For the present the Court has to decide in regard to the fourth paragraph, that it was capable of a defamatory meaning. In regard to the fifth paragraph of the declaration, I quite agree with Sir H. Juta that in no sense can that be said to convey a defamatory meaning. It is true that it refers to a case recently tried and commented on, but there is no insinuation whatever in that subsequent article that the plaintiff had been guilty of this assault upon a girl in a railway carriage, and in no way does it connect the plaintiff with the outrage which had taken place. In my opinion, therefore, the exception to paragraph 5 of the declaration is a good one, and must be allowed.

Buchanan, J.: I concur. In regard to the fourth paragraph, seeing that it combined the report of proceedings in a Police Court with comments on those proceedings, including indirect references to the plaintiff, it was quite capable of being construed that the plaintiff was guilty of the crime which was being investigated by the Court. It was not advisable for the press or other people so to comment on pending proceedings as to leave it possible for the public to infer that a person against whom a charge was made was guilty. As his lordship the Chief Justice has pointed out, when the case comes for trial either by a Court or jury, the question of whether there has been an absence of defamation or not will have to be tried, and also whether there has been an absence of malice and a comment in the interests of the public. If the defences pleaded are established at the trial, notwithstanding that the Court now said that this paragraph 4 was capable of defamatory meaning, there may be a verdict for defendant. At present we do not wish to discuss this question. The fifth paragraph of this declaration cannot be construed as in any way applying to the plaintiff, and should therefore be expunged.

The Chief Justice, replying to Mr. Upington, said that the fifth paragraph should be expunged from the declaration.

The plaintiff was ordered to pay the costs of the day.

SUPREME COURT

BRADLEY v. BRADLEY. { 1903. Feb 13th.

Mr. Upington moved for a declaration that respondent, Alfred Enoch Bradley, of Kimberley, now confined in the Valkenberg Asylum, was of unsound mind, and for the appointment of a curator of his person and property. Mr. Buchanan appeared for the respondent.

Dr. Dodds, medical superintendent at the Valkenberg Asylum, spoke to the admission of the respondent on the 16th of December, 1902, from Kimberley, under a judge's order. He was in a demented condition, his mind was very weak, he was very suspicious and irritable and certainly not capable of taking care of himself or managing his own affairs. Replying to Mr. Buchanan, witness said the respondent had told them that he ought to have been sent to Simon's Town, so that he could go home on a man-of-war. That might be explained to some extent by the fact that the respondent was an old naval man. Just before he came to the asylum he developed a tendency to set places on fire.

Mr. Upington suggested that the respondent's wife should be appointed curator. She had been connected with the business for 16 years. It was a large business, and was stated in the petition to be worth £10,000. The parties were married in community of property.

Mr. Buchanan said he saw Mr. Bradley yesterday (Thursday), and although his mind was certainly deranged, in his (counsel's) opinion, the respondent seemed to have an idea that his wife and Mr. Pooley, who was security to some trust bond at Kimberley, should have power to liquidate the business, because he wanted to go to England. The respondent carried on an aerated water business.

Mr. Upington said that formerly Mr. Pooley, who was the well-known secretary of the Loans and Trust Co. in Kimberley, was in charge of the business jointly with Mrs. Bradley, but, in her petition, the petitioner stated that all Mr. Pooley really could do was to look after the books. So far as the practical management of the business was concerned, she would have to do that herself.

De Villiers, C.J., said that for the present the respondent would be declared of unsound mind, and his wife would be appointed curator of his property, but the Court would consider the question of a curator of his person.

VAN RAHT v. VAN BREDA. { 1903. Feb. 13th.

Lease for life—Monthly tenancy —Ejectment.

The plaintiff, being the owner of a farm, allowed the defendant to build a house on it on condition that the defendant should pay one shilling a month as rent for his occupation and should not be entitled to compensation on leaving the premises. After the defendant had been in occupation for some years he received a month's notice to quit. The defendant refused to quit maintaining that he was entitled to remain in occupation for the term of his life.

Held, affirming the Magistrate's decision that the defendant was only a monthly tenant and that, in the absence of any fraudulent conduct on the part of the plaintiff, he was entitled to eject the defendant from the premises.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Acting A.R.M. of Bredasdorp.

From the evidence in the Court below it appeared that the appellant, defendant in the court below, Herman van Raht had tenanted a cottage at Struys Bay and an action for eject-ment had been brought against him in the Magistrate's Court at Bredasdorp by the respondent, Henry H. van Breda, of Zoendalsvallei, who claimed that the cottage was his property, and that the appellant had been in the habit of paying him a monthly rent of 1s. The respondent said that he gave the appellant notice to quit because he had roused a spirit of independence and unwillingness to submit to rules and regulations and customs enforced by him and his predecessors, thereby giving respondent much annoyance and vexation, and he pointed out that if the appellant were moved much better order would be maintained amongst the fishermen. The Magistrate, in his reasons for his judgment, said the defendant through his agent took exception to the jurisdiction of the Court on the ground that the matter involved a question whereby rights in the future could be bound. The plaintiff's agent quoted Section 10, Act 20, 1856. It was clearly proved that the house in question was built on plaintiff's property, and that the defendant was allowed to build the house under certain conditions, and on paying a nominal rent. Defendant formerly left the house for five to seven years without demanding compensation for building, and during his absence the house was let to another party. On defendant's return to Struys Bay he asked to be allowed to reoccupy the house, and to build a stable, and permission was given to him on the old understanding. He (the magistrate) thereupon held that no rights in future were bound, and overruled the exception. The defendant, through his agent, then put in a claim for £500 as compensation, and took exception to the jurisdiction of the Court. After hearing evidence the magistrate came to the conclusion that the claim was an imaginary one, and certainly, if any claim at all, far beyond the value of the house. Plaintiff, in further evidence, clearly proved his right to eject the defendant from the house in question. After carefully weighing all the evidence, he could come to no other conclusion than that plaintiff had proved his case, and he gave judgment accordingly.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for appellant). Mr. Buchanan (for respondent).

Sir H. Juta: The action in the Magistrate's Court was for ejectment, and the whole question is, what were the conditions on which the defendant was allowed to occupy the ground. These conditions were that the lessee was to build a house and to pay rent for the ground. He has paid his nominal rent, and he has built a house.

[Maasdorp, J.: Is not this a case of precarious tenancy?]

No, the evidence does not support any such view. Reasonable occupation of the land must be allowed, for it is not to be supposed that any man will build a house upon land off which he can be turned at a month's notice. The only agreement between appellant and respondent was that if the farmer left the place the house was to go to respondent.

Mr. Buchanan contended that the appellant was only a monthly tenant, and that however hard it might seem on him, as he had voluntarily entered into this arrangement with respondent and had not been induced to do so by any fraud, he must be held to his bargain.

De Villiers, C.J.: Counsel for the appellant has not relied upon the exception taken before the Magistrate, and it is not necessary for the Court to express any opinion on the matter. Upon the merits of the case, however, he contends that the agreement between the parties establishes a lease in favour of the defendant which is to endure for the term of his life, but my opinion is that no such lease is established, or can be established, except by clear and distinct words to that effect. In the present case there is a total absence of any stipulation in the agreement from which such lease could be implied. The defendant himself, in his evidence, admits that the plaintiff gave him a right to build the house, and said that he could build a small or a large house, as he preferred, but he was to pay 12s. per annum as rent. There was no other or further agreement made. Defendant's evidence agrees substantially with the evidence given by the plaintiff, except that the plaintiff says that the lease was not per annum but per month, and that 1s. per month was paid. Then the defendant proceeds to say that the plaintiff did not agree to pay compensation when the defendant left. It is clear that no such arrangement can be inferred as that which has been suggested. It may be a hard case for the defendant, and no doubt in some cases it would be a hardship for a person who has built a house to be turned out at a month's notice; but he knows before he begins the building what he can claim, and it is for him to consider before he builds the house whether he should undertake the work, and trust merely to the generosity or the good nature of the owner of the property. Of course, the owner of land would not be allowed to take advantage of his own wrong where, after fraudulently inducing another person to build on the land in the belief that he would, for a reasonable time, have the use of the building, he cuts short the tenancy before the tenant has had a fair return for his outlay, but no suggestion of the kind has been made in the present case. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

DUMA v. PUMENE. { 1903. Feb. 18th.

Consideration—Nudum pactum—Father of minor child—Lying in expenses.

The father of a minor daughter incurred expenses for her lying in and thereafter entered into an agreement with her seducer for the payment of a certain sum as damages.

Held, that there was a valid consideration for the agreement

This was an appeal from a judgment of the R.M. of Stockenstrom, brought by the plaintiff in the court below against the defendant. The action in the Magistrate's Court was for the delivery of a certain beast, or its value, £16, in consideration of certain loss or damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the seduction of his daughter by the defendant, who, it was alleged, agreed in August last to pay to the plaintiff a beast within one month for such loss or damage. The evidence of the plaintiff was that his daughter had given birth to a child, of which the defendant was the father, and that the latter had said that he would pay a beast in consideration of the loss sustained by the plaintiff in providing for the lying-in expenses of his daughter and otherwise. The plaintiff also stated that the defendant formerly desired to marry his daughter, and that he consented subject to the defendant doing so on condition of his giving his five head of cattle. The Magistrate in dismissing the claim held that if there was an agreement it was without consideration, and that if such consideration did exist, which was denied by the defendant, it was bad because it was founded upon an illegal and immoral arrangement.

Mr. Burton submitted that the defendant must be held liable for the agreement. The R.M. had made an error in dealing with this case as past consideration and in dealing with it as an immoral consideration. He contended that the Magistrate's reasons were incorrect, and that the appeal should be allowed, with costs.

Mr. Searle submitted that there was no consideration at all in the matter. It was known to the plaintiff and his daughter that the defendant was married. The affair occurred two or three years ago. Apparently the defendant took the girl away with him. The parties were Kafirs. The father wanted five head of cattle for his daughter, and it was really to recover these five head of cattle that the action was brought. That was very clear from the reading of the documents in the case. Counsel urged that a proper judgment was absolution from the instance.

Mr. Burton (for the appellant): The respondent had made an agreement and had received consideration for it, he must therefore be held to that agreement. The Magistrate is quite wrong in treating the consideration as immoral. The consideration appellant gave was not the immoral use of his daughter's person, but the loss of her services and the money expended on her lying-in expenses, for which the respondent was legally liable.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (for respondent): Here, if there was any consideration at all, it was decidedly immoral. Both the mother and the daughter well knew that defendant was a married man, and yet the daughter consented to receive his attentions, and her mother connived at her doing so. See Matshoba v. Klaas (10 E.D.C., 135), Divisional Council of Barkly West v. De Pass (6 H.C., 137).

The father gave no consideration. He was quite willing that his daughter should go and live with respondent if he only paid the five head of cattle. This is really a question of "lobolo," which usage the Court will not favour. Apparently the defendant did take the girl away with him. Then there is no proof that the girl was a minor at the time of this occurrence, and if she was not the father could have no right of action for damages. I submit that the Magistrate's decision was right

Mr. Burton (in reply) asked only that the case should be remitted back to the Magistrate for further evidence and for trial on the merits.

De Villiers, C.J.: On this appeal the Court can only deal with the record as it stands, and on the face of the record it appears that all the Magistrate has dealt with has been the exceptions. Mr. Sackville-West took exception to the summons "inasmuch as no date or place is named where the alleged seduction took place. Mr. Adendorff holds that the summons is not for the seduction, but for the fulfilment of an agreement made in August last in consequence of such seduction." This exception the Magistrate overruled. Mr. Sackville-West then took a further exception that the agreement quoted by Mr. Adendorff being for a past consideration is nudum pactum. This exception was upheld by the Magistrate, and the case dismissed with costs. This is the sole point which the Court has now to deal with. In my opinion, the Magistrate was wholly mistaken. The agreement between the parties is set out as follows: "I, the undersigned, hereby acknowledge my indebtedness to Duma for damages I caused him by seducing his daughter, and hereby promise to pay him one head of cattle within one month from date and four more head within a reasonable time." There is, on the face of the agreement, an allegation of consideration, viz., damages which had been caused by the plaintiff. The only way in which damage could have been caused the plaintiff was those he sustained as father of the minor child, for example, having to support this child during her illness, and having in consequence been put to certain expense. Now the claim is upon an agreement made in which a compromise was arrived at by which the defendant was to pay to the plaintiff one head of cattle within one month of the date of the agreement and four more head of cattle within a reasonable time. But that was a compromise for the damages which the plaintiff had sustained as father of the minor child in the way of lying-in expenses and maintenance of the child of the daughter. The question of fact will still have to be tried by the Magistrate: whether the girl was a minor child, whether the father was put to any expense in respect to the lying-in or maintenance. It is said there could not have been any such expense incurred, but I am inclined to think that such expense must have been incurred if this evidence is correct because the plaintiff said: "The defendant asked me for time, and was agreeable to pay the expenses incurred by the seduction and lying-in expenses." From that I gather that there were some lying-in expenses which the father was put to on behalf of his daughter. The plea must therefore be allowed, as the Magistrate was wrong in upholding the exception, and the case will be remitted to the Magistrate to try upon its merits. The Magistrate will take evidence as to the expense incurred by the father as to whether the girl was of age at the time, and, if the girl was not of age, whether the father had incurred any expense whatever. The appeal must be allowed with costs in this Court, and the case remitted to the Magistrate to try upon the merits.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff should be allowed to give his evidence again, so that he may give evidence on the points now raised, because the evidence that he has already given has been confined to the questions raised by the exception.

Ex parte PATERSON. { 1903. Feb. 13th.

The petition of Robert Paterson set forth that at a meeting of the Land and Estate Company, of which petitioner is the chairman, held at Glasgow, in March, 1900, it was resolved that it was desirable to reconstruct the company, and that with a view thereto the company be voluntarily liquidated and William Dunlop appointed official liquidator. This was duly confirmed at an extraordinary meeting of the company held in April, 1900. Mr. Dunlop proceeded to liquidate the company, and in the course of doing so found it necessary to transfer certain immovable property, situated at Mafeking, within this colony, but the Registrar of Deeds at Vryburg refused to allow the transfer until the appointment of William Dunlop as liquidator was confirmed by the Supreme Court. Accordingly such an order was now asked for.

Mr. Benjamin moved.

After hearing counsel as to the power of the Court to confirm such an appointment, the Chief Justice suggested that the better course would be to authorise the Registrar of Deeds to allow transfer to be passed.

Ultimately the Court granted a rule nisi, calling upon all concerned to show cause by the 20th inst. why William Dunlop, as liquidator of the company, should not be authorised to transfer the property named in the petition, rule to be published once in the "Government Gazette" and once in the "Bechuanaland News," Vryburg.

THOMAS V THOMAS.

This was an application by Thomas Rowland Thomas for leave to sue his wife by edictal citation for divorce. There was a further application for an interdict restraining the parting with certain moneys.

The petition set forth that petitioner was at present living at East London On August 13, 1893, he was married in community of property to one Mabel Jane Price at Bloemfontein, in the Baptist Church. In October, 1898, his wife mentioned casually that she desired to visit her relatives in the Cape Colony, to which petitioner agreed, but no date for her departure was mentioned. The next day, however, while petitioner was on duty at the Railway Works, where he was employed, his wife left Bloemfontein, en route for this colony. This petitioner discovered when a letter arrived from his wife dated at Springfontein, stating that she had left him for good and would never return to him. Petitioner had not seen his wife since then, but he had in compliance with her wishes, remitted to her monthly from £10 to £15 sterling, through her cousins at Queen's Town, Messrs. Price Brothers. Petitioner frequently wrote his wife letters asking her to return, but she did not reply to any of them. Petitioner resided in Cape Town for a year and nine months after the outbreak of hostilities, after which he went to Wales to visit his relatives. During this time he still continued writing to his wife, but received no reply. Petitioner finally decided to return to South Africa with a view to seeing his wife and effecting a reconciliation, and left England on December 6, 1902, with that object. On arrival in South Africa petitioner went straight to Queen's Town and ascertained that his wife had been living at East London for some time past. Petitioner thereupon went down to East London, and on going to the boarding-house where his wife had been living was informed that she had left for England with a man named Ballister. Petitioner made inquiries at the East London office of the Union-Castle Company and was informed by the booking clerk that a gentleman and a lady had booked a second-class cabin under the name of Mr. and Mrs. Ballister. Petitioner had information from the Union-Castle Company at Cape Town that Mr. and Mrs. Ballister continued the voyage in the Scot after reaching Cape Town and in the same cabin. Petitioner did not know where his wife had gone beyond the fact that she must have landed at Southampton, to which port the Scot was bound. Petitioner had been informed by his wife's landlady that his wife was frequently intoxicated owing to a habit of taking drugs in excess. Wherefore petitioner was desirous of instituting an action claiming (a) that the bond of marriage subsisting between him and his wife may be dissolved; (b) that the said Mabel Jane Thomas (born Price) may be declared to have forfeited all benefits under the said marriage in community of property; (c) that he may have such other and further relief as to the Court may seem meet, together with the costs of this action. Wherefore he prayed that the Court would allow him to sue his wife by edictal citation, by reason of her adultery as aforesaid; further, that the Court would be pleased to give directions as to the mode of serving citation, and all other necessary processes, and to fix the time for the defendant's appearance to the said citation

As to the interdict, the petitioner stated that he was aware that there was a considerable sum of money standing to his wife's credit in the local branch of the Standard Bank, and there was also a promissory note made in her favour for £200 by one Muller, to whom she had advanced the money. Petitioner was afraid that his wife would withdraw such moneys as soon as she was aware of this action, and therefore he asked for a temporary interdict restraining the local manager of the Standard Bank from parting with the moneys belonging to the defendant in the possession of the bank, and also restraining Muller from parting with £200 or any part thereof.

Mr. Upington for petitioner; Respondent in default.

De Villiers, C.J., asked whether personal service on the defendant could be effected.

Mr. Upington said he was not sure, as all the information they had was that the defendant must have landed at Southampton.

The Court granted leave to sue by edictal citation, returnable on May 15, personal service to be effected if possible. Failing that, two publications in the "Daily Telegraph," London; leave was also given to serve the intendit and notice of trial with the citation. An interdict was also granted as prayed, pending the action to be instituted by plaintiff against defendant.

SUPREME COURT

EDMONDS V. EDMONDS. { 1903. Feb. 16th.

This was an action for the restoration of conjugal rights brought by the plaintiff, Arthur Edmonds, of Cape Town, against his wife, Julia Annetta Edmonds, and, failing that, a decree of divorce.

The declaration stated that the plaintiff resided at Cape Town and his wife at Sea Point. The parties were married in England in September, 1900, and there was no issue of the marriage. In February, 1902, the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously deserted the plaintiff, and she still refused to return and cohabit with the plaintiff and restore his conjugal rights. Plaintiff, therefore, claimed a decree of conjugal rights, failing compliance therewith, a decree of divorce.

Mr. Upington for plaintiff. Defendant in default.

Arthur Edmonds, the plaintiff, said that on the 22nd September, 1900, he was married to the defendant at Hampstead, London. In October, 1900, he came to South Africa with his wife, and resided at Weston House, Sea Point. His married life was not a happy one. Previous to coming to South Africa, he had to complain to his wife about her extravagance. He was a traveller for Clark and Co., and was earning £25 a month. In February, 1902, the defendant left him. She was discontented with her married life. In June he received a letter from her through a law agent, and he met her and endeavoured to settle the differences. He was willing to receive her and settle everything. When she originally left him in February, 1902, there was no cause for her action. He had written to her several times, and finally he issued a summons. She replied recently to his law agents stating that she was returning the wedding ring, and, as she had told him a hundred times, she would never return to him.

The Court granted a rule calling upon the respondent to restore conjugal rights, rule to be returnable on the 28th February, failing which respondent to show cause by the 12th March why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

Postea (March 12th). The rule was made absolute.

ALBRECHT V. ALBRECHT.

This was an action in which the plaintiff, John A. Albrecht, of St. James's, sued his wife, Maud Augusta Albrecht (born Cox), for the restoration of conjugal rights and, failing compliance, a decree of divorce.

The declaration set forth that the parties were married on the 13th May, 1897, at Reading, in England, in community of property, and there were three children of the marriage. In September, 1902, the defendant wrongfully, unlawfully, and maliciously deserted her husband, and she had since gone to England. Petitioner asked for an order requiring respondent to return and cohabit with him, or, failing compliance, a decree of divorce, with custody of the children.

Mr. Gardiner for plaintiff. Defendant in default.

John Auguste Albrecht, the plaintiff, said that he was married at Reading, England, in May, 1897. At that time he was studying for his profession of civil engineer. In August, 1901, he came to this country, and for a time the defendant and he lived happily together, but, later, his wife got very nasty, and commenced to quarrel with him. The quarrelling continued when they went to St. James's to live, where she left him, and wrote a letter stating that she would not return. She asked him to advance her passage money to England, but he refused. There were three children by the marriage, and he asked for custody of them. In July, 1897, he entered into a deed of settlement with the defendant. If she would return, he was willing to settle everything.

De Villiers, C.J.: What was her reason for leaving you?

Witness: She said she did not love me any more, and did not care to stay with me. Replying to further questions, witness said he did not advance money to the defendant to proceed to England. He gave her her own money back. He knew she was going to England, and he tried his utmost to induce her not to go, but she went.

The Court granted a rule calling upon the respondent to restore conjugal rights, the rule to be served personally, and to be returnable by the 15th May, failing which respondent to show cause by 31st May why a decree of divorce should not be granted, petitioner to have the custody of the children.

WATSON V. HAUPT.

Mr. Upington, on behalf of the defendant, moved to have judgment signed against the plaintiff in terms of a certain consent paper.

Judgment in terms of consent paper.

M

HADLEY V. LEONARD. { 1903. Feb. 16th.

Rei vindicatio—Litis contestatio— Loss or destruction of thing claimed.

A horse belonging to the plaintiff having been lost he found it in the possession of the defendant who had released it from the pound alleging and possibly believing that the horse belonged to him (the defendant). The defendant refused to restore the horse although the plaintiff afforded him proof which, in the opinion of the Court, ought to have satisfied the defendant that the horse belonged to the plaintiff. The plaintiff brought an action for the restoration of the horse or its value, and after the pleadings had been closed the horse died.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed and that, as the defendant retained the horse after he had sufficient reason to know that it belonged to the plaintiff, he was liable for its full value notwithstanding its death.

This was an action for the delivery of a certain mare and the recovery of £20 damages for depreciation, or in the alternative for £40, the value of the said mare, and £20 damages, with interest and costs of suit.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff resided at Observatory-road, and the defendant at Diep River. On the 7th November last the defendant unlawfully claimed and took possession of a certain mare, the property of the plaintiff, which at that time he had at the Claremont Flats pound. The mare was at the time of the value of £40, but had since depreciated in value, owing to the treatment of the defendant, and damages to the extent of £20 had been sustained by the plaintiff. The plaintiff called upon the defendant to restore the horse and pay damages for depreciation, or in the alternative, he sued for £40, the former value, and £20 by way of damages, with interest and costs of suit. In his plea, the defendant admitted that he took possession of a certain mare at that time in the Claremont Flats pound, but he denied the allegations in the second paragraph, especially that the said horse was the property of the plaintiff, and claimed that the horse was his (defendant's) property, and he also denied that the plaintiff had sustained any damage for which he (defendant) was liable.

Mr. Benjamin for plaintiff. Mr. Upington for defendant.

Charles Arthur Hadley, plaintiff, sworn, stated that on the 20th January, 1902, he purchased a number of horses in the Queen's Town district, including the mare in question. The horses were taken to Mr. Cruywagen's stable at Salt River. The mare was of a grey or roan colour, and was two years old in January, 1902. She might be called a blue schimmel. The left ear was bent over the top, resembling the effects of a bite. All the horses were untrained. The mare was marked on the off hind fetlock. Plaintiff sold the remainder of the horses to the Hon. Wm. Ross. Subsequently he sold the mare to Messrs. Bailey and Curtis. In October a boy was sent to Newlands with two mares to the purchasers. Some weeks afterwards he met Mr. Curtis at Johannesburg, and in consequence of what he heard, he communicated with his wife at Observatory. Plaintiff had received a letter from the Chief Constable at Malmesbury reporting the loss of the mare, and describing, amongst other marks, a split ear. Plaintiff had received no notice of the death of the animal from the defendant. The defendant replied to plaintiff's attorney stating that the mare in question was stolen from him.

Cross-examined: He received the mare from Mr. J. D. Morgan, French Town, Cape Colony. The ear produced was a facsimile of the left ear of the mare. To be accurate, he would call her a grey roan mare. She was supposed to be an own sister to Boy Blue. Plaintiff did not get her from a jockey called Ansley, and he had no pedigree with her. His boy tied the mare to a tree at Messrs. Bailey and Curtis's yard at Newlands.

Louisa Hadley, wife of plaintiff, said that, in consequence of a communication from her husband from Johannesburg, she inserted an advertisement in the papers describing the two mares that had been lost. In answer to an advertisement from the pound master at Claremont Flats Pound, she went to Mr. Leonard's house to see the mare that he had claimed. The defendant said that it was very strange that two mares should be so much alike, but admitted that the mare was the property of witness's husband, and assured her that the mare would be well fed and cared for. The boy was sent up for the mare, but the defendant refused to deliver her. Later in the evening witness saw the mare at the stable door, and the defendant said that, in consequence of what the Hon. Mr. Ross had told him he would not give her up.

Cross-examined: She did not tell Mr. Leonard that her husband got the mare from Ansley, the jockey. The defendant was told that another mare had been the property of Ansley. She told the defendant that the mare was own sister to Boy Blue, but she did not tell him it was a racing pony. The defendant did not say that if the witness could get the breeder, the matter would be simplified.

De Villiers, C.J.: Did you get the other mare back?—Yes, my lord; we got it also from the pound.

The Hon. Wm. Ross stated that he had never received any communication from the defendant about the mare.

Isaac R. J. Cruywagen said he was the father-in-law of Mr. Hadley, and remembered some horses coming down for the latter at the end of January. Two were taken to witness's stables at Observatory and the others were sold. The horse now in question was in witness's stables. The roan mare and the bay mare were sent to Newlands. Witness heard no more about them until his daughter received a communication.

By De Villiers, C.J.: The bay mare had been in witness's possession about two months, and the other one for three months. Witness was formerly an auctioneer to the Corporation of Cape Town. At present he resided in the Transvaal. Witness had been an owner of and had many dealings with horses.

Examination continued: In consequence of the communication his daughter received witness went on November 14 to Newlands stable, but found out nothing. Later, he saw an advertisement about an auction of three horses. At the pound, he heard that the mare was claimed. The defendant said that the mare was not at the stable, but that he would bring it up later. Witness identified the mare when the defendant brought it up. Witness gave defendant a description of the mare before seeing it. Witness claimed the mare on behalf of Mr. Hadley, and the defendant replied that if it was plaintiff's horse it was his horse also, and he refused to give it up. Previous to that the defendant agreed to give the mare over.

Cross-examined: He had not the money at the time when defendant asked for the pound fees. His auctioneering business had been confined to vegetables at the Early Morning Market. When the boy returned after delivering the ponies, witness did not ask him if they were delivered all right. Witness did not see any mark of a kick when the mare arrived in January. The mark on the left ear caused it to bend backwards. When Mrs. Hadley and witness went down to see the defendant, the latter asked Mrs. Hadley to give a description, but witness described the mare. They went down to the stable, and witness pointed out the mark on the left hind leg. The defendant said that if witness could prove that the mare was in plaintiff's possession prior to July, 1902, that he would be willing to hand her over, on condition that she should not be sold pending inquiry. When Mrs. Hadley said that the mare was an own sister to Boy Blue, the defendant said that nothing would be simpler than to produce the breeder.

W. Palmer said he knew the mare in question, having had the use of it for about two months off and on. He heard about the finding of the mare, and when he went down, he identified the animal. He had no doubt whatever about the identity of the mare.

Cross-examined: The moment witness saw the mare he identified it as the one he had had from Mr. Hadley. There was no slit at all in the ear.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Witness was quite satisfied, judging by the whole appearance, that it was the same horse.

Cross-examination continued: The horse had only one cut on the right hind leg. It received that mark from a pole while with witness.

Melville Wynne Lloyd, a broker, said he knew the mare in question, having gone to Hadley's place on several occasions with a view to purchasing it. In November, in consequence of a conversation he had with Mrs. Hadley, he went and saw a horse which he identified as the mare he had seen at Hadley's. Defendant said he had bought the horse from the Hon. W. Ross, and seemed at first inclined to give the horse up, but later on said he would have to see Mr. Ross first.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Witness was positive it was the same horse.

John Tregarthen Birse, a veterinary surgeon, said one Saturday Mr. Hadley came to witness with the jawbone of a horse. As near as possible, the horse had been about three years old.

Cross-examined: Judging from the condition of the teeth, the horse could not have been five years old.

G. F. Theron said he was pound-master at Claremont, and on October 10 last two horses were brought to him for trespassing—one a bay mare and one a roan mare. Leonard came to witness the morning after the horses were advertised in November, and asked to see the horses. Witness asked him if his horse had got any particular mark, and he replied, "None." Witness then took him to the paddock, and when they were five or six yards away from the horses, Leonard said, "Did you see anything the matter with the horse's ear?" Witness said, "Yes, I saw that before." Witness asked Leonard where he lost his horse, and Leonard replied that he had lost it out of a stable at Malmesbury last July. He said he had bought the horse at Clanwilliam, and witness replied that it was rather strange that the horse should travel all the way to Cape Town. He also pointed out the manner in which the two mares agreed, as if they had been together before. When Leonard saw the horse, he said it was his, but as he was rather doubtful about it, he said he would come back the next day and see about it. Witness asked Leonard what age his was, and Leonard replied, "Rising six." Witness replied that the mare in the pound was rising four, and Leonard said that if that were so, it could not be his horse. The next day he came with a friend, claimed the horse, paid for the advertising and pound fees, and took the horse away.

Witness told him he must be satisfied that it was his bona fide property. On November 15 Mrs. Hadley came and claimed the horse, and asked what had become of it, and witness told her that Mr. Leonard had released it on the 7th.

This closed the case for the plaintiff

For the defence, Mr. Upington called

William Albert Patrick Glynn Leonard, the defendant, who said that in June last he was in charge of the Field Intelligence in the Clanwilliam and Van Rhyn's Dorp districts. He purchased at Clanwilliam a horse from one Nel, a farmer in the Calvinia district. He obtained from the Deputy-Administrator a permit to purchase this horse. In July witness went to Malmesbury, taking with him this mare and another one. He had then to go to Matjesfontein on business, and he left the horse behind. When he returned on July 16 or 17, he found the mare gone. He made inquiries, and then gave information to the police. In the description he then gave he said that the mare had no marks. He gave the age as four years, that being what Nel had told him. He did not examine the mare himself to find out her age, as he was no judge. On November 5 witness saw the notice in the "Cape Times" advertising the two mares in the pound. He went and saw the poundmaster, and when the latter asked if the mare had any marks witness replied that she had no brand marks. Then the poundmaster asked if she had any other marks, and witness replied that he would know her by her ear, ad also said that she had a saddle mark. The poundmaster then replied that that was not witness's mare, as she was only three years old. He also asked if witness's mare had been shod, and on witness replying that it had the poundmaster said that this mare had never been shod. When they went to see the mare witness recognised her at once, and he also pointed out by the nail marks that she had been shod. Witness did not take the horse away then, because he said he would get somebody down who knew more about horses than he did. Next day witness went down with Mr. Blake and another gentleman, and found that the poundmaster already had the paper made out that the mare was his (witness's property. He told witness that he had better pay the pound fees and the advertising and take the horse away, which witness did. When he took the mare home he did not further examine her. The mare was used under saddle by Mr. Blake and others. On November 15 Mrs. Handley came and asked if witness were Major Leonard, and on his replying in the affirmative she said, "I have come for my mare." Witness asked her what mare, and she replied, "The grey mare you took out of the pound." Witness asked her for a description of the mare, and also asked if she had advertised the loss of the mare, and she replied that she had done so that morning. She said she had bought the mare in company with another racehorse from the jockey Ansley. She never gave witnessness a description of the horse beyond saying that it was a grey mare. She refused to give any information, because she said she refused to give herself away. When Cruywagen came he gave the description of the horse as a grey mare with the left ear twisted over forwards, and a saddle mark made by a small saddle. He said that mark was not on the wither, and he also said he had a particular private mark, a kick on the leg, which he would know the mare by. He was not certain on which leg the mark was. Witness, Cruywagen, and the others then present went down to see the mare, and had actually passed it without Cruywagen recognising it, until Mr. Heyman called out from the gateway, and asked what he should do with the mare. Cruywagen then turned round and said, "There is the mare." He then examined the horse, and pointed out a particular kick mark. The horse was then examined, and it was found that the ear was not twisted forward but twisted back, and also that the saddle mark was on the wither, and not on the back. When Cruywagen came out he asked the constable if he had described the horse correctly, and the latter replied that he had, with the exception of the colour, that mare not being grey. With regard to the kick mark, witness afterwards examined it, and from its appearance he would judge that it had been made not more than three weeks previously. Mr. Blake had had the use of the mare for three or four days. Witness had told Hadley that if he could prove that the mare was his property previous to July he should certainly have it Witness, however was perfectly satisfied that the mare was his property. Witness had never said that he purchased the mare from the Hon. W. Ross. Defendant did not tell plaintiff's wife to come back on the following Monday to take over the mare. He was quite willing to hand over the mare, if the plaintiff could prove that it was in his possession prior to July, 1902.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He was willing to give it up on those conditions, because he was certain that plaintiff could not prove that it was in his possession prior to that time.

Examination continued: When the plaintiff's party came for the mare, Palmer said that he had broken her in, and described a mark received in that process which defendant could not find. The boy stated that the right ear was split, and that there was a hole like a shot through it. Subsequently the boy recognised the mare as the property of his master. Defendant refused to give the mare up on the description given to him. Mrs. Hadley said that the mare was an own sister to Boy Blue, and defendant said that if she got the breeder, he would consider that evidence sufficient. The mare died from "blowing up" on the 13th January. During the time she was in his possession, from October till January, he took very good care of her, and he considered that the treatment had enhanced her value.

Cross-examined: He was astonished to hear the Hon. Wm. Ross say that he did not know him. When the mare took ill, defendant could not conveniently obtain a veterinary surgeon. Defendant was a cartage contractor, and had a good many horses. When the mare died, he did not notify the fact to the plaintiff nor to his attorneys. Defendant was Intelligence Officer at Malmesbury, and could say that all the horses were not branded. Defendant purchased the mare from Mr. Nel. The Chief Constable at Malmesbury was wrong in his reply when he described the mare to defendant.

By De Villiers, C.J.: The mare might have found her way from Malmesbury to Claremont, via Uitvlugt.

Cross-examination continued: Defendant did not meet a man who identified the mare on the 10th January, when defendant was driving at Diep River. The statements conflicting defendant's by Mrs. Hadley, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Palmer were wrong. Defendant did not advertise, as there was no paper at Malmesbury.

Constable Terblance, stationed at Diep River, said that on the 15th November last he was called to the defendant's place at Diep River, where he saw Mrs. Hadley and Mr. Cruywagen. The defendant asked Mr. Cruywagen to give a description of the mare, and he said that she was a grey mare, with a mark on the left ear, a sore back, and a kick mark on the hind leg. In September witness went to the Malmesbury district, and made inquiries.

Cross-examined: Witness did not care to mix up in the affair at all. He did not take particular notice of what transpired. With the exception of the colour, the description given by Mrs. Hadley was correct.

Robert Edward Blake stated that he knew the mare over which the dispute had arisen. He had her in his possession in November last, and noticed that she had a bent ear and marks on the wither and the back. The mark on the wither would be caused by a small riding saddle.

Cross-examined: He noticed the bent ear at once.

This concluded the evidence.

Mr. Upington (for defendant): Defendant was not a mala fide possessor of the horse, and, therefore, was not responsible for the loss of the horse.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Even if he was a bona fide possessor ought he not to have given up the horse when the claim of the plaintiff was known to him?]

I submit not. Voet (6, 1, 34.)

[Counsel quoted from a translation of Voet, and De Villiers, C.J., thereupon referred to the original.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: Should not mala fide possessor read bona fide?]

I see that it should, but even so the defendant was prepared to hand over the mare, if the plaintiffs had shown that she was theirs, hence Leonard's possession was bona fide. The animal having died without fault on our part they cannot, in any case, recover value.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The defendants gave no notice that the animal was dead.]

They were under no obligation to do so. Then again the mare had been sold and delivered to the servants of Curtis and Bailey.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no proof of delivery.]

Yes, the horse was taken over to the purchaser by the instructions of the vendor.

Mr. Benjamin was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: I quite agree with the contention of the defendant's counsel that the onus of proving ownership lies with the plaintiff, and in my opinion he has done so satisfactorily. In saying this I do not rely so much upon the evidence of particular marks as upon the general evidence of identification. It appears that the plaintiff had been in possession of the horse for a considerable time, but I do not depend so much on his evidence as on that of Mrs. Hadley, and Messrs. Lloyd, Palmer, and Cruywagen. All these witnesses had known the horse before it was lost. The horse had been in Cruywagen's possession a considerable time, and he was positive that the horse he saw in the pound was the one in question. There was another circumstance—the two mares were lost at the same time, and, according to the evidence of the Poundmaster, they seemed attached to each other throughout. That was a very important circumstance. Defendant's counsel has laid stress on the fact that there was some difference in the description that appeared in the advertisement and that given by the plaintiff, but we all knew how difficult it is to describe a horse that has two colours running into each other. It was extremely difficult to write it down on paper. The plaintiff has said that it might fairly be described as an iron grey mare, but at the same time it was so nearly a roan that the description as a roan would not be wrong, in fact, it seems that it might more properly be so described. Then we must also look at the fact that the advertisement was inserted by Mrs. Hadley, and naturally she could not give such a minute description as the plaintiff himself. All the witnesses who identified the mare had no doubt whatever that the mare belonged to the plaintiff, and the defendant himself, according to the evidence of the Poundmaster, was very doubtful, extremely doubtful, about the mare. Afterwards, the defendant was willing to hand it over upon payment of the amount of the pound fees, but on reconsideration of the matter he thought that he was not justified in delivering up the mare. Then we have the fact that the mare was bought at Clanwilliam, and lost at Malmesbury, and we have the extremely improbable circumstance that the mare would have wandered—it is not suggested that she was stolen—in the way she must have wandered if she came from Malmesbury. It was extremely improbable that she would wander from Malmesbury, and instead of going back to Clanwilliam turn in the direction of Cape Town, and then when she came near there turn from Cape Town towards Claremont. The plaintiff has proved his ownership. The question arises whether, notwithstanding the death of the mare, the plaintiff is entitled to recover her full value as it was at the time the defendant obtained possession of her. If she had died before litis contestatio then, according to Voet (6, 1, 34), the defendant—who cannot be regarded as a thief—would not, in the absence of proof of negligence, have been liable. But the mare died after litis contestatio. While she was alive, and in the defendant's possession, the plaintiff gave him satisfactory proof of his ownership, and the defendant himself was doubtful as to his own ownership. It was therefore a case in which the possessor having good reason to know that the mare did not belong to him chose to litigate as to her ownership rather than to restore her. In such a case, according to Voet, even a bona fide possessor would be liable for the loss if, at all events, such loss would not have occurred while the animal was in the possession of the plaintiff. It is in evidence that the plaintiff had sold the mare, and that she was lost while being sent for delivery to the purchaser. I have thus far assumed that the mare's death is not attributable to the defendant's negligence, but, as the case stands, such negligence may fairly be presumed. She died, as it appears, from being over-fed on mealies, and that fact by itself is sufficient to throw on the defendant the burden of disproving his negligence. The defendant is, in my opinion, liable for the full value of the mare, namely, £40, for which judgment must be given, with costs.

Buchanan, J., concurred, and said that he had only one remark to make, and that was as to whether the possession by the defendant was mala fide or bona fide. The defendant himself had stated that the mare he bought was five years old, and that at the time he took possession of this mare it would be rising six. The mare of which he took possession was only rising four years, and he must have known when he took the mare away that it was not the mare he had lost.

Mr. Benjamin asked for the expenses of the plaintiff as a necessary witness.

Mr. Upington pointed out that, while the plaintiff was now in the Transvaal, in the summons and the declaration he was stated to be resident at Observatory-road.

De Villiers, C.J.: It appears that the plaintiff was a necessary witness, and at the time when his evidence was required he was residing in the Transvaal. Now, without laying down any general rule, I am of opinion, that this is a case in which the plaintiff, although residing in the Transvaal, should have his expenses as a witness.

Buchanan, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

REVIEW.

REX V. GERT BOSTANDER, ALIAS GERT PHILIPS. } 1903, Feb 17th.

Buchanan, J., mentioned the above case, which had come before him as Judge of the week, for review. He said: The defendant was charged with forging the name of Mrs. Van Wyk to a permit for a bottle of brandy. The evidence in this case is altogether insufficient to support the conviction. There probably might have been a conviction if all the facts alleged had been properly proved, but we cannot sustain a conviction for a charge of this nature without evidence to the facts. The defendant gave another person a written order, on a licensed dealer, signed by Mrs. Van Wyk, for a bottle of brandy, and a bottle of brandy was sent to Mrs. Van Wyk. The barman says that Mrs. Van Wyk told him certain things in the course of a conversation, but that is not evidence. There is no evidence that Mrs. Van Wyk did not sign the order, or that any person had been defrauded. The papers have been submitted to the Attorney-General, and the Attorney-General declines to support the conviction.

DE KOCK V. WEINTROB.

Partnership—Terms—Evidence.

This was an action brought by Samuel Antony de Kock against Louis Weintrob, both of Paarl, to recover £188, in respect of the sale of a number of mules.

The declaration set out that the parties both resided at the Paarl, and that since the 19th June, 1902, the defendant had sold for the plaintiff ten mules for £160, two for £34, in respect to which £17 had been paid by the defendant, and two for which he still owed £11, so that judgment was asked for a total amount of £188. The defendant's plea was that he had been in partnership with the plaintiff, and that they had agreed to share equally the profits and losses arising on the transactions, that the mules referred to in paragraph 2 of the declaration were sold on behalf of the partnership, and that the defendant had received moneys for which he had always been ready and willing to account to the partnership. Plaintiff had also received larger sums of money, for which he had not accounted to the partnership. Defendant had disbursed sums amounting to £12 2s. 6d. for and on behalf of the said partnership, which had not been paid by the plaintiff. Defendant had always been ready and willing, and now tendered to the plaintiff any sum which might be found due to the plaintiff on an examination of the accounts of the partnership.

The replication was a denial of the partnership.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Close) for plaintiff. Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington) for defendant.

Mr. Benjamin applied for an amendment in the declaration by joining as co-plaintiff and partner Abraham Johannes Muller.

Buchanan, J.: Is there any objection?

Sir H. Juta: That is an entirely new case. Our case is that we were in partnership with the plaintiff. Apparently the plaintiff's case to be put now is that he was in partnership with this man Muller.

Mr. Benjamin: I would not press the matter. The plaintiff himself (De Kock) actually bought the mules, but as a matter of fact it was well known in the district that he was in partnership with this man Muller, and as a matter of fact, the cheques that were put in and the promissory notes were all signed by De Kock and Muller.

Samuel Antoni de Kock, plaintiff, said that he attended a sale at Klaapmuts on 19th June last. There he met Messrs. Huyssen, Swarts, and Weintrob, the two former of whom asked him if he would join them in the purchase of some mules. A Mr. Van Eyk said he could have the mules for £16 each, and plaintiff purchased 366 mules at £14 each. The mules were purchased out of hand for cash. Plaintiff instructed Mr. Van Eyk to go on with the sale on plaintiff's behalf. Altogether 197 mules were resold on plaintiff's account for a sum of £3,303 10s. The defendant then came over to plaintiff and asked him to give him a chance. Defendant said that he was a countryman of plaintiff's, and could sell the mules for him. Plaintiff told him that he was in partnership, and could not give him any allowance, but promised to give him £50 if he assisted in the selling of the mules. Defendant pressed for more, but plaintiff said that if the sale was a good one, he might leave the matter to him. That night defendant suggested taking the mules to his kraal, and next day sold some of the mules, and brought the cash to plaintiff. The second day he handed the cash short, but said that he would be responsible for the balance. Ten mules were subsequently sold by the defendant to a Mr. Supeir, and as the money was not forthcoming, plaintiff interviewed the purchaser, and in consequence of what he said, he interviewed the defendant, and told him that he thought he was up to some mischief. When he threatened to fight the defendant in a bar the latter laughed at him. Plaintiff had to go to Fraserburg to recover some mules that had been sold, and when he returned, he met the defendant with a number of Jews. Plaintiff told him to settle the outstandings, and defendant said he would, if plaintiff would give him £1 on every mule sold. Defendant said that he was in partnership with plaintiff. The mules were bought on behalf of Muller and plaintiff from Van Eyk. Defendant never paid a penny for any of the mules. Plaintiff was willing to pay defendant the £50 he promised him when he settled the outstanding amounts.

Cross-examined: Plaintiff had a big loss on the transaction. Plaintiff thought it unnecessary to produce his pocket-book when he made the sworn declaration to produce all documents. The defendant sold twenty-five mules for over £200. When the mules were removed from the defendants' place there were only 24 left. The sale by Ripley and Balfour did not go off very well, and the offer to purchase the lot was made through Van Eyk. If Mr. Ripley would swear that the defendant carried on all the negotiations, it would be untrue. If Honson would say that he heard plaintiff say that he was in partnership with the defendant it would be untrue. If Mr. Stephanus Malan would say that plaintiff referred him to the defendant to purchase the mules it would also be untrue. He arranged with Muller previous to the sale to go into partnership if there was a chance of a bargain. Plaintiff had no document at present in his possession to show that Muller and he were in partnership prior to the sale, but the Court could see a cheque signed "De Kock and Muller." It was true that the cheque was signed after the dispute arose. The original promissory note had only been signed by plaintiff. When the settlement was made with Van Eyk, plaintiff could swear that Muller's name was mentioned. At Bergl's office Weintrob claimed to be a partner, and plaintiff did not offer him a third share, but offered him "a first." It was true that he had said that he would sooner pay £100 than have a dispute with a man like defendant. Defendant was keeping the mules at his kraal for nothing, but he was well paid with £50 for two days. Plaintiff knew of heaps of actions against the defendant, and it was not on account of these that the defendant's name was deleted from the contract.

Re-examined: The defendant's name never appeared in any single transaction. His name did not appear on a single document.

Chas. Hitchcock, a clerk in the employ of Messrs. Van Eyk, auctioneers, produced the books showing Mr. De Kock's name entered for the sale of 397 mules.

Cross-examined: Witness could not say if the defendant spoke to plaintiff at the sale that day.

Abraham Johannes Muller said that he knew both the plaintiff and defendant. He entered into partnership with the former in May last. He was up-country purchasing sheep in June, and his partner was looking after mules at Klapmuts. When he came back he went up to Weintrob's place and took the mules away. Witness went with plaintiff to defendant to get money due for mules sold, and defendant said that he was in partnership with plaintiff. The plaintiff said he would smash his nose if he would say such a thing.

Cross-examined: They had a deed of partnership in the African Banking Corporation Bank. The document was there in case there was an overdraft. Witness was responsible for De Kock's cheques, and the plaintiff in turn for him.

Hyman Bailey, residing at Lady Grey, said that last June he heard that the defendant was selling mules, and as he owed witness some money for a couple of years, he went to see the defendant, and asked him for a couple of mules. The defendant said that the mules belonged to De Kock, and if he gave witness any of the mules, he would have to pay for them in full. Witness remembered a row at the hotel at the Paarl, and heard the defendant promise to give plaintiff a note.

Cross-examined: The defendant had given evidence against witness in a recent malicious prosecution.

Isaac Bailey said that he went with his brother to get a couple of mules from the defendant in respect of money due, but Weintrob said that the mules belonged to De Kock.

Isaac Kerbel said he purchased 46 mules from De Kock, and the next morning witness and Mr. Muller went to Weintrob's place to get the mules. The defendant had no objection.

Cross-examined: Muller went with him to Weintrob's place to get the mules.

N

John Walter, residing at Laingsburg, said that in June last year he was at Mr. Van Eyk's office about some business, and later in the day he went to see some mules at Mr. Weintrob's place. Witness asked him if they were his mules, and the defendant pointed to the plaintiff.

Cross-examined: He had come from Van Eyk's place, and purchased 100 mules at £16 each.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiff.

Daniel Stephanus Malan, farmer, residing at the Paarl, said that he knew both the defendant and the plaintiff. Witness did not speak at all about what took place in the sale. Witness denied the statement as to his having said that Weintrob had told him what to say about the sale when he came to court. With regard to the sale of mules, witness went to De Kock and asked him if he had mules for sale. De Kock asked him to go with him and see Mr. Weintrob. They did so, and Mr. De Kock said: "Mr. Weintrob will sell mules to you; we are partners." Negotiations followed, but witness did not buy any mules, as Mr. Weintrob would not accept his offer of £15 each. Witness heard Mr. Weintrob selling to others. He did not see De Kock doing any selling. Weintrob was doing all the selling there that day.

Cross-examined: Witness had not seen the witness Bailey at the sale, and had not spoken to him. De Kock never said to witness that he could not sell the mules. He only said: "Weintrob can sell the mules; we are partners."

Herbert Ripley said he was a dealer in livestock, and represented the firm of Balfour, Ripley and Co., of Cape Town and Buenos Ayres. With regard to the sale in question, the mules belonged to the firm. There was a large attendance of people, but the sale did not go on well, and ultimately witness sold all the animals in a lump to De Kock and Weintrob. He did not sell to them directly, but through his agent, Van Eyk. There were several offers, and eventually witness authorised Van Eyk to sell to De Kock and Weintrob. The last-named negotiated the sale. Witness was not present when De Kock said Weintrob had nothing to do with the negotiations. Weintrob came to dinner with witness, but he did not mention De Kock's name. Witness at no time negotiated directly with De Kock. He never authorised Van Eyk to sell to De Kock alone. No offer was ever made through Van Eyk from De Kock alone to buy the mules. The mules were afterwards resold through the auctioneer, and Weintrob was instrumental in selling them.

Cross-examined: Witness did not care to whom the mules were sold, Van Eyk was the auctioneer, and he could sell them to whoever he liked, as witness looked to him for the money.

By the Court: Van Eyk gave witness no reason why he sold the mules to De Kock alone. He did not say why he took the receipt from De Kock alone.

Daniel Malan, jun., deposed that he was at the sale and wanting to buy some mules he went to Mr. De Kock, having heard that he had some for sale. Mr. De Kock told him to go to Mr. Weintrob, and witness did so and made an offer for some mules. Mr. De Kock was not there then. De Kock only said to witness, "I am not selling mules; you can buy them from Weintrob."

Isaac Abraham Perold said he was a member of the firm of Lewis and Perold. He knew the plaintiff and the defendant in this case. One day in June he went with Mr. De Kock to Mr. Van Eyk's office. They went to Mr. Van Eyk in his capacity as auctioneer, and it was in order to bring about a settlement of the account between Mr. Van Eyk as auctioneer and Mr. De Kock. There was a sum of £1,500 with regard to 100 mules which had been sold upon which Mr. Van Eyk wished to charge double commission. Eventually Mr. Van Eyk agreed to remove this extra charge, as he seemed to want to get rid of this amount standing against him. On the settlement there was a balance of £1,500 outstanding and for that De Kock gave a promissory note. This promissory note did not have Muller's name on it. During the argument Mr. De Kock broached the subject of Weintrob, and said that he had offered to Mr. Van Eyk that Weintrob should come in as a partner. Mr. Van Eyk said, "I told you distinctly I wanted nothing to do with Weintrob; you have to pay me the money." That was said while they were discussing the commission. Van Eyk gave witness to understand that he was simply dealing with De Kock as far as payment was concerned. No money was paid into the venture by either party except the risk of this promissory note. Afterwards Weintrob and De Kock came to witness's office. Then De Kock maintained that Weintrob was only his agent, while Weintrob said he was a partner in the venture. De Kock said, "How can you be my partner? Muller is my partner, and I am not going to split it up into three." Afterwards De Kock made an offer of £50 to Weintrob for his services, and when Weintrob would not accept that, the offer was increased to £100. When Weintrob declined to accept that, De Kock threatened to have him arrested for theft. Weintrob offered to go with De Kock to the police-station, which was next door. De Kock went out alone, but returned and re-opened the argument, and eventually he offered Weintrob £175, which the latter refused.

Cross-examined: Witness was perfectly satisfied that De Kock offered £175, but he always maintained the position that Weintrob was his agent, and not a partner.

A man named Berman said he attended the Klapmuts sale. The sale did not go off well at first, and the auctioneer stopped selling altogether. Weintrob was busy going about from one to another selling privately. Witness afterwards went up to De Kock when the sale had restarted, and asked him how his business was. It was a general remark that Weintrob was all "over the shop."

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He spoke to the defendant several times during the sale. He was friendly with both parties. Witness was insolvent, and Weintrob was a big creditor.

Louis Weintrob, the defendant, said he carried on business at an hotel at Paarl, but he also dealt in live-stock. He was present at the sale at Klapmuts. The stock did not go off well at first, and he spoke to several persons about the sale. He asked De Kock if he was going in with him as a partner with these mules. Plaintiff said "Yes." Witness made an offer to Mr. Van Wyk of £13 10s. a mule on behalf of De Kock and himself; then Mr. Van Eyk went to Mr. Ripley, and returned and said he did not want to take that figure. Witness then spoke to De Kock as to a higher offer, and they agreed to offer £14, and witness went to Van Eyk and tendered the offer. Van Eyk went and saw Ripley, and a little later came to witness and said, "Well, the bargain is closed." Van Eyk was selling in lots of eight to fifteen at first, but afterwards it was agreed that Van Eyk should offer the mules in small lots of two or more. De Kock informed witness that Van Eyk said he did not want to put his (defendant's) name on the vendu roll, because he said that in the Supreme Court he had been sued for debts and bonds. Witness did not object. He did his best to sell the mules. He denied that he came on the scene when there were only 169 mules left. He did not see Muller at the sale, and he had never known that Muller was a partner of De Kock. The auctioneer sold 126 mules, and 100 were sold to Dr. Mathers, of Fraserburg. The 100 sold to Dr. Mathers were put in witness's kraal. He paid boys to look after the mules, and had also bought forage for the animals. He had disbursed £12 2s. 6d. in this way. De Kock said he would put him into gaol for receiving certain money, and they were going to the police-station, when they called at the office of a law agent, where they talked matters over. Plaintiff offered him £75. He threatened witness with his fists. After that plaintiff mentioned something about Muller's share, but witness said he knew nothing about Muller, and plaintiff offered him £100, but subsequently this was increased to £175. Witness said he would accept £300.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He did not calculate the cost of the mules when they were purchased. He did not know that £5,000 was involved. He put in the same amount as the plaintiff. The plaintiff put nothing in.

Replying to Sir J. Buchanan, witness said he made no payment to Van Eyk.

This concluded the evidence.

Counsel having addressed the Court on the facts of the case, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

Buchanan, J.: The declaration alleges that on the 15th June last the defendant received the price of certain mules, which he had sold on acount of the plaintiff, and that the defendant did not pay over the whole of the purchase price of these mules, but retained the sum of £188 odd, which was still in his hands and unpaid; and the plaintiff sues for this amount. The defendant in his plea admits that he sold these mules, and received these various sums amounting to £188, but he states that there was an agreement of partnership between himself and the plaintiff for the purchase of a large number of mules, and that they were to share equally in the profits and loss, and he says that the plaintiff has made large profits, which he has not accounted for, and that when plaintiff does account for these profits, he (defendant) will account for the sum of £188. Here we have the fact that the mules were sold, and that this sum of £188 has been received, and the question we have to try is whether the defendant's allegation that there was a partnership between plaintiff and himself, has been established or not. It appears from the evidence that Messrs. Ripley and Balfour had and tried to sell by auction a number of mules, but as the sale did not go well, they stopped it. At the sale both the plaintiff and defendant and others were present, and according to Mr. Ripley's evidence the defendant personally communicated with him with the object of buying these mules out of hand, and that when the defendant came to him he did not mention Mr. De Kock's name. From what the defendant says it would appear that the defendant wished one Goosen to join in buying these mules on their joint account, but that Goosen refused. Defendant asked the plaintiff to join him, but again met with refusal. The plaintiff says that afterwards he negotiated through the auctioneer, Mr. Van Eyk, for the purchase of these mules direct from Mr. Ripley. Mr. Ripley corrobates this by saying that he never negotiated directly with Mr. De Kock, and he says that he authorised Mr. Van Eyk, to sell to De Kock and Weintrob. Now Weintrob, when he approached Ripley, never mentioned De Kock, and De Kock never spoke to Ripley personally, and it may well be that Ripley thought both these perties wished to buy. But as Van Eyk, as auctioneer, was responsible for the money, Ripley was only interested in the price received. When Van Eyk said that he had got a price of £14 per mule, Ripley was more interested in the amount than in the purchaser, and though his impression may have been that there would be a joint purchase, he did not concern himself about it. Van Eyk was Ripley's agent, and if defendant's contention is correct, that Van Eyk in negotiating this purchase itended it to be a purchase for both the plaintiff and the defendant, one would certainly have thought that in the vendu roll of the sale on account of Ripley and Balfour, which has been put in containing the sale of 365 mules, both De Kock and Weintrob would have been mentioned as purchasers. But the vendu roll only mentions De Kock's name. The reason why Weintrob's name is not mentioned is attempted to be explained on this ground: that Weintrob had at that time been summoned, that he had creditors, and that it would perhaps complicate and injure the sale if Weintrob appeared as a purchaser for these mules. But this is an argument that cuts both ways. The purchase price of these mules was something over £5,000, and if Weintrob's credit was so bad that the auctioneer would not put his name on the vendu roll it would be a very strong argument for holding that a person would not go into partnership with a man to the extent of £5,000, whose credit was so bad. But we can go further When the mules were bought, Van Eyk was employed by the plaintiff to sell them in pairs or in small numbers. The vendu roll of this sale has also been put in, and here again Van Eyk in his own writing says he sells these mules on account of S. de Kock. There is no mention of Weintrob having any interest in it. Weintrob is an hotel keeper, and De Kock a speculator in stock. Weintrob was an active, pushing man, and certainly spoke to the plaintiff about the sale. It seems to me from all the documents put in that the plaintiff's version is much more likely to be correct; that he did not agree to take in Weintrob as a partner, but that he wished to use Weintrob's energy and influence to secure a satisfactory sale of these mules, and he offered him a very substantial commission to push the sale as much as he could. Weintrob did push the sale. Weintrob afterwards took charge of the mules not sold on that day, and put them in his camp, and certainly interested himself in obtaining purchasers for the mules not sold by auction. The plaintiff said he agreed to give him £50 as commission for his services. Weintrob asked hm to give him a further chance, and asked for a larger sum, and it would seem that if a good sale had gone through, Weintrob might have got more, but the £50 seems to me the only sum that has ever been mentioned as having been promised. Persons who were at the sale, and who bought mules either from the plaintiff or from the defendant, have been called on both sides. Witnesses for the plaintiff state that the defendant said that these were De Kock's mules, and it is said that he said that so that if these intended purchasers had claims against him (Weintrob), they could not set them off as claims against the purchase price. Witnesses called for the defendant state that the plaintiff admitted that there was a partnership between the two. Their respective statements are denied by the parties themselves. Here, then, we have a direct conflict in the viva voce evidence. To test the question, let us look at what took place when payment came to be made for this large purchase. The sale was on the 19th of June, and on the same day there were re-sold some £3,000 worth of these mules. On the 29th of June, Van Eyk gave De Kock a receipt as follows: "Received £1,938 13s. 6d., in full settlement of price of 366 mules, less vendu roll commission." In the vendu roll there was a sale of 100 mules to one Dr. Maeder at £15 each, and a dispute arose between De Kock and Van Eyk as to double commission being charged on this sale. The object of the double commission was that, if the auctioneer was paid double commission, he would take over the amount; but De Kock objecting to pay the double commission, the auctioneer could not take this purchase as a good debt, and therefore in this receipt it stated that it is given "without prejudice to the £1,500 to be received from Dr. Maeder." This £1,500 was not received from Dr. Maeder, and as De Kock would not pay the double commiasion, he took over the debt himself. This £1,500 was at first deducted from the purchase price, and to settle the matter, De Kock afterwards gave Van Eyk a promissory note on the 3rd July for the sum of £1,500. This promissory note is signed by plaintiff and by Muller. From the evidence, it would appear that there was some joint understanding between De Kock and Muller before the sale. Muller had gone up-country to buy sheep, and De Kock remained behind to purchase horses and mules. It was stated that there was a partnership between these two. There was certainly some joint interest or venture between them, but the terms of their agreement do not appear. When the case was brought into court the plaintiff wished to add Muller as a co-plaintiff, but the defendant objected. I do not think it is material in this case, as it is clear that in whatever took place between Weintrob and plaintiff there was no mention of Muller's name. Muller may have an interest as between himself and De Kock, but it is not necessary to introduce Muller into this case. As to the payment of this large purchase price the defendant does not say that this was a contract where the plaintiff was to find the money, and he (defendant) was to give the labour. Defendant, on the contrary, spurns the idea that he could not pay his share. As a fact, he did not contribute a penny towards the purchase price. He takes no risk upon himself, and four days afterwards, when a dispute arises between the parties, defendant does not say, "I am a partner with De Kock, and won't give up these animals," but he gives them without remark. It is certainly very unsatisfactory in this case that we have not the evidence of Van Eyk. That is really to my mind the strongest point I have against the plaintiff's case. Van Eyk was the plaintiff's local attorney, and he could have given very substantial evidence as to what took place at the sale, and as to what was said to Mr. Ripley. But it was competent also for the defendant to have called Van Eyk. As neither party called him, we have now to decide upon the evidence before us. In this sale we have viva voce evidence on the one side and viva voce evidence on the other. I am not prepared to throw over the plaintiff's account of the transaction, supported as his evidence is by all the written documents put in in this case. There is nothing whatever in writing to support the defendant's claim as a partner in this transaction, but all the written evidence supports the plaintiff's account that he alone was the purchaser, and not jointly with the defendant. Under these circumstances, I think that judgment must be given for the plaintiff. Although the plaintiff in his declaration has made no tender, he admits that he has promised £50 to the defendant, and the defendant now also says that he has expended a sum of £12 2s. 6d. for herds and fodder for the mules, while the mules were in his possession. This amount has not been contested in any way. I think the defendant is entitled to have this amount. Judgment will, therefore, be given for the plaintiff for the sum that the defendant admits, viz., £188, less £50 and £12 2s. 6d., leaving a balance of £125 17s. 6d., which plaintiff is entitled to, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ADMISSION.

Ex parte MOORE. { 1903. Feb. 19th.

On the application of Mr. Bisset, Frederick Harold Burton Moore was admitted as a conveyancer.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

VAN REENEN V. ISAACS.

This case had been adjourned from the 5th inst. to enable defendant to arrive at some compromise with his creditors.

Mr. Buchanan, for the applicant, stated that so far defendant had done nothing in the matter, and he accordingly asked for judgment against defendant.

Mr. Wilkinson, on behalf of defendant, asked that the case be adjourned for a week longer, as he was hourly expecting defendant to clear up his accounts.

Mr. Buchanan said he would not object to this course being followed if defendant paid the costs of the day.

This was agreed to, and the case accordingly stood adjourned.

Postea, February 26, Mr. Buchanan applied to have the provisional order for sequestration superseded.—Granted.

HEATLIE V. CAISSE

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence for £225, on a promissory note.

The application was granted.

WEINTROB V. WEINTROB AND ANOTHER. { 1903. Feb. 19th.

Provisional sentence—Promissory note—Accommodation.

Mr. Gardiner moved for provisional sentence for £20 on a promissory note.

Mr. Upington, who appeared for defendant, read affidavits from Louis, the plaintiff's brother alleging that defendant had advanced plaintiff £48 so that the latter really owed the former £28.

In an answering affidavit plaintiff stated that his brother originally owed him £60, his share of the proceeds of an hotel at Frenchhoek, Paarl. Defendant paid £45 for plaintiff, and gave him £15 to make up the total to £60, so that plaintiff did not owe defendant £48.

Mr. Upington (for defendant): The defendant has shown that he has a good defence to an action on this promissory note. All that the plaintiff can say is that defendant's name is of no use, but the name of Van Schalkwyk, the maker of the note, was of use, for the note was discounted.

[De Villiers, C.J.: No, the note does not appear to have been discounted.]

At all events, plaintiff may have raised money on it. Defendant shows that considerable sums of money were owing to him. It cannot be decided on the affidavits whether the note was an accommodation note or not. The defendant has shown a good case on the merits, viz.: That plaintiff owes him more than is due on the note, even if it is not an accommodation note.

Mr. Gardiner (for the plaintiff) was not called upon.

The Court granted provisional sentence with costs.

MARAIS V. PINKUS.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence for £7.500 due on a mortgage bond, together with interest from June 1, 1902, the property specially hypothecated, to be declared executable. Mr. Buchanan also moved for provisional sentence under Rule 329d for £93, being the insurance premiums on the property in question.

Both applications were granted.

AUSTEN AND HODGES V. HODGES.

Practice — Affidavits — Size of paper.

Mr. Gardiner moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £326 8s. 1d.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., appeared for defendant.

A question arose as to the admission of certain affidavits made in Rhodesia, which the Registrar had been unable to accept because they were not on paper of the proper size, while the signatures of certain justices of the peace had not been regularly authenticated.

De Villiers, C.J., stated that, under the special circumstances, the affidavits would be accepted, but it must not be regarded as a precedent. Unless affidavits were made on paper of the customary size, difficulty would be experienced in binding the records of the Court.

The defence was that the debt was due by defendant's brother, who was in partnership with plaintiff at Gwelo, Rhodesia. Defendant signed certain promissory notes for his brother, who had been unable to meet them, consequently he was being sued as surety for the principal debtor. The business was now being liquidated, and defendant maintained that if his brother sold his share of the business, he would be entitled to receive £5,186.

De Villiers, C.J., suggested that the best course would be to let the matter stand over, to see what the result of the liquidation of the business would be.

It appeared that notice of dissolution was given in October last.

De Villiers, C.J., thought the parties ought to know how the matter stood by March 12.

The case was ordered to stand over until the 12th prox.

Postea, March 12.—The case was ordered to stand over till April 14.

ESACK V ADAM.

Mr. Wilkinson moved for an order to restrain defendant from leaving the Colony, pending the trial of an action in which plaintiff was claiming £100 damages against him for alleged malicious and illegal prosecution.

Mr. Burton appeared for defendant.

Defendant, in an affidavit, stated that he was a hawker, residing at Johannesburg. He came to Cape Town as a refugee, subsequently returning to the Rand. Last month he was summoned to appear as a witness in a criminal case—a charge of housebreaking and robbery. Defendant arrived in Cape Town on January 14, and remained here until February 13, when the case was withdrawn by the Crown. Defendant left the same night for Johannesburg, but on the train arriving at Victoria West he was arrested by two constables, handcuffed, and led by a rope tied between two horses to the local gaol. Subsequently he was sent to Cape Town, and he maintained that his arrest was carried out in a wrongful and irregular manner.

Mr. Wilkinson said that he had only just been made acquainted with this affidavit, and he would like to have an opportunity of replying to it.

The Chief Justice remarked that the affidavit stated that the arrest was improper, but how did that affect the case?

Mr. Burton said defendant was prepared to deposit £100 with the Registrar as security for his appearance.

Defendant was ordered to be discharged on this condition, and the case was postponed until Thursday next.

Postea, February 26.

Mr. Burton stated that when the case was last before the Court, it was suggested that copies of the evidence might be obtained to see whether there were reasonable grounds for an action for malicious prosecution. Counsel found that in the Magistrate's Court—and the case did not reach the higher Court—Adam did not mention plaintiff's name. It appeared that Adam was arrested for an assault on certain persons, and kept in the lock-up for the night, during which his house was broken into, and a certain amount of money taken. In the Magistrate's Court, Adam simply gave formal evidence as to finding his house broken into and the money missing, but he did not mention the name of any person. Defendant's servant stated that he heard a window broken, and saw persons, including plaintiff, in the house.

Mr. Wilkinson said the prosecution was commenced by statements made by Adam and his servant.

De Villiers, C.J.: Ample time has been given to produce the requisite evidence to show that there was some prima facie reason for supposing that plaintiff would succeed in his action. No such evidence has been produced. I am of opinion that the arrest should never have been asked for, and should now be discharged.

The order for arrest was accordingly discharged.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

DE WET V. MANSCHESTER.

The Court granted judgment under Rule 329D, for £50, rent owing to plaintiff by defendant.

DREW AND CO. V. DE VRIES AND CO.

Mr. Alexander moved for judgment, under Rule 329D, for £320, being balance of amount due to plaintiff for goods supplied and work done.

The application was granted.

WERNER V. KUKARD.

Mr. A. E. de Villiers moved for the transfer of certain land on payment of £225.

The application was granted.

TUCKMAN AND CO. V. LEVITON AND SON.

Dr. Grecar moved, under Rule 329D, for provisional sentence for £18 3s. 6d., for goods sold and delivered.

The application was granted.

LAWRENCE AND CO. V. PEACHEY.

The Court granted judgment, under Rule 329D, for £105 8s. 7d., for goods sold and delivered by plaintiffs to defendant.

REHABILITATION.

C. E. APPEL.

Mr. Bisset moved for the rehabilitation of Coenraad Edward Appel, and for his discharge under Section 117 of the Insolvent Ordinance. The creditors had been paid in full, and there was nothing unfavourable in the trustees report.

The application was granted.

HERHOLDT V. ESTATE HERHOLDT.

Will—Evidence—Handwriting.

This was an action by the widow of the late Abraham Peter Herholdt, who died in February last, to have a certain will declared to be the last testament of the deceased. The will which it was sought to have declared valid was executed in 1901, but it was not discovered until some considerable time after the death of the testator, who died in February last. The will was discovered in November last, when it was tendered to the Master, who accepted it. The will executed in 1900 had, however, been previously filed, and the executors had received letters of administration. The action was now instituted to have the later document declared valid, and the previous will set aside. The first will was made in favour of the Dutch Reformed Church, Wynberg, with usufruct for Mrs. Herholdt, while the second will, which it was now sought to have declared valid, was entirely in favour of the plaintiff.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Gardiner) for the applicant; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Burton) for the respondents.

Jane Dorothy Herholdt, the plaintiff, stated that she was married to the deceased in March, 1883. He had formerly been a clerk in the employ of Rutherfoord and Co., but after they were married he followed no occupation, but lived on his means. They led a very secluded life, her husband being visited by relatives only. She was present when the first will was signed, but she did not understand what its contents were. She was also present when the second will was signed on October 20, 1901; her husband died on February 4, 1902. The will was written on a piece of tissue paper, and as she objected to the flimsy nature of the paper, her husband said he would write it out again. He signed the will, and she placed it in the cash box. Her husband used to imbibe freely. Some few days after he drafted the second will he sent for two young men, named De Villiers, to witness it, but as only one attended, deceased got Miss De Villiers to witness it as well. The will was then placed in the cash box, and she never saw it again until November last, when she discovered it, while she was looking for a fan of her husband's. She then found the document in the bottom of the cardboard box in which he used to keep a lot of private matters. With the exception of about £100, she had no money at the death of her husband.

Cross-examined: She herself placed the things found in the cardboard box before the date of her husband's death. The box was kept on a table in her bedroom. She was not very much interested in the will, although it left her all the property. She was under the impression that she had placed the will in a cash box. No one was living with her when Mr. Herholdt died, but a lady had since been residing with her. She informed Mr. W. T. Buissinne that there was a second will, but that it could not be found. She also told Mr. Pienaar that the one proved was not the last will, and informed her solicitors to the same effect, and though they wrote certain letters about the property, they did not mention the second will in them, because she had given it up for lost. She had a copy of the last will written in her husband's handwriting, but she was told it was worthless, so she did not give it to her attorneys. When the first will was read, Miss De Villiers observed, "That is not the will I signed." Plaintiff was very angry at only one member of the Kerkeraad attending deceased's funeral, but she did not then say to Mr. Pienaar, "Here my husband is leaving the church his money, and none of the Kerkeraad have thought fit to attend his funeral."

Charles Bennett de Villiers, a clerk in the Railway Department and deceased's nephew, stated that he remembered receiving a message from his mother at the beginning of last year, in consequence of which he went to see his uncle. It was about the third Sunday in January, being about a fortnight before Mr. Herholdt died. Mrs. Herholdt took witness into a room in which her husband was lying in bed. Witness's sister was also in the room, and Mr. Herholdt told them that a document on the table was his will and that it bore his signature; he asked them to sign it. Witness signed the will in the presence of his aunt and his sister.

Cross-examined: The time was between three and four o'clock in the afternoon, and the room was rather dark. Deceased was in bed, and apparently very ill. Witness heard that he died from the result of injuries received through falling from a chair. Witness did not read the will.

Elizabeth Violet de Villiers, sister of the previous witness, stated that formerly she was a teacher at Plumstead. She used to see her aunt and uncle frequently. She remembered the particular Sunday in January, 1902, when the will was witnessed. Her aunt called her into the room, and her uncle asked her to witness the will. Her brother was already in the room. Her uncle pointed out his signature, and said the document was his last will and testament.

Cross-examined: While she was in the bedroom she did not see the will taken off the table and shown to deceased. She knew what the contents of that will were, because she read it—more or less. After the death of Mr. Herholdt she heard that the first will was being acted on. She did not mention to anyone that she had witnessed the second will, because she heard that it had been lost.

By the Court: She accompanied her aunt to Mr. Buissinne's office, when that gentleman read the first will. Mrs. Herholdt said that was not the last will, and she (witness) remarked that it was not the will she was asked to witness.

Harry Gordon Caffyn stated he knew the deceased intimately. He identified several signatures to certain letters put in a those of the deceased.

Harold Jones, clerk in the employ of Messrs. Findlay and Tait (solicitors), stated that his firm acted for Mrs. Herholdt. She called at the office on two or three occasions last year in connection with the matter. She showed him a copy of the second will in June last.

This closed the case for the plaintiff.

Sir Henry Juta called for the defence Daniel Joshua Pienaar, clergyman of the Dutch Reformed Church, Wynberg, who said he knew deceased, and had been in the habit of regularly visiting his house. On one occasion Mrs. Herholdt came to his house and asked him to go down to their residence, because her husband had been very unkind to her. On another occasion she sent the servant, and on a third occasion she made a similar complaint to him at her house. Deceased was at times in the habit of using very unkind language towards the plaintiff. The first will was drawn up by Mr. De Beer, law agent, of Wynberg. After it had been drawn up witness continued his visits to the house. Mrs. Herholdt was present when this will was signed. She did not say much about it, but she showed signs of very great dissatisfaction. Only one member of the Kerkeraad attended Mr. Herholdt's funeral, and she told him that she despised the Kerkeraad from her heart; she thought they ought to have attended the funeral, seeing that her husband had left his whole estate to the Dutch Reformed Church at Wynberg. Subsequently witness, as one of the executors, took out letters of administration. He had correspondence with Mrs. Herholdt about the property, but she never said a word to him about a will being lost.

By the Court: He first heard of the second will from the Master on November 6 last, and the first word Messrs. Findlay and Tait said about another will was at this time. Witness personally did not benefit from the will, deceased's property bein~ held in trust for the church. Mrs. Herholdt on one occasion told him that she would settle the whole estate, because there was some of her own money (£300) in it. She did not say anything about the second will. He was not certain whether he or Mr. De Beer took the will away from deceased house.

At this point, a witness being absent, the case was ordered to stand over sine die.

Postea (March 8).

Sir H. Juta called for the defence.

Wm. Templer Buissinne, of the firm of Van Zyl and Buissinne, attorneys, who said his firm were acting in the matter in dispute. He remembered Mrs. Herholdt calling with a young lady, but he would point out that the matter was in the hands of a capable clerk, named Reid, under the supervision of his partner, Mr. Kayser, and he saw the lady as a matter of courtesy, because she asked for him. He sent for Reid, who was present during the interview. He remembered showing Mrs. Herholdt certain accounts of the administration of the estate. If Mrs. Herholdt had said that there was another will in existence he should have promptly told Mr. Reid to report the matter to Mr. Kayser, and he should have sent word to Mr. Kayser to stop the administration of the estate under the will, which was in the office. On the other hand, if Mrs. Herholdt had said that she told him that there was another will he would not be prepared to deny it. He was perfectly sure that if she had told him that there was another will in existence he should have stopped what was going on in the office at that time. He had no recollection of the young lady saying anything about the will. If she had said in his presence that she had witnessed another will, and that the will in the office was not the one in question, he would have sent for Mr. Kayser and given directions that the administration of the estate should be stopped. As a matter of fact, they went on with the administration.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: If the alleged other will had been lost they would have gone on with the administration of the estate. He always sent for Mr. Reid when Mrs. Herholdt called. She had generally contended for something when she had called. She seemed querulous.

Walter H. Reid, clerk in the office of Van Zyl and Buissinne, said he recollected Mrs. Herholdt calling at the office in the company of the young lady, and he was present at the interview with Mr. Buissinne. His impression was that the young lady did not open her mouth during the whole of the interview.

Sir H. Juta: She says that Mr. Buissinne read the will, and Mrs. Herholdt said that that was not the last will, and that she (the young lady) had witnessed another will?—Witness: I never heard those words uttered at all. My impression was that Mrs. Herholdt was dissatisfied with the will.

Sir H. Juta: But she said nothing with regard to there being another will? -Witness: No, nothing at all.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Witness took Mrs. Herholdt over to the Master's Office, and asked to see the will there. He did not remember her saying that that was not the will. When he showed her the will she said that the signature was Mr. Herholdt's.

Mr. Benjamin, after putting in the correspondence, addressed the Court on behalf of the plaintiff. He presumed, he said, that his friend would depend very largely upon the discrepancy in the signatures in support of his case.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp: It is not a question of the signatures; it is a question of the whole will.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, that is so; but, of course, I suppose that the point that my learned friend will in the main attack is the fact that there is considerable discrepancy in the signatures. I will admit that, looking at the signature on the will, there does appear to be some difference between the signatures, but when these signatures are compared with other signatures that had been admitted and the other writings that had been admitted, I submit that much of the discrepancy that apparently exists disappears.

The Chief Justice: Are there no experts in handwriting in this town?

Sir H. Juta: I may say we did everything we could to get one, but we could not find one, because we wanted an examination of the tissue-paper with glasses and lenses.

Mr. Benjamin went on to argue that there was often dissimilarity between the handwriting of the deceased, and that the writing in the will now produced was such as could be found in admitted handwriting of the deceased. As to the fact of the later will being prepared on ordinary toilet paper, he said that if this signature had corresponded with some admitted signatures which had been put in, one might have said at once that this kind of paper had been used for the purpose of tracing the signature, but the signature compared with none of the signatures which had been put in. He contended that that did away with the idea that the toilet paper had been used for the purpose of fabricating the will. He also submitted that the delay which took place before the later will was found was an element in favour of its genuineness.

Sir Henry Juta asked why, if the testator intended to make a will, he should not have signed it. What prevented him from signing the paper? Not want of time, because he wrote two addresses at the bottom of the paper.

The Chief Justice: There were no witnesses; he could not sign without witnesses.

Sir Henry Juta: But he signed the toilet paper will. Counsel remarked that how the testator could have made the copy was another mystery. It was for the plaintiff to prove that the will was a genuine one. He contended that if this will had been made in the month of October this lady, who knew well enough that it had to be executed, would not have locked it up for three months and run the risk of her husband dying in the meantime without the will being executed. It would, he submitted, be a very dangerous thing if under the circumstances disclosed in this case the Court held that the testator knew he was acknowledging the signature. There was no evidence to show that anything which contained testator's signature was shown to him. Counsel quoted the case of Roux v. Lombard (9 Eastern Districts Court, 201).

Mr. Benjamin, in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is a case which certainly involves considerable difficulty and obscurity. It appears that a will, a perfectly genuine will, was duly executed by the testator on the 24th of October in the year 1900. After the death of the testator, which took place early in the following year, the executors appointed under this will took out letters of administration, and no objection was raised to them on the ground that another will was in existence. After they had been in their office for several months the plaintiff brought forward another will, which she said had been executed by her husband shortly before his death. That alleged will has been produced in Court, written upon what appears to be tissue paper, and the plaintiff has stated the circumstances under which she says it was executed. She said her husband had made a copy on blue paper, and had afterwards copied this upon this tissue paper and signed this tissue paper, and put it back into the cash-box, and that subsequently some relation of hers, a Miss De Villiers and her brother were sent for to witness the acknowledgment of the testator of this tissue paper will. These two persons have given their evidence as to what took place upon that occasion, and they say the testator pointed out this as his signature, and that they therefore witnessed it. The document is produced with their signatures to it. Counsel for the defendants has greatly relied upon the extreme improbabilities of this version, and he has relied also upon the dissimilarity of the handwriting in this document and the ordinary handwriting of the testator. Now, upon this point I must say I would have been glad to have been assisted by a person who has made the comparison of handwritings his study. For myself I confess that the two handwritings appear to be entirely different, and the supposed signature of the testator in this document is not the signature which, on any occasion in any of the undoubtedly genuine writings, he ever made. It is quite true that the letter "R" was sometimes written by the testator in the shape in which it appears on the document now in suit, but never in any signature of his name. It would be a strange circumstance if this man, having always signed his name in one way should, when on his sick-bed—I might have said death-bed—alter his ordinary signature when executing so important a document as his last will. But it is not only the signature, but the whole body of the document which appears to me to be different from the writing appearing in his books and letters. A good deal would depend upon this point, because, if this will was not in the handwriting of the deceased, then it would have to follow that the document was a forgery, because the case of the plaintiff is that the whole is in the handwriting of the testator. These are circumstances which certainly weigh against the view of the plaintiff that this document was a genuine will. On the other hand, there are circumstances which the Court cannot lose sight of. There is, first of all, the fact that these two witnesses were unshaken in their evidence as to what took place at the time when the testator was alleged to have acknowledged his will, and another circumstance which I must say does have very considerable weight with me is this: That if this were a forgery, if the plaintiff had set about making a forgery for the purpose of a fraud, it is unlikely that she would have used tissue paper for the purpose. My learned brother holds a strong view that the document is genuine, and, seeing that a decision to the contrary would involve the plaintiff and her witnesses in a charge of fraud and perjury, I am not prepared to differ from him. The judgment will be for the plaintiff, but as to costs they should come out of the estate. The defendants were justified, nay, bound to defend the action, and should not be made to bear any part of the costs in their individual capacity.

Maasdorp, J., said it was a pity that this case, depending as it did upon questions of fact, was not brought before a jury, or did not come on when a full Court was sitting. He had watched the witnesses for the plaintiff carefully while they were in the box, and from the manner of their evidence, and their agreements in regard to little details and circumstantialities upon which they could not have been in communication, he was impressed with the truthfulness of their evidence. Besides this oral evidence, there were written documents, and where there was such an abundance of writings with which to make careful comparison, it ought not to be difficult when forgery was committed to prove such forgery. The document in question was of some length, and the whole of it was said to be a forgery. Here was a document which could be carefully compared with the book, which contained admittedly genuine writings of the alleged testator. He had listened to the argument of Sir Henry Juta, and he had not satisfied him that discrepancies between the writings could be proved. The presence of the second document also seemed to him strong evidence that the case put before the Court by the plaintiff was genuine. He could not for a moment conceive why this other document should have been produced if it were a forgery; he could not conceive how such preparation of fraud and forgery could have entered the mind of any person whose sole object was simply to prove that a document, witnessed by two individuals on a certain day in a certain bedroom, when no one else was present, was genuine. The presence of this other document, which was utterly useless for the purpose of establishing this case, satisfied him that the evidence as given by the plaintiff was truthful. He must say that he would have been very glad to have had the assistance of an expert, but looking carefully at the different writings, he was convinced that it was the same hand that wrote in both these documents, and the book. As to the signatures, it struck him that the only difference between the signatures to these documents and the admittedly genuine signature was in the formation of the letter "R." Now that would have been a very serious difference, because, as has ben said, a man does not vary his signature very much, but, strangely enough, in the book, this particular form of "R" was frequently used. It was undoubtedly the case that the signature was rather shaky, but to his mind this was very easily explained. It was stated by counsel that Mr. Herholdt was given to liquor, and was decidedly in a very shaky condition, and that would account largely for some difference in the general nature of the handwriting, which difference, however, was not much to his mind. He was sorry that the case should be supposed to go upon an opinion expressed by himself, and he would have preferred, if his view were correct, to have had the support either of a brother judge or a jury, but he was bound to come to the conclusion that this was a genuine document, that it was executed and witnessed as described by Mrs. Herholdt and the other two witnesses, and that it was consequently the will of Mr. Herholdt.

SUPREME COURT

Ex parte SEGALL. { 1903. Feb. 20th.

This was an application by Jacob Berman, of Cape Town, brother of Rebecca Segall, who had been declared of unsound mind by the Court, for a rule nisi, calling upon his sister's husband, Morris Segall, to show cause why the appointment of the said Morris Segall as curator of his wife's person and property should not be cancelled, such rule in the meantime to operate as an interdict restraining him from dealing with her property.

The applicant stated in his affidavit that the first intimation he had of Segall's appointment was a report of the case in the newspapers; that Segall was in Cape Town at the time, and was aware that if applicant had known of the application for his appointment as curator, applicant would have opposed such appointment; that a few months ago in the Transvaal the Courts had refused to allow Segall, on his application thereto, to deal with his wife's property; that there was every prospect of the wife recovering her faculties, and the husband was not a fit and proper person to be such curator, as he continually grossly ill-treated his wife and behaved in a brutal manner towards his wife and children, and had frequently expressed his intention to leave the country; that Mrs. Segall herself, before she became unwell, had asked her parents not to allow her husband to deal with her property, which was of the value of something like £12,000, and situate at Johannesburg.

Mr. M. de Villiers, who made the application, said he was informed that Segall left for Johannesburg immediately after receiving the order, and there was some danger of his dealing with the property in a manner disadvantageous to the ward.

De Villiers, C.J., thought Segall ought to have informed the Court at the time that his wife had a brother in Cape Town who could protect her interests.

The rule was granted as prayed, returnable on March 12 next, the rule to be served personally on Segall, and to restrain him from interfering with his wife's property or person.

STO-BERG V. STOFBERG.

This was an action for divorce.

Mr. De Waal appeared for the plaintiff, Mrs. Stofberg, who stated that she was married to defendant at Clanwilliam on August 29, 1898, in community of property. The same day they left for the Paarl, and while living there he left her—on business, as he said. There was one child of the marriage. In September, 1900—since when she had not seen her husband—he had written admitting infidelity.

Evidence was given by a blacksmith of Clanwilliam to the effect that respondent, accompanied by a woman who was not his wife, had occupied the same room.

A decree of divorce was granted.

JACKS V. JACKS. { 1903. Feb. 20th. ,, 21st.

Restitution of conjugal rights—Domicile.

A wife who does not reside within the jurisdiction is entitled to a decree of restitution of conjugal rights against a husband whose domicile is in this Colony and who has maliciously deserted her.

This was an action for restitution of conjugal rights, or failing that, a decree of divorce.

The declaration set forth that the petitioner—the wife—resided in London, and the respondent in Cape Town. They were married in 1889, and ten years later respondent deserted petitioner, since when he had failed to maintain her and had refused to return to her.

The evidence of the petitioner, Mary Charlotte Jacks (born Bridges Todd) - given on affidavit made in London - was to the effect that she was married to the respondent, Walter Barrett Jacks, in London, at the Parish Church of Kensington, in July, 1889. They first lived in lodgings at Fulham, where the only child —now eleven years of age—was born. At the time her husband was a jobber's clerk on the London Stock Exchange, and subsequently was admitted as a member. Latterly he frequently came home in an intoxicated condition, and petitioner occupied a separate bedroom with her little girl. He left for Cape Town on February 24, 1900, and since April last she had received no letter from him. He left debts to the amount of £60, but these he had not since paid, nor did he send her any money, with the exception of 10s. as a Christmas gift. For some considerable time before her husband left England, and also since, she worked at dressmaking for relatives and friends in order to support herself and child, a girl now eleven years of age.

De Villiers, C. J., said this was the first case of the kind he could remember. The wife resided in England, and had never come under the jurisdiction of the Court. The desertion took place in England, because the husband left the petitioner in that country, and now the Court was asked for a decree of restitution of conjugal rights and custody of the child. What right had the Court to make a decree affecting the custody of the child who was in England? The husband might go back to England and claim the child.

He suggested that Mr. Upington should look up authorities on the point and mention the case on the following morning.

Postea, February 21.

Mr. Upington said he had looked up the authorities on the point. In this Court the first case was that of Reeves v. Reeves (1 Menzies, page 244). Then there were the cases, Miller (3 Searle, page 277), and Verstander v. Verstander (1 Menzies, page 280). In the latter case it was held that the domicile of the husband was the domicile of the wife. The latest reported case was Peters v. Peters (16 Supreme Court Reports, p. 303). In this instance the husband had come to reside in the Cape, his wife remaining in Natal, and the Court granted the former leave to sue by edictal citation for restitution of conjugal rights. Counsel also quoted Whip v. Whip (12 Supreme Court Reports, p. 174), and Walter v. Walter (11 Eastern Districts Court Reports, p. 89). These were the main reported cases, but the Registrar had referred counsel to Camp v. Camp (12, C.T.R., 134). In this case the marriage took place in England, and the wife never came to this country, but the Court granted an order for the restitution of conjugal rights. Then there was the case of Gush v. Gush (12, C.T.R., 827), in which a rule calling upon defendant to restore conjugal rights was made absolute this year. The parties in this case came from England, where they were married, but the husband subsequently went back to England, and the Court granted an order calling upon him to return here, or to advance his wife £35, to enable her to proceed with the action.

De Villiers, C.J.: The declaration in this case alleges that the defendant resides in this colony and is domiciled here. There is no appearance on the part of the defendant, there is no denial of these allegations, nor is there any exception to the jurisdiction of this Court. The Court is, therefore, bound to assume on the case as it stands that the defendant is domiciled here, and being domiciled here the Court has jurisdiction over him to order him to return to plaintiff or to receive her in case she should come out to this colony. Plaintiff is entitled, owing to the defendant's residence in this colony, to a decree of restitution of conjugal rights as against him. The Court will, therefore, grant such a decree with costs, defendant to return to or receive plaintiff on or before April 15, failing which a rule nisi will be granted to show cause by May 7 why a divorce should not be granted, on the return day plaintiff to give satisfactory evidence that she has expressed to defendant her willingness to come out and settle in the Colony. The only point I am still in doubt about is the question of the child ; she has never been to this colony. I wish to express no opinion on the point, but plaintiff will have to consider before the return day whether she should not come within the jurisdiction of the Court with her child. The matter, however, will still be open to argument on the return day, but so far as the restitution of conjugal rights is concerned I have no doubt. Defendant is here and subject to the laws of this country, and he must restore conjugal rights to plaintiff. It is true that she resides outside the jurisdiction of the Court, but that is probably owing to the fact that the defendant refuses to live with her.

[Plaintiff's Attorneys: Van Zyl and Buissinne.]

VAN DYK V. VAN DYK.

This was an action for the restitution of conjugal rights.

The parties were married in community of property in Cape Town on August 8, 1893. There were four children of the marriage. On July 21 last, it was asserted, the husband deserted his wife, and, notwithstanding her demands, had since refused to maintain her or to receive her.

Mr. Buchanan for plaintiff; defendant in default.

Mrs. Van Dyk, the plaintiff, stated that at the time of their marriage her husband was a butcher's assistant in Cape Town. They lived happily together for four years, and then trouble arose, because she could not keep the house going on her allowance of £1 2s. 6d. per week, with which she was expected to pay the rent, provide food, and supply the children and herself with clothes. This led to quarrelling. Afterwards they went to live at Rondebosch, where he started a butchery, which failed. He then became a driver to a commercial traveller, with whom he left on a three months' trip in February last. On his return the question of the housekeeping allowance again caused unpleasantness. In July last he said she could do what she liked, but he did not intend to live any longer with her. He accordingly took the children and the furniture to her parents' residence, while she went to live with a lady friend. She had seen him on two or three occasions since, and asked him to support her and the children, but he refused. He was now living at Claremont.

The Court granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, respondent being also ordered to return to his wife on or before March 21, or to show cause on April 12 why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

Postea, April 15, a decree of divorce was granted.

MANSON V. AURET.

This was an action for transfer of certain property.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers, who appeared for defendant, stated that the case had been set down by defendant. Due notice had been given to plaintiff, who was unrepresented, and under Rule 30 of the Court defendant now claimed absolution from the instance, with costs.

The Court granted defendant absolution from the instance, with costs.

Condition precedent—Obligation Fulfilment — Meaning of words "actual cost."

The condition of an obligation is taken to be accomplished when the debtor, who is obliged under such condition, has prevented its accomplishment.

The plaintiff entered into a contract with the Government for the construction of a line of railway by which it was provided that in case of certain defaults on the part of the contractor, the Government should be at liberty to take over the incomplete work and pay to the contractor the "actual cost" thereof, which was to be ascertained by the certificate of the Government engineer, who was to be at liberty to inspect the contractor's books.

Held, that such "actual cost" was the cost actually incurred by the contractor in constructing the work; and did not include (1) interest on payments, or (2) expenditure wasted in consequence of any part of the work having been condemned by the engineer, or (3) any work or material of which the Government had not received the benefit.

The Government having taken over the work, a correspondence ensued between the Government and the contractors, from which it appeared that the Government placed a different construction upon the words "actual cost," and was prepared to pay only for the value of the work as appearing from certain scheduled prices. The engineer accordingly tendered to the contractor a certificate which did not purport to be a certificate of actual cost but was based upon the scheduled prices as contended for by Government.

Held, that, although the production of an engineer's certificate was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover the actual cost, the refusal of the Government to pay the amount of actual cost dispensed with the necessity of providing such certificate and entitled the plaintiff to recover upon independent proof of actual cost.

This was an action in which Arnold Frank Hills, of London, in his personal capacity, and as trustee of the Grand Junction Railways, sued the Colonial Government for payment of various sums of money, amounting in the aggregate to £612,565 4s. 7d., together with 50,000 Thames Ironworks shares. Or, in the alternative, for £1,053,330 15s. 6d. The declaration was as follows:

1. The plaintiff is Arnold Frank Hills, of London, England, who sues both personally, and in his capacity as trustee for and on behalf of a certain joint co-partnership venture called the Grand Junction Railways.

The defendant is Arthur Douglass, who is sued in his capacity as Commissioner of Railways, and who in such capacity is the proper person to be sued in this action as representing the Colonial Government.

2. On or about the 19th day of May, 1896, a certain company registered in the Cape Colony, and known as the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, entered into a contract with the Colonial Government (copy of which contract marked (a) is hereunto annexed, the plaintiff craving that it may be considered as inserted herein) for construction by the said company on the terms and conditions therein set forth of certain three lines of railway, to wit: (a) From Somerset East to Fort Beaufort; (b) From Fort Beaufort to King William's Town; (c) from Oudtshoorn to Klipplaat.

3. Thereafter the said company duly proceeded with the construction of the said lines of railway.

4. On or about the 18th day of March, 1899, a certain further contract was (in so far as the construction of the said lines of railway was still to be erected) entered into between the Colonial Government and a company registered in England, and known as the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, for the further construction and completion of the said lines of railway.

5. The terms and conditions of the contract of the 18th March, 1899, are fully set out in the annexure hereto marked (B), which the plaintiff craves may be considered as inserted herein.

6. For the purposes of, and in connection with the said contract of the 18th March, 1899, which was entered into with the consent and approval of the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, the latter company on or about the 20th July, 1898, duly ceded and assigned all its right title and interest in and to the contract of the 19th May, 1896, to the said Thames Iron Works and Shipbuilding Company, and to the plaintiff.

7. Thereafter the Thames Iron Works and Shipbuilding Company duly proceeded with the execution of the contracts of the 18th March, 1899, and expended moneys and incurred liabilities in connection with the construction of the aforesaid lines of railway until on or about the 4th day of July, 1900, when by mutual consent of the parties to the contract of 18th March, 1899, two fresh contracts were entered into between the said parties in lieu of the contract of 18th March, 1899, in so far as the said contract still remained to be executed. The contracts of the 4th July, 1900, are fully set forth in the Schedules G and H annexed to, approved of, and incorporated in Act 19 of 1900, and the plaintiff craves leave to refer to the said Schedules as if inserted herein.

8. The plaintiff specially craves leave to refer this Hon. Court to the recitals in the preambles to the Section 10 of Act 19 of 1900, whereby all acts done, rights acquired, or liabilities incurred in connection with the contracts therein referred to are preserved and kept intact.

9. The Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company duly proceeded with the construction of the said lines of railway; but in or about December, 1900, the said company, with the consent of the Colonial Government, as required by Article 51 of the "General Conditions" annexed to and forming part of the said contracts of the 4th July, 1900, duly ceded and assigned to the plaintiff all the right, title, and interest of the said company in respect of the said contracts.

10. On or about December 1900, the Thames Iron Works and Shipbuilding Company likewise ceded to plaintiff all the right, title, and interest of the said company in respect of the contracts of 18th March, 1899, and 19th May, 1896, aforesaid.

11. Thereafter the plaintiff proceeded with the construction of the lines of railway aforesaid, and duly and properly carried out the conditions of the said contracts.

12. Difficulties and delays occurred in the construction of the said lines, owing to various breaches of the contracts by the Government in respect of withholding payments to which the contractor was justly entitled, non-delivery of materials, and hindrances wrongfully and in breach of the contracts, caused by the officers of the Government; also owing to war, and to other extraordinary and unforeseen circumstances, accidents, and causes beyond the control of the plaintiff, and on or about the 12th day of May, 1902, the Government having had repeated notice that if payments were not made the contracts could not be proceeded with, obtained an order of this Honourable Court under and in terms of Article 24 of the aforesaid "general conditions." The plaintiff craves leave to refer this Court to the said order. The said order was obtained upon motion, and the full facts of the case were not able to be put before the Court by the plaintiff (then respondent).

13. The Government thereafter entered upon and took possession of the said lines of railway, and the works, plant, and material in connection therewith, and dismissed the workmen and others employed by plaintiff, and otherwise exceeded the powers given under the said order.

14. Thereafter, on the 19th June, 1902, the Colonial Government obtained in this Honourable Court an order under Article 52 of the aforesaid "general conditions," and the Government thereon determined the contract, and has since the said date remained in full possession and control of the said lines, works, material, and plant. The said order was obtained upon motion, and the plaintiff (then respondent) was unable to place the full facts of the case before the Court, through absence from the Colony and insufficient time to communicate with his representatives here.

15. The termination of the contract and the entering upon and taking possession of the lines, works, and materials was wrongful, and in breach of the contracts of 4th July, 1900, and the plaintiff has suffered loss and damage thereby generally and specially in respect of the loss of profit to which he was entitled under the contracts and in respect of liabilities on divers agreements for the supply of material and otherwise which he had entered into for the purpose of carrying out the contracts of 4th July, 1900.

16. The Colonial Government wrongfully and unlawfully, and in breach of the contracts of 19th May, 1896, 18th March, 1899, and 4th July, 1900, failed and neglected to carry out its obligations under the said contracts; more particularly, the Government failed to carry out its undertakings to afford every reasonable assistance for the speedy and economical construction of the said railways and works in connection therewith, it has failed and neglected on numerous occasions to pay monies to which the plaintiff and the other parties, whose rights have become vested in him as aforesaid were entitled; and on many occasions it has, by suspending or delaying payment beyond the due dates, knowingly caused great financial inconvenience, and done great injury and damage to the credit of the plaintiff. At divers times it has unreasonably caused the contractors to provide materials and do work of a class or nature such as the contractors were not reasonably bound to do or provide. And generally throughout the construction of the line, the Government has repeatedly caused loss and delay by its vexatious and unreasonable treatment of the contractors.

17. The plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of £120,000, by reason of the wrongful and unlawful acts set forth in paragraphs 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16.

18. The actual cost of work and labour done and materials provided by the plaintiff and the companies aforementioned in connection with the construction of the lines of railway amounts to: (a) £269,255, for work, labour, and materials, from 19th May, 1896, to 20th July, 1898; (b) £223,310 4s. 7d. for work, labour, and materials from 20th July, 1898, to 20th June, 1902—or in all, the sum of £492,565 4s. 7d., which, together with interest on this sum from the 20th June, 1902, the plaintiff is entitled to claim as damages from the Government.

19. The Government wrongfully and unlawfully detains certain 50,000 £1 shares in The Thames Ironwork and Shipbuilding Company, the property of and temporarily deposited by the plaintiff with the Colonial Government in March, 1902.

Wherefore the plaintiff claims: (a) £120,000 as and for damages, as set forth in paragraphs 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17; (b) £492,565 4s. 7d., as and for damages, as set forth in paragraph 18, with interest a tempore morae; (c) an order calling on defendant forthwith to restore to plaintiff the 50,000 £1 Thames Ironworks shares wrongfully detained by defendant as aforesaid.

(d) Interest a tempore morae.

(e) Alternative relief.

(f) Costs of suit.

And for an alternative claim should this Honourable Court hold that the entering upon and the taking possession of the said lines and the termination of the said contracts was not wrongful and unlawful, and in breach of the covenants aforesaid (but not otherwise) the plaintiff says:

21. He craves leave to refer to paragraphs numbered 1 to 14, and to paragraphs 16 and 19 above as if inserted herein.

22. Upon the entering and taking possession of the lines, and termination of the contract by the Government as aforesaid, the plaintiff personally, and in his capacity as aforesaid, became entitled under Art. 52 of the said contracts of July 4, 1900, to be paid by defendant, the actual cost incurred in respect of constructing the said lines from the 19th May, 1896, up to the date of entry less the amount of payments made under the contracts to the plaintiff or to the said companies by or through whom cession of the rights under the various contracts had from time to time been made to plaintiff as aforesaid.

23. The actual cost of the lines from 19th May, 1896, to 20th day of July, 1898, is shown on the schedule forming annexure C hereto: the actual cost from 20th July, 1898, to 20th June, 1902, is shown on annexure D hereto. The plaintiff craves that the said annexures may be considered as inserted herein.

24. The amounts due to the plaintiff as on the 20th June, 1902, in respect of actual cost incurred in each of the two periods respectively are (a) £269,255 and (b) £223,310 4s. 7d., amounting in all to £492,565 4s. 7d.

25. There has also become due to plaintiff the sum of £8,209 8s. 4d., being interest on the actual cost which has accrued since the 20th June, 1902.

26. All things have happened, all conditions have been fulfilled, and all times have elapsed necessary to enable the plaintiff to claim the said sums of (a) £269,255, (b) £223,310 4s. 7d., as in paragraphs 23 and 24 set forth, and the sum of £8,209 8s. 4d. as in paragraph 25 set forth, but the defendant has wrongfully and unlawfully failed and neglected to pay the said sums or any part thereof, though repeatedly requested so to do.

27. The Government has, moreover, caused serious loss and injury to plaintiff by delaying and failing to make payment of the amounts due as in the preceding paragraph set forth.

28. By reason of the premises the plaintiff has sustained damages in the sum of £60,000. Wherefore the plaintiff claims:

(1). Payment of the sum of £492,565 4s. 7d., as the actual cost of the lines as aforesaid, being:

(a). The sum of £269,255, the actual cost incurred between 19th May, 1896, and 20th July, 1898.

(b). The sum of £223,310 4s. 7d., the actual cost incurred between 20th July, 1898, and 20th June, 1902.

(2). The sum of £8,209 8s. 4d., interest on the said sums from the 20th June, 1902.

(3). The sum of £60,000 as damages sustained by plaintiff as aforesaid.

(4). Interest a tempore morae.

(5). An order calling upon defendant forthwith to restore to plaintiff the 50,000 £1 ordinary shares in the Thames Iron Works and Shipbuilding Company, wrongfully detained by the defendant as aforesaid.

(6). Alternative relief.

(7). Costs of suit.

ANNEXURE A.

CONTRACT OF 19TH MAY, 1896.

Articles of agreement made and entered into this nineteenth day of May, eighteen hundred and ninety-six, between Sir James Sivewright, K.C.M.G., in his capacity as Commissioner of Public Works, and as such as representing the Colonial Government of the one part, and Sir Gysbert Henry Stockenstrom, Baronet, M.L.C., as chairman, and as representing the Grand Junction Railways (Limited), hereinafter styled the concessionary of the other part.

For and in consideration of the subsidy to be paid as hereinafter mentioned and the rights and privileges conferred under the provisions of the Railway Extension Act of 1895, the concessionary agrees to construct in terms of the Railway Extension Act of 1895 the following lines of light railway in accordance with plans and sections signed or to be signed by the Engineer-in-Chief. The concessionary having the right to deviate at any point, with the consent of the Commissioner namely:

(a) A line of railway from Oudtshoorn via Willowmore to a point on the Graaff-Reinet Railway at or near Klipplaat.

(b) A line of railway from a point at or near Somerset East via Cookhouse and Bedford to Fort Beaufort.

(c) A line of railway from Fort Beaufort via Alice to King William's Town upon the following terms and conditions, namely:

1. The lines of railway shall be constructed in accordance with the specification hereunto annexed marked "A," and with the plans and sections referred to in the preamble hereto which plans and sections the concessionary hereby undertakes to accept as the plans and sections under this contract and as such to sign the same forthwith when required.

2. The Colonial Government shall pay to the concessionary or their assigns provided such assigns are approved of by the Colonial Government by way of subsidy for and in respect of the construction of the said lines of railway a percentage of one-third of the actual cost of construction but not exceeding the total of £1.500 per mile of railway laid.

3. The subsidy shall be payable upon the due completion of sections of not less than 20 miles each. Payment in advance however will be made before the completion of any section of the line upon the certificate of the Government Engineer as to the actual cost of the work then done upon such section and provided that the amount so advanced shall in no case exceed either 40 per cent. of the actual cost so certified or £1,500 per mile of the portion of such section then completed.

4. The amount of actual cost incurred in respect of the construction of any section of the line shall be ascertained either by the certificate of the Government Engineer, or in such other manner as the Governor shall approve, and the total amount of the subsidy shall be computed upon the actual cost of the construction of the entire line, including the cost of such bridges, culverts, tunnels, stations, or other fixed appurtenances of the line, as the Governor may approve. All books, vouchers, drawings, and other documents relating to the construction of the line, whether in the possession of the Concessionary or of their contractor for the purpose of checking the cost of materials of work done, shall be available at all times for inspection by the Government Engineer, or by any other duly authorised officer.

5. At any time after the expiration of twelve years from the date hereof, it shall be lawful for the Governor with the authority of both Houses of Parliament, and after giving at least six months notice, to purchase from the concessionary and take possession of any of the said lines; the purchase price to be the amount of the actual cost determined as aforesaid with the addition of ten per cent., and the deduction of an amount for wear and tear, to be determined in case of difference by arbitration; credit to be taken in the account for all amounts paid by way of subsidy.

6. The tariffs of fares for passengers and rates for goods, produce, live-stock, and vehicles shall be reasonable tariffs, subject to the approval of the Governor, and shall after settlement be liable to be readjusted by the concessionary from time to time, with the like approval, at the request of the Governor, acting upon a resolution of both Houses of Parliament; and the toll, fares, or rates of charge to be taken or made for passengers shall be at all times charged equally to all persons, and after the same rate in respect of all passengers travelling under the same conditions, and the toll, fares or rates of charges to be taken or made for goods shall be likewise charged equally after the same rate, whether by ton or otherwise, in respect of all goods of the same description, and no reduction or advance in any such tolls, fares, or rates shall be made either directly or indirectly in favour of or against any particular company or person travelling upon or using the said railway.

7. The Government shall have the right to run trains with through traffic over the lines to be constructed under this contract, upon the following terms and conditions:

(a) Such trains shall receive equal treatment with those carrying the ordinary traffic of the company.

(b) The engines and rolling stock to be used by the Colonial Government shall not be heavier than those employed by the concessionary upon the lines constructed under this contract, nor run at any higher rate of speed than that used in conducting the ordinary traffic upon said lines.

(c) That so long as through traffic is confined to special trains, the toll or compensation to be paid by the Colonial Government to the concessionary shall be 40 per cent. of the fares or rates fixed and determined under Clause 6 of this agreement. If and when the Colonial Government require a regular service of through trains, then the conditions shall be such as may be mutually agreed upon, and in the event of any difference the terms shall be settled by arbitration.

(d) The through trains shall only stop for the purpose of taking water or when required by the concessionary for the purpose of working their traffic.

(e) That any water required for such through trains shall be hitherto charged to the Metropolitan and Suburban Railway by the Colonial Government.

(f) That the officials of the Colonial Government conducting the through traffic shall be under the concessionary's rules and the orders of their officials when and so long as the through traffic is upon the concessionary's lines.

(g) That if any extra or special assistance is required at stations, signals, sidings, line-staff, or junctions for conducting the through traffic, the cost of such shall be borne in equal shares by the Colonial Government and the concessionary.

(h) That the Colonial Government shall not compete against concessionary for the traffic at terminals or crossings of the lines, such as Cookhouse—to be constructed under this agreement.

(i) The amount of toll shall be settled monthly for the earnings of the previous month, and the accounts of all such through traffic shall be open to the inspection of the concessionary's duly appointed officer, for the purpose of checking and agreeing the accounts in respect of such through traffic.

8. The junction works shall be carried out and subsequently maintained by the Colonial Government or by the Concessionary to the satisfaction of the Government as the Government may determine.

The cost of the works at the junctions shall be borne in equal shares by the Government and the Concessionary.

9. The staff and other requirements for working the junctions including signals and other appliances, shall be provided by and be under the control of the Colonial Government, the cost of the same over and above the existing outlay of the stations where the junctions will be to be borne in equal shares by the Government and the Concessionary.

10. The lines shall be commenced forthwith and shall be completed by the 2nd August, 1899, unless the Governor shall for special reasons extend the said period with authority of both Houses of Parliament, and provided that any delay caused by the Act of God or strikes or from or on the part of the Railway Department shall be allowed for.

11. In the event of the insolvency or liquidation of the Concessionary the Governor shall be entitled then to exercise without notice the option provided in clause 5 (five) to purchase the said line and in the event of the said option not being exercised and the line being disposed of the purchaser shall be liable to all the conditions of the agreement with the Concessionary save in so far as the same may be modified with the consent of the Governor.

12. All materials, plant or stores required for or in connection with the construction of the said railways shall be carried and conveyed over the Government lines at the rate of one penny per ton per mile, and all materials, plant or stores sold, supplied, or lent, or work done by the Railway Department for the Concessionary shall be sold, supplied, lent, or done at net cost, and shall be charged against and deducted from the subsidy herein before mentioned. Further, every reasonable assistance for the speedy and economic construction and working of the proposed lines shall at all times be afforded by the Government, including the lending of all type drawings and sections and results of surveys.

13. If and when the Government shall decide to purchase all or any of the lines constructed under this contract the Concessionary shall be paid at the prices fixed under the Act for all additions to or betterment of the said railways.

14. In the event of the Concessionary failing to complete the said lines of railway or any of them within the time specified in Clause 10, or within such extension of time as may be allowed under said clause of this agreement the Colonial Government shall be entitled to take possession of the line (a) between Oudtshoorn and Klipplaat upon payment to the Concessionary of the actual cost which may have been expended upon said railway or payment of the amount of a valuation to be by arbitration, less the amount of any sum or sums advanced by the Colonial Government, or the lines (b) and (c) between Somerset East and King William's Town, and to sell the same by public auction after reasonable notice, and from the proceeds of such sales to deduct any sum or sums advanced by the Colonial Government on account of said railways, with interest at the rate of three per cent. per annum from date of any such advances until date of taking possession, any balance after deduction of such advances to be paid over to the concessionary or their assignees or at their option. the security mentioned in the next succeeding clause shall be forfeited to the Colonial Government.

15. As a security for the due completion of the aforesaid lines of railway, the concessionary undertakes and agrees to deposit with the Colonial Government the following bonds, namely: 45 first mortgage bonds of the Metropolitan and Suburban Railway Company (Limited), each for the sum of £100, and numbered 154 to 178 and 211 to 240 inclusive, and 60 first mortgage bonds of the New Cape Central Railways (Limited), each for £25, and numbered 633 to 692. It being understood that the concessionary or his nominee shall until a claim arises against the security be allowed to draw interests payable thereon, and that the bonds deposited may be exchanged at any time for similar bonds of same value and that the bonds shall be returned to the concessionary of his nominee pro rata as the sections or works are certified as completed.

16. Any differences arising out of this contract shall be settled by arbitration under the Lands and Arbitration Clauses Act, 1882.

In witness whereof the said parties have hereunto set their hands and the Company its common seal this day and year first above written, in the presence of the subscribed witnesses.

ANNEXURE B.

CONTRACT OF MARCH 13, 1899.

Memorandum of agreement made and entered into this eighteenth day of March eighteen hundred and ninety-nine, between the Honourable Jacobus Wilhelmus Sauer in his capacity as Commissioner of Public Works, and as such representing the Colonial Government of the one part and David Urquhart in his capacity as the duly authorised representative of the Thames Iron Works and Shipbuilding Company (Limited), of Blackwall, London, hereinafter called the company, of the other part.

Whereas on the second day of August, 1898, a contract for the construction of certain lines of railway to wit:

(a) A line of railway from Oudtshoorn via Willowmore to a point on the Graaff-Reinet Railway at or near Klipplaat.

(b) A line of railway from a point at or near Somerset East via Cookhouse and Bedford to Fort Beaufort.

(c) A line of railway from Fort Beaufort via Alice to King William's Town.

(d) A line of railway from Mossel Bay via George to Oudtshoorn, was entered into between the Commissioner of Public Works as representing the Colonial Government and the said company subject to the approval of Parliament, in so far as the same might be necessary.

And whereas the said contract was confirmed by Act No. 40 of 1898, with certain amendments and subject to certain provisos set forth in section 1 of the said Act.

And whereas the said company failed to comply with the provisos required by the said section.

And whereas in consequence of such failure the Colonial Government did on the 7th day of March, 1899, obtain an order from the Supreme Court of this colony restraining the said company from proceeding with the construction of the said lines of railway, ordering them to give up possession of the said lines.

And whereas the said company has now offered to comply with the provisions of Act No. 40 of 1898 and to carry out the agreement of the 2nd August, 1898, as amended by Parliament and subject to the conditions of this agreement, and to give the security required by the Commissioner of Public Works.

And whereas the said Commissioner of Public Works is prepared on behalf of the Colonial Government to allow the said company to continue the construction of the said lines of railway under the agreement of the 2nd August, 1898, and the contracts of the 19th May, and 13th October, 1896, subject to the conditions herein set forth.

Now therefore it is hereby agreed that the said company shall construct the complete lines (a), (b), and (c) before mentioned in terms of the agreement of the 2nd of August, 1898, as amended by Parliament.

1. The route of the line from Mossel Bay to Oudtshoorn shall be via George as set forth in Act 28 of 1895 under which construction of the said line of railway was originally authorised.

2 The terms and conditions upon which the said lines Mossel Bay, Oudtshoorn via George shall be constructed shall be those set forth in the contract of the 15th day of October, 1896, made between the Colonial Government and the Grand Junction Railways Limited as amended by the said agreement of the 2nd of August, 1898, and the present agreement.

3. The ten per cent. retention money provided for in the said contract of the second day of August, 1898, in respect to each and every of the above mentioned lines shall be lodged on or before the execution of this agreement with the Cape Agent-General in London.

5. Interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum on the retention money in respect of each of the said lines shall be paid to the company from the date of the completion of such line until payment of the same is made.

6. A reasonable amount of work shall be done in the first six months from the date hereof that is not less than ten miles of formation of the Mossel Bay-Oudtshoorn via George line, and in each succeeding period of six months up to the 31st of July, 1899, until the work is completed an amount proportionate to the total amount of work required to be done to complete the said lines, failing which the company shall forfeit to the Government the sum of five thousand pounds sterling for each six months in which they shall be in default.

7. In the event of the non-completion of the several lines of railway within the time required by the said agreement of the second of August, 1898, a penalty of one pound sterling per week shall be incurred, and shall be paid by the said company in respect of each line to the Commissioner of Public works for the time being until the due completion of the said lines, unless the delay has been caused by Act of God or strikes.

In the event of the line from Mossel Bay to Oudtshoorn via George not being completed for the 31st day of July, 1901, and the other lines before the thirtieth day of June, 1900, the security referred to in the agreement to wit:

The ten per cent. retention money and the security lodged with the Cape Agent-General in London, shall be forfeited to the Colonial Government as and for liquidated damages sustained by the said Government for the non-completion of any of the said lines as aforesaid, and thereupon all contracts or arrangements between the Government and the said company in respect of all or any of the said lines shall cease and determine, and it shall be lawful for the Government to enter upon and take possession of so much of the said lines of railway as has been constructed by the said company, and the said Government shall thereafter, so soon as the amount of the actual cost of the said lines shall have been ascertained, pay to the said company the amount so ascertained, less amount as shall have been paid on account, and less the amount of retention money hereinbefore referred to.

8. The time fixed by the said Act within which the company shall satisfy the Commissioner of Public Works that it has the power to construct railways will be extended to the 31st day of May to enable the company to alter its memorandum of association.

To this declaration, the plaintiff Government pleaded as follows:

1. For a plea to the declaration, the defendant says:

1. He admits that Arnold Frank Hills, of London, is the plaintiff herein, but denies that he is entitled to sue in any other than his personal capacity, or to sue as a trustee for a joint co-partnership venture called the Grand Junction Railways. The remaining allegations in paragraph 1 of the declaration are admitted.

2. Paragraph 2 is admitted, but as to paragraph 3, while admitting that the company therein referred to commenced the construction of the lines of railway therein set out, he denies that it duly proceeded with such construction.

3. The defendant admits and craves leave to refer to the terms of the contract executed on the 18th March, 1899, referred to in paragraph 4, and says that the said contract was preceded by a contract executed on the 2nd August, 1898, between the then Commissioner of Public Works and one David Urquhart as representative of the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, Limited. The said contract was duly confirmed by Parliament, and is set out as Schedule A to Act No. 40 of 1898.

4. The defendant craves leave to refer to the proceedings heard in and the order made by this Honourable Court on the 7th March, 1899, which order is referred to in the recitals of the agreement aforesaid dated 18th March, 1899.

5. As to paragraph 5 he craves leave to refer to the terms of the original agreement.

6. As to paragraph 6 he admits that on or about the 20th July, 1898, the Grand Junction Railways, Limited, ceded and assigned their rights under the contract of the 19th May, 1896, to the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company, Limited.

7. The defendant admits that the said Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Company did proceed, but denies that it duly proceeded, with the execution of the contract of the 18th March, 1899, and he admits the execution of the contracts dated the 4th July, 1900, craving leave likewise to refer to the terms of Act No. 19 of 1900, of the schedules G. and H. thereto and also of the schedules to the said contracts mentioned in the said contracts, but not printed in the schedules G and H. Save as aforesaid he does not admit the allegations in paragraph 7.

8. As to paragraph 8, the defendant does not admit the construction placed by the plaintiff on section 10 of Act No. 19 of 1900. The contracts referred to in the said section are the contracts referred to in sections 8 and 9 of that Act.

9. Except as to the allegation that the company "duly proceeded" with the construction, the defendant admits the allegations in paragraph 9, but says that the Government refused to comply with the plaintiff's request to recognise the firm styled the Grand Junction Railways as assignee of the said contracts or interested under the said assignment.

10. The defendant does not admit the allegations in paragraph 10, and puts the plaintiff to the proof thereof; and says that the contracts attached to and confirmed by the aforesaid Act No. 19 of 1900, which were substituted for the theretofore existing and thereby cancelled contracts, are the only contracts between the plaintiff and the defendant.

11. As to paragraph 11, the defendant denies that the plaintiff, while proceeding with the construction of the said lines of railway, did so duly or properly, and says that the plaintiff wholly failed and neglected to perform his obligations under the said contracts of 1900 and the conditions thereof.

12. With regard to paragraph 12, the defendant says that such extensions of time were allowed as, in the opinion of the Government Engineer or the Commissioner respectively, the plaintiff was entitled under the provisions of his contract to receive. He admits that he obtained upon motion the order referred to in that paragraph under Article 24 of the "General Conditions" in the respective contracts; but he denies the remaining allegations, which allegations are vague and embarrassing and remain vague and embarrassing notwithstanding the supply of certain particulars under Order of Court with regard to the said allegations and those in paragraph 16.

13. As to paragraph 13, the defendant says that the Government, in working upon the said lines of railway, in utilising the work, plant and material in connection therewith and in dismissing certain workmen or others employed by the plaintiff, did so only in so far as it was authorised by Article 24 of the general conditions and in the exercise of the powers given under the said Order; but he denies the other allegations in that paragraph.

14. As to paragraph 14, he says that on the 19th June, 1902, the Colonial Government obtained an order on motion in this Honourable Court under Article 52 of the aforesaid general conditions, that by such order the contracts became and were determined, and that he thereupon entered upon and took possession of the said lines, and also of certain buildings, material and plant in connection therewith. The remaining allegations in the said paragraph are denied.

15. The allegations in paragraphs 15, 16, 17 and 18 are denied.

16. (1) The defendant begs to refer this Honourable Court to articles 52 and 53 of the aforesaid general conditions in each contract, whereby it is provided that the amount of actual cost incurred in respect of the construction of the respective lines shall be ascertained by the certificate of the engineer or in such other manner as the Governor shall approve.

(2) The Governor has approved of no other manner of ascertaining actual cost, and the amount of actual cost has since action brought been ascertained by three certificates of the engineer, copies of which, with the particulars, have been furnished to the plaintiff.

(3) The aforesaid certificates of the engineer, made in terms of the aforesaid articles, constitute a condition precedent to the recovery by, or rendering to, the plaintiff of any payments in respect of the construction of the said respective lines of railway, and were and are binding on the plaintiff.

(4) The plaintiff is not entitled to receive any portion of the amount of actual cost so ascertained by reason that the aforesaid certificates show that the amounts paid to the plaintiff from time to time and the amounts of 10 per cent. retention money, referred to in the aforesaid article 52, exceed the amount of actual cost so ascertained by the several amounts of: (1) £77,618 9s. 11d. (in respect of the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line). (2) £9,633 11s. 7d. (in respect of the Somerset East-King William's Town line; Somerset East-Fort Beaufort section. (3) £4,950 17s. 7d. (in respect to the Somerset East-King William's Town line; Fort Beaufort-King William's Town section), amounting in all to £92,901 19s. 1d. whereof the plaintiff has had particulars.

17. No credit has been allowed in the aforesaid certificates in respect of the allowance of £80 per mile provided by the aforesaid contracts in respect of expropriation of land, the plaintiff having failed and neglected duly to expropriate and pay for the necessary land, and having failed and neglected to cause all land acquired for the lines of railway under the said contracts to be registered in favour of the Colonial Government, but the defendant is ready and willing to credit the plaintiff with any sums of money duly expended by him in the matter of such expropriation on due proof by the plaintiff of such expending of moneys as aforesaid.

18. The plaintiff is entitled to be credited, and has been credited with the amount of £15,367 10s., being the value of the buildings, material and plant, etc., hereinbefore referred to in paragraph 14, particulars of which amount have been rendered to the plaintiff.

19. (1) In terms of clause 16 of a certain other agreement also dated 14th July, 1900, and annexed as Schedule I. to, and enacted by, the aforesaid Act No. 19 of 1900, the plaintiff was bound within 18 months from the approval of the said agreement by Parliament to complete the section of a certain other line of railway, referred to in the said agreement, from Mossel Bay to George, with the exception of platelayers' cottages and station buildings.

(2) The said Act was promulgated on 19th October, 1900, and the said period of 18 months expired on the 19th April, 1902.

(3) An extension of time of three months was granted by the defendant or his predecessor, having regard to the terms of the concluding paragraph of the said clause, but the plaintiff did not complete the said section of the said line within such extended period, or at all, and therefore forfeited to the Government, in terms of the said clause, the sum of £10,000 sterling, the delay beyond the extended period not having been proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioner to have been caused in manner set out in the said clause.

(4) The plaintiff is accordingly indebted to the Government as represented by the defendant in the sum of £10,000 under and in terms of the aforesaid clause.

20. The plaintiff is further indebted to the defendant in the sum of £4,233 6s. 0d., being money due by the former in respect of carriage, coaching, engine and truck hire supplied by the Government in terms of the said contracts, of which the plaintiff has had particulars.

21. The defendant annexes hereto a summary account, marked X, of the matters aforesaid showing the final balance in which the plaintiff is indebted to the Government, in respect of the matters involved in this suit, namely, the sum of £91,067 15s. 1d., less such amount as the plaintiff may be able to prove to have been duly expended as set forth in paragraph 17 hereof.

22. As to paragraph 19, the defendant denies that the detention of shares therein referred to was or is wrongful or unlawful. The said shares were duly handed over by the plaintiff to the defendant, and the latter lawfully received the same, and has since so held them. The defendant is ready and willing to return to the plaintiff, and tenders taxed costs to the date of this plea.

Wherefore, subject to the said tender, defendant prays that the plaintiff's claim be dismissed with costs.

2. For a further plea to the alternative claim, the defendant says:—

23. He craves leave to refer to the several matters and things hereinbefore by him pleaded.

24. As to paragraph 22, he specially craves leave to refer more particularly to the matters and things set out in paragraphs 16 to 21 of the said plea.

25. Subject to the above, he denies the allegations in paragraphs 22 to 28 of the declaration.

Wherefore he prays as before that the plaintiff's claim be dismissed with costs.

3. And for a claim in reconvention, the defendant (now plaintiff) says:—

26. He craves leave to refer to the several matters and things hereinbefore by him pleaded in his plea to the claim in convention, and more particularly to the balance of £91,067 15s. 1d. set out in paragraph 21 hereof as being due to him by the plaintiff (now defendant). The said amount is now due and payable to the defendant (now plaintiff).

Wherefore the defendant (now plaintiff) claims:—

(a) Judgment in the sum of £91,067 15s. 1d., with interest a tempore morae, less such sums as the plaintiff (now defendant) may prove to have been duly expended in the expropriation of land aforesaid.

(b) Alternative relief.

(c) Costs of suit.

Net total Overpayment		£91,067	15 1

The replication was as follows:—

1. As to paragraphs 2, 7, 9 and 11 the plaintiff says that the lines were constructed in a thoroughly sound and efficient manner.

2. The plaintiff admits that a contract was duly entered into on the 2nd August, 1898, as set forth in clause 3, and says further that the Thames Ironworks and Shipbuilding Co. took over and proceeded with the construction of the lines, and entered into large contracts for materials in connection therewith under the said contract. But the plaintiff says that the agreement as submitted to and confirmed by Parliament (as set forth in Schedule A to Act 40 of 1898) contained a provision which had not been submitted to or approved of by the Company, to wit, the last portion of Clause I, section 6, of Schedule A aforesaid beginning with the words "and also less the value of equipment."

3. The company protested against the said alterations and work on the lines was suspended, but, after the order made by this Honourable Court on the 7th March, 1899, referred to in paragraph 4, the said company entered into the agreement of 18th March, 1899, aforementioned.

4. As to paragraph 9, the plaintiff says that the Government is and was aware of the legal interest of the Grand Junction Railways in the contracts therein referred to.

5. The plaintiff specially denies the allegations in paragraph 10 that the contracts of 4th July, 1900, are the only contracts between the parties hereto, and refers this Honourable Court to the terms of the said contracts of 4th July, 1900, and to the Act No. 10 of 1900.

6. The plaintiff admits, as to paragraph 12, that he has had an extension of time, but says that by reason of the premises the same was wholly insufficient.

7. As to paragraph 14, the plaintiff specially denies that by reason of the order of Court of the 19th June, 1902, the contracts became and were determined.

8. As to the 1st clause of paragraph 16, the plaintiff refers this Honourable Court to the said Articles 52 and 53. As to the 2nd clause, he admits that he has received certain certificates and particulars, but he specially denies the accuracy thereof, or that they are binding on him. He also specially denies the allegations set forth in the 3rd and 4th clauses of paragraph 16 and the construction of clauses 52 and 53 as therein set forth.

The plaintiff says that the said certificates were framed without reference to plaintiff's books or documents, and are drawn up on a wholly incorrect basis and contrary to the provisions of the said clauses 52 and 53, and that they do not show what is the true amount of actual cost incurred in respect of the construction of the lines.

9. The plaintiff denies, with regard to paragraph 17, that there has been any failure or neglect on his part in respect of the expropriation of land for the lines, and says that he has furnished particulars to the defendant in respect of the said expropriations .

10. As to paragraph 18, the plaintiff says that the value of the buildings, material and plant exceeds £50,000.

11. As to the 1st clause of paragraph 19, the plaintiff refers this Honourable Court to the agreement therein referred to.

He admits the allegations in the 2nd clause.

As to the 3rd clause, plaintiff admits that he did not complete the line to George within the extended time, but says that it was impossible so to do by reason of the delay by Government in passing plans for the bridgework, which was extensive, great scarcity of labour, prohibition by the military authorities on dealings in dynamite, which was extensively required, and generally owing to the causes set out in paragraphs 12 and 16 of the declaration. By reason of the premises, the Government is not, under the contract, entitled to the forfeiture .

The plaintiff further says that if any portion of the said sum of £10,000 is due, which he denies, it is due under a wholly separate and independent contract, unconnected with the contracts sued on in this case; further, that if the said sum or any portion thereof is due, it is due by way of penalty, and cannot be set off in the present action.

12. As to paragraph 20, the plaintiff says that he has already paid to the defendant all sums reasonably due in respect of the hire of rolling-stock.

13. The plaintiff specially denies paragraph 21.

14. As to paragraph 22, the plaintiff says that the tender only partially meets his claim and is wholly insufficient.

15. Save as above and save in so far as the plea contains admissions, the plaintiff denies all the allegations of fact and conclusions of law therein contained, joins issue thereon, and again as before prays for judgment with costs.

Replication to further plea:—

16. The plaintiff craves leave to refer to the matters and things above set forth, and joins issue and again prays for judgment with costs.

Plea to claim in reconvention:—

17. The plaintiff (now defendant) craves leave to refer to the matters and things set forth in the declaration and replication in convention.

18. Subject to the above, he denies the allegations in paragraph 28, wherefore he prays that the claim in reconvention may be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), for plaintiff; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor), for defendants.

Mr. Searle said the case was before the Court in December last, and the evidence of Mr. Hills was taken, and the case then stood over until some day to be fixed by the parties, and it had been set down for that day in the ordinary course. Certain formal amendments of the declaration had been decided upon.

Mr. Schreiner said he did not object to any of the amendments. He wished to correct a printer's error in the plea. In section 16 the figures £92,901 19s. 1d. should read £92,201 19s. 1d.

Mr. Searle said that the pleadings in the case were many. There were two portions of the case. Plaintiff claimed damages for breach of these different contracts for the different lines. He claimed damages which he assessed at £120,000 by reason of acts set forth in certain portions of the declaration, and then he went on to say that the actual cost of the work and the labour and the materials provided by the Grand Junction Railway Company, to whom he had succeeded, was £269,000 between May, 1896, and July, 1898, and £223,000 for work and labour and materials between July, 1898, and June, 1902. The contracts were taken over by the Government under section 52, and the plaintiff said he was entitled to claim £490,000 as damages, as well as the £120,000 which he had sustained as damages in lieu of profit. In the alternative of the declaration the plaintiff claimed £492,000 odd as being the actual cost of the lines with interest from 5 to 10 per cent. on a basis which would be set before the Court. But the main claim was for damage as actual cost. This was a question which would be largely determined by argument.

Evidence was then called in support of the claim.

Thomas Mouat Cameron Walker, a resident of Cape Town, stated that he was manager for plaintiff from May, 1899, and also performed certain secretarial work. He acted as manager for John Walker and Sons in 1896, and was familiar with what took place when the first contract was entered into. The first payments took place in October for work done up to September, 1896. The accounts were paid by schedule; the second schedule, which was used for the Oudtshoorn line, had reduced prices on it. The schedules formed the basis of payment for the 1896 contract. There was no inspector of the company's works under that contract. A new schedule came into existence from 1898 onwards for the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, but the old schedule remained in force for the King William's Town line. Difficulties arose in 1896-7 between the contractors and Government; there was a difficulty about getting any payments at all. It was some time before a schedule was agreed upon, and it was then understood that it was a permanent one; but Government held that it was only temporary. Six thousand pounds per mile was the contract price between John Walker and Sons and the Grand Junction Railways. Some trouble occurred about getting advances on the material shipped. A schedule, including that, was arranged in May, 1897. Mr. Urquhart, manager of the Thames Ironworks Co., came out here in 1898, and took over the control of affairs. In October and November, 1899, difficulty arose because the Government refused to make further advances on materials as they were shipped from England, America, and Tasmania. As a result the company were seriously hampered, through arrangements being upset. The Government stopped payments on construction works. The company had as a consequence to give notice to their employees on the King William's Town-Fort Beaufort section, some 200. The payments were actually suspended for a month. They were also very much hampered because the Government could not supply them with sufficient engines and rolling stock to bring up supplies for the construction works. They had great difficulty on this account from the commencement of the war. They were stopped continually for want of one or other of the stores, and the result was that at one time they had some 14,000 tons of material accumulated on the Harbour Board's ground, involving extra charges for off-loading and handling. In 1901 a portion of the line was destroyed, and a considerable amount of damage was done by Boers and rebels. A claim for about £15,000 had been sent in to the Imperial Government in respect to this damage. The men in the company's employ were approached by the military to guard the line, and for three months they were off their ordinary work. During that time no work was done except repairs for the military. Since November, 1900, a passenger coach had been running on the line from Klipplaats to Willowmore. There was considerable dispute between the company and the Government as to payment for that section, which was sixty-five miles in length. The Government took up the position that the line was not completed. One of the objections with regard to the completed sections was as to some 10,000-gallon tanks. He was present at the interview when the matter was brought up. That was when the 1900 contracts were signed. The contract drawings were not supplied to them until about nine months after the contract had been signed. One of the particulars of breaches related to the payment for the Gouritz Gorge survey. At the end of 1900 £667 12s. 6d. was paid. The first material shipped under the contract was cement, in respect to which £1,100 was paid by the Agent-General in London. That amount was afterwards deducted, and the payments were then stopped. They took up the position that the Government were bound under the contract to pay for cement. There was considerable dislocation through the non-advance of materials. A further question arose between them with regard to some underground tanks, the company's position being that they could not include the tanks unless they were put in as extras. He believed that there were about nine tanks mentioned, and the actual cost at a rough estimate was about £70 each. Then there was the rejection of certain sleepers from Tasmania. Mr. Urquhart signed the contract for the Thames Ironworks Company. The quantity supplied was 113.000. In June, 1900, the Government refused to allow these sleepers to be put in on the contract lines, and they also refused to allow them to put them in on the remaining subsidised line, Mossel Bay. The contract was with a Mr. Robertson, of Hobart, Tasmania, and was for 300.000 sleepers, and as a consequence they had been compelled to abandon the rest of the contract, and they had to get fresh sleepers, which meant a difference in cost of 2s. 1½d. They got the later sleepers from the Baltic. The difference was about £20,000. They were continually stopped on account of not getting the sleepers up to the spot. In November, 1900, they had a consignment of sleepers by the Esther. The same dispute occurred in this case as formerly, the Government having discontinued to make advances on the subsidised lines. There was also a dispute with regard to the taking over of the Somerset East-King William's Town section as to the payment of the balance due on that line at the time. They claimed that as this section had been taken over as a Government line, they should be paid 90 per cent. on the certificates instead of 30 per cent.

Mr. Searle: Did the Government ever pay what you claimed had to be paid when they took that over as a Government line?—Witness: No, we claimed that all material and work done previously certified should be included in this section, and should be paid at 90 per cent.

You claim, with regard to the certificates upon which 30 per cent. had been paid, that when they took over this as a Government line you be paid 90 per cent.?—Yes.

You disputed that. Have you ever been paid the balance?—No, the contract was £16,000. £5,000 was paid some months later, and there was also a small payment on certain materials, but the balance is still unpaid.

All work that has been certified as having been done?—Yes, certified previous to that date.

With regard to the general measurements of work disputes arose between you and the Government?—Yes.

Thomas Roy stated that he was a member of the Institute of Civil Engineers, and was one of the chief engineers of the Thames Ironworks Co., in connection with the construction of these railways. In 1901 terrible delay was caused in the construction of the railways, the work being interrupted by martial operations and also retarded by the delay in forwarding goods and materials. The works of the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line were completely stopped for three months on account of the Boers invading the district. Then there was great difficulty in getting dynamite and food for the natives. The number of engineers engaged on the works varied at different times. Almost without exception they had since been taken over by the Colonial Government. He complained of the unfair inspection of the work, as a result of which a portion of the lines had to be re-ballasted, it being alleged there was not proper depth of ballast. Then it was stated by Government that the culverts and bridges had not been built at correct levels, and great sums of money were spent in altering them. He presumed this was after the work had been passed, because it was paid for. He contended that these deficiencies should have been pointed out at an earlier stage. The Government were dissatisfied with the level of which they had previously approved. The matter was held in abeyance until they gave the contractors a re-graded section. Two very high floods occurred, which proved that the original line was a proper one, and then the Government gave a very much modified scheme. That necessitated the alteration of several cuttings, which had to be filled up to meet the requirements. The men were stopped at Twover Waters Poort from October, 1899, till September, 1900. Plaintiffs took up the position that what they undertook had been approved of by the Government. The stoppage at Twover Waters Poort upset all the arrangements. The line had been constructed at Twover Waters

Poort, and the contractors had spent between thirty and forty thousand pounds. By adopting the Twover Waters Poort scheme the line would be shortened by about half a mile. Mr. Dalton had computed the line through Twover Waters Poort at eighty thousand pounds per mile. Witness did not think there was any work as rough and heavy in the Colony as deviating. The original Government line was 300 feet higher than the line through Twover Waters Poort. On many occasions the Government were not able to supply rolling-stock, and in many cases the locomotives were not in a proper condition, and several times they were refused on account of leaking tubes and other defects. It was provided in the contract the the plaintiffs should pay for wear and tear of the rolling-stock. The witness agreed with Mr. Hills in his computation of the betterment of the line at £2,000 per mile. The ballast he reckoned at from £8 to £10 a chair, and the average value of the Cape Government's ballast would be about £4 a chair. The work by the Government was no comparison to the work done by the plaintiffs, and the Government were at present actually using ballast that they had previously condemned. The Government were putting in a worse quality of ballast than that which they had insisted on the plaintiffs taking out. The Government were not now constructing the line on such a standard as they had called on the plaintiffs to do. On the whole, he thought the company would have pushed the work better than the Government. Witness had been through the Government accounts, many of which they objected to on principle. In deviation M 9, which was 50 miles long, the Government allowed for 34,000 cubic yards of hard rock, but witness asserted that there were 185,000 cubic yards of hard rock at that section. The average width from Klipplaat to Willowmore was 15 feet, and beyond Willowmore very nearly 15 feet. The Government had only allowed for a 12 feet width. In the Government account they allowed 700 sleepers for the curves, and the number required by the company was 3,600. The Government allowed £5,000 for plant taken over on the Oudtshoorn line, but witness computed the value at £11,000. In 1896 witness worked on Mr. Dalton's report, which was more of a light line, and the construction now was by no means a light line. It would not be possible even to build a light line at the rate of £4,150. When the company stopped work, there were fully 133 miles ready for rails on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, and rails were laid for 100 miles. The only thing that remained to be done was odds and ends, which could have been constructed whilst the road was running. The superstructures were better than a standard Cape line, where many of the bridges were made of old iron, whereas on the Grand Junction line everything was of the best steel. There were many delays in the inspection of culverts, during which time the men were practically idle. At certain periods during the war it was very difficult to get labour. On the Mossel Bay-Oudtshoorn line the work was hung up for eight or nine months during the Boer invasion, and as they were not allowed dynamite, it was impossible to proceed with the work.

Cross-examined: Witness reckoned that the easing of the gradient from 1 in 70 to 1 in 40 practically doubled the capacity of the line. Witness advised that the whole thing should be shut down in the beginning of 1900 on account of the war. The contract in 1896 was to finish the lines in August, 1899, but it was not finished yet. The contract was not proceeded with till 1898. The company claimed that it was the Government's fault that they had not been financed to push the work, and witness was not prepared to say whether the company were in a position to go on with the work. It was true that workmen had left wholesale at the latter end of the job, but witness did not know of their being compelled to repay any money. On occasions the men had to wait on their wages. There had been instances of the workmen finding the centre of the culverts. Witness contended that the ballasting work should not have been condemned by the Government, as their contract had been carried out. He had been told of instances whore sleepers had been laid down without any ballast. He had nothing to say about any of the Government engineers, but objected to the system they worked under. Witness had never been chief engineer over any system of railways, but in Canada he had been divisional engineer. On a deviation it was the duty of the contractor to show the centre of the line to be constructed. The only instance of an error in the setting out of the centre of the line was about 43 miles from Klipplaat, where they were fully 2 feet 6 inches out. Witness contended that, irrespective of specifications or contracts, the company were justified in using ballast compatible with the country. Witness admitted that it was usual to have the plans approved of before proceeding with the work, but he denied that most of the work which was condemned was completed from the detailed report, which had not been sent to the Government. Witness had practically measured the hard rock at deviation M 9, and still adhered to the computation of 185,000 cubic yards, as opposed to 30,000. The only test witness applied in distinguishing hard rock was common sense. Witness considered that the rock placed on the embankment came under the distinction of hard rock. When the rolling stock was sent up defective, witness believed that the matter was reported to the Government engineer. The Government would be getting a bargain at the rate of £2,000 a mile for the betterment of the line, and if Mr. Hills put it down at £8,900 the Government would be getting it at a fair price. The Government were using all sorts of sleepers that the plaintiffs were not allowed to use. Under the contract the section for Klipplaat to Willowmore was completed when the work was taken over by order of Court. In June, 1901, witness computed that £2,000 would complete the three sections, but the Government engineer put it down at £1,900. The company had to make the increased width of the formation, as it was absolutely necessary, and although it was not specified in the contract, witness considered that the company should be paid for the betterment of the line.

Re-examined: Witness considered the line completed without the few accessories, such as mile posts, etc. The Government were aware that the work was proceeding, and when the company had proceeded at length with it the Government objected, stating that they were going beyond the 15 feet level. The culverts had given satisfaction for the first 40 miles. When the workmen were underpaid witness was aware that the Government had suspended payment. The work was most economically carried out. The contract specified for engines in good working order, and in many cases they had to be returned.

Mr. Schreiner stated that, acting on the suggestion of the Court made on the previous day as to the desirability of shortening the evidence, the defendants had decided to abandon the claim in reconvention for £10,000 for non-completion of the section of the line from Mossel Bay to George. Defendants would leave this to be raised when the matter of the Oudtshoorn-Mossel Bay line came up for settlement between the parties.

Charles Trollip stated that at one time he was deputy-chairman of the Grand Junction Railways (Limited), but ceased his connection with it about 1898. The balance sheet showing the condition of the company in July, 1898, referred to the basis on which the claim was made up. Debentures were issued by the company as the work of building proceeded.

Cross-examined: When Mr. Hills came into the matter, witness practically ceased to have anything to do with the Grand Junction Railways.

David Urquhart, an engineer by profession, stated that he came out to this country in January, 1898, on behalf of Mr. Hills, who at that time was negotiating to take over the contracts of the Grand Junction Railways (Limited). He came here for the purpose of ascertaining whether they could get from Government any better terms than the Grand Junction Railways then had. While he was here, Government advertised for tenders for the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line. No specification was arranged whatever. There was no change in the character of the line when the work passed from the hands of the Grand Junction Railways to the Thames Iron Works Co. After the agreement had been definitely signed, the company, in August, 1898, ordered large quantities of material, including 40,000 tons of rails. The agreement was altered by the Commissioner, against the protest of the witness, who unsuccessfully petitioned the House on the matter. The contract for the rails was a most favourable one, the rails being landed at East London at £5 a ton; the average price for rails in the States and England at that time was from £6 15s. to £6 17s. per ton. Every precaution was taken to build the line as economically as possible, both in the way of materials and labour. He went over the Toverwater Poort line, and in his opinion that deviation was a very valuable one. In February, 1899, there was a dispute between him and the Government over the passing of the Act; after it had been promulgated, Government refused to make payments until he furnished securities. Witness objected to £300 a mile being taken off.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The contract of 1898 was one he had negotiated with Sir James Sivewright when he was Commissioner. When Mr. Sauer became Commissioner certain new provisos were made with which witness did not agree. He was not content with the alterations, and when the Act had been promulgated in Parliament he entered into the agreement with conditions. The breach that was alleged against the Colonial Government was the forcing of the contractor to sign the agreement. The difference of £1,000 was due to the difference between the standard Colonial railways and light railways.

James Smith said he was forwarding agent at Port Elizabeth to the chief resident engineer of the construction of the lines in question. He was formerly employed in a similar capacity to the Grand Junction Railways. During 1901 he made every effort to get the goods away to the lines. There were long delays, some of the shipments lying down at Port Elizabeth fifteen months. Extra cost accrued through handling, and an extra 6l. per ton was put on for taking the goods to Humewood. He had about 5,000 cases of cement stored at New Brighton, a suburb of Port Elizabeth, which were required on the line. For this 2d. per ton extra haulage had to be paid, as well as 6d. per ton per week for storage and 1s. 3d. per ton for handling. Since the war was over more trucks had been available, and the same difficulty did not occur now. The difficulty extended from October or November, 1899, until he left, in May, 1902.

Cross-examined: They had no difficulty about coal. They always had cement, in fact he did not remember that they ever ran short of stores. The department, during the time of the war, gave him all the assistance they could in getting up materials, but they had no trucks. The 15 months' delay was not altogether a delay in landing; there would probably be 2 months to 4 months' delay in the ships. The Theodore took six months to land. The cargoes of certain vessels were still in Port Elizabeth, rails, sleepers, cement, and so on. The charges he had mentioned were not Government charges. Large quanties of sleepers, some 19,640, on which the Government had made advances, were seized and sold in execution by the Sheriff. They were attached and sold by the creditors of Hills and the Grand Junction Railways.

Benjamin Theodore Tonkin said he kept the books of the Grand Junction Railways, John Walker and Son, the Thames Iron Works, and Hills. No. 2 schedule represented 100.15 per cent. of actual cost; No. 3 schedule worked out at 74.4 per cent. of the actual cost. The payments on the schedule were never made from any inspection of the books. Awards had been made for properties expropriated in connection with the lines.

Mr. Schreiner said the Government's position was that they were willing to allow the plaintiff in the account against their claims whatever the Court found in expropriation, because the plaintiff never completed the contract, which was to give the Government transfer of the whole of the lands.

Mr. Searle said that the amount actually paid for land was £2,000, and the amount payable was about £5,000.

Witness said he had examined the Government accounts, and he found that £41.000 had been excluded from the accounts in connection with the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat section. He also took objection to several other features of the accounts.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The £5,000 mentioned as payable included costs of surveys. Government had never given the company a chance to complete the line to Bedford. The Government engineers included work done at Toverwater Poort in the extra prices.

Re-examined: There was a deviation in Toverwater Poort, which required more work than the line as originally arranged.

By Buchanan, J.: The company's books showed the actual cost of construction to the company. Government had made no examination of these books.

Robert Anderson Wise, civil engineer, stated that he was employed on the Fort Beaufort-King William's Town section from January, 1901, and after that on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat section up to April, 1902, when the works stopped. The Government's standard of inspection was very rigid, and the work was altogether of a higher class than that done on the Government lines, on which he had been employed for four years. Some of the ballast that was condemned was superior to some of that used on the Government lines. The superstructure and masonry were both superior to those on the Government lines. In one instance the inspecting engineer asked that a bridge might be built of stones of one particular colour. This was done as far as possible.

Cross-examined: The company's lines were superior to Government's in respect of buildings.

Peter Hendry, a mason employed on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat and King William's Town lines, stated that the company's masonry work was very good indeed. In the building of the cottages greater care was exercised than was usually the case, while the foundations of the bridges and culverts were deeper. The inspection was very rigid, and on many occasions the work had to be done over again. He altered a large culvert on the Klipplaat line because it was an inch out. Less scrupulous care was being taken over the work now that it was in the hands of the Government. At times the work was stopped because of delay in inspecting the foundations of culverts. He had had previous experience on the Cape Government Railways, when he was employed on the Maintenance Department of the Eastern System.

Cross-examined by Mr. McGregor: His work was supervised on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line by Mr. Saland:r. Mr. Gordon was the Government engineer, so far as his section was concerned. They had no plans or sections for the nine-feet culverts, but for the larger culverts they had plans. As regarded the reconstruction of one of the culverts, he was certain it was only done for the sake of a one-inch difference.

James Lennox, foreman of the carpentery work of the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, said he was still in the employ of the Government on this section. The work done by the company was first-class work throughout. There was a very rigid inspection. Often work was condemned and taken out. The cottages, for instance, had imported iron windows, which were condemned and taken out. The windows had been framed at Klipplaat. They were splendid windows, but he believed the objection taken by the Government engineer was that the windows were too large. Special matchwood lining had to be obtained. They were required to get one-inch floorboards, whereas now the Government were actually using half-inch boards. The loading platform at Willowmore was different to other platforms, and was built more strongly than any other that he knew on the Government line. The platform was built on trestles. The passenger platform at another place was quite superior to the platforms usually erected on the line. Generally the workmanship was quite the same now as formerly, but the material used was lighter now when the Government had taken the construction in hand than when the company were carrying out the contracts.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: As to the window frames, he did not see any detailed specifications. The plan supplied by the Government Engineer said they must be ¾-inch frames. Mr. Good was the Government Engineer who saw the frames. The Government required 14 gauge galvanised iron, a standard which was never used for cottages but generally for sheds. There was considerable delay in getting some of the material.

Charles Richards, foreman of the ballasting on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, said he had been engaged about four years on the line in the employ of the company and the Government. He was well acquainted with ballasting. He was now doing the ballasting on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line. He remembered some ballast being condemned about 85 to 86 miles from Klipplaat, and the Government, as a matter of fact, had since used stuff from the same pit. He had seen the ballast now used by the Government; it was simply muck with a little grit in it. The ballast used by the company was far superior to the stuff now used by the Government. He had not the least doubt that the Klipplaat-Oudtshoorn line was better than any other line in South Africa as far as construction was concerned. The sleepers which had been condemned by the Government when used by the company had since been put in by the Government. Sand used for cement was formerly sifted, but since the Government took hold of the work it had been used unsifted.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The ballasting of the company cost 47s. 6d., but the Government had to pay 53s. 6d. The "muck, with rough grit," was put on by a sub-contractor named Lyons. Only certain parts of the ballast were condemned.

David Childers said he had been engaged in railway work in this country for 26 or 27 years. He was engaged for the Grand Junction Railways in 1896. The ballasting was well done, and was deeper than certain contractors had recently put down for the Government at Toverwater Poort.

Samuel Henry Webber, foreman of the ballasting party on the Cookhouse section, said he was with the company for about 18 months. He was now working for the Government in a similar capacity. The ballasting now being done on the section was not quite so good as previously, the Government Engineer informing him that it was not necessary to be so particular as before, when the work was being carried out by the company.

Joseph Roskelly, a mason, stated that he was employed by the company on the King William's Town section for eleven months; he was now working for the company. The masonry was better than the average, and superior to that now being put in for Government. Stone and sand were now being used, which the company was not allowed to utilise.

David Alexander Walker, a mechanical engineer, stated that he was formerly locomotive foreman on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat section. The average number of the locomotives on this section was about six and trucks 70 to 80. Generally speaking, when the locomotives arrived on the section they were in a bad condition. The trucks were also in bad order. If they had had good engines they would have got through the work quicker.

Cross-examined: This was his first practical experience of railway building.

This concluded the evidence for the plaintiff.

Mr. Searle handed in a number of documents showing the assignment of the rights and obligations of the Grand Junction Railways and the Thames Ironworks to Mr. Hills, so far as the Cape Railways contract was concerned. He also asked that the books belonging to the company which, he said, filled two or three cases, should be taken as put in.

The Court agreed.

Mr. Schreiner said that he also proposed to put in a large pile of documents, and he suggested that the whole of the documents be referred to the attorneys on each side, so that a selection might be made of such correspondence as was material to the case.

Mr. Searle said he assented to this course.

For the defence, Mr. Schreiner called

Thomas Smith McEwen, who said that he was at present General Manager of the Cape Government Railways, having held that position since August last year. Previous to that he had been Assistant General Manager from April, 1901. From April, 1899, to March, 1901, he was Chief Resident Engineer on construction on the Grand Junction Railways. When he left there, he was followed for a short period by Mr. Dalton, who was succeeded by Mr. Tippett, who retained the position until the line was taken over by the Government, under order of the Court. Since then Mr. Tippett had supervised the work done under the Government. While witness was Chief Resident Engineer, he made himself familiar with the work going on. The contractors were dilatory in the work. Due progress was not made. The plant was very meagre for the magnitude of the work. On the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, witness's attention was drawn several times to errors in levels. Witness confirmed the correspondence on this point. The setting out of the centre line for culverts by the Government Engineer was a matter of grace. Witness's instructions were that all the assistance possible was to be given to the contractors. Witness never heard of any complaint by the contractors to the effect that all the assistance possible was not given to them. Proceeding, witness gave evidence as to the alleged breaches of contract, confirming the contentions of the Government in that connection. With regard to the stoppage of advances on cement and other material shipped in 1898, 1899, 1900, and 1901, witness said that such advances were never made in his time. There had been such advances at one time, but it was stopped on the advice of witness, who pointed out that cement was part and parcel of the finished work of the masonry under the contract, and was taken into the schedule when the work was finished. If they advanced the money on shipment, it would be very difficult to earmark the cement in the masonry. The same applied to timber and galvanised iron. The only result was that the contractor did not get the money as soon as he would have done under the system of advancing on shipment. It was merely a question of delayed payment. With regard to Mr. Dalton's report, the only difficulty they had with the contractors was as to some 10,000-gallon iron tanks. So far as Mr. Dalton's report and estimate differed from the contract, witness never insisted upon Mr. Dalton's report. As to betterments, at a meeting between the Commissioner, Mr. Elliott, and witness and Messrs. Ainslie and Walker, as representing the contractors, a rough estimate was made of the betterments, and they were put anywhere between £600 and £800 per mile. As to the bridge superstructure, that was paid at so much per ton, so that any better or heavier superstructure would be paid for. As to the non-payment of all the money on each completed section of twenty miles, witness denied that any such section had been completed or taken over. There was correspondence on this point which witness confirmed. Permission had been given to the contractors to run goods over the sections, but in giving the permission, witness was careful to say that that did not include the taking over of the line. It was distinctly understood that the contractors did that at their own risk. The Government had not claimed any of the receipts, although in plaintiff's account a certain amount had been allowed. The only receipts witness knew about were the amounts which the contractors agreed to pay to certain charitable societies. With regard to the alleged delay in the carriage of material, witness deposed that he had done everything in his power to facilitate the carriage of material, and he detailed the steps he had taken. The contractors had, with the approval of the Government, sold 3,000 tons of material to the military authorities. That was material delivered at the contractors' depots for the Klipplaat and Willowmore lines. Proceeding, witness explained the allowances which had been made to the contractors in regard to the Somerset-King William's Town line, when that became a Government, instead of a subsidised line. As to joint measurements, he explained that these were not always made, because it was desired to fix the monthy amounts to be paid to the contractors as quickly as possible, and in cases of dispute the matter was rectified in the following month. He denied the statements that there had been any unfair inspection or rejection of work. Mr. Gillespie told the contractors to stop the work at Toverswater Poort until he had a certified plan. When witness was appointed to supervise the work Mr. Urquhart suggested that he should not settle this deviation first, but the one from Bedford to Somerset East. When he visited the Poort, where he found work going on, he said that the work could not continue until an approved section had been submitted. To witness's knowledge the central line was never approved by Government. The reason he wanted the line at a higher level at the Poort was because he was not satisfied that it was sufficiently high above high-water mark. He accordingly increased the height of some portions of the line by nine feet, but after further inquiry he made the increase only at two places. There might be places where they increased the height by a couple of feet. The highest increase was 5 ft. 6 in. Witness expressed the opinion that the cost of raising the levels should fall on the contractors, and not on the Government, because the former did not get their approved levels. The contractors were informed that the work they did before he gave them their levels was done at their own risk. The standard of masonry and ballasting insisted on by the Government engineers was not too high. With regard to the Tasmanian sleepers, large quantities of them were being got out. Some of the sleepers were attacked by white ants and began to shake and crack. Witness recommended Government not to take any more of these stringy bark sleepers, seeing there was a large quantity going into the line a considerable risk was being run as to their "life." He advised that it would be better to utilise creosote sleepers, the "life" of which they knew. A quantity of Tasmanian sleepers was utilised, Government accepting all that came up to sample and all those on the water. The others they would not allow to pass; there was nothing in the contract to say that they should take them. They had to be approved. Witness explained the difference between what was meant by hard and soft rock. The former could not be got out without boring or the use of explosives; the latter was a bedded, disjointed rock which could be taken out without considerable labour with the pick. For the purpose of cheapness in working witness would blast a good deal of what he would call loose rock. As far as witness's experience went, the plaintiff's lines were well constructed. Witness insisted on the contractors sticking to the specifications. The lines were equal to good Government work. He had not authorised anything like an inferior standard of work since Government took over the operations. The schedule prices were fair. He had worked out the cost per mile as upon the basis of the figures that the Government had actually paid. The Government had advanced £1,005,232 upon the whole construction of the lines, and there was the claim now brought against them of £492,000, making a total of £1,497,232. Deducting the value of material which was on hand on the working of the lines, £206,254, they had £1,290,000 which, divided by the total distance of rails laid, 179 miles, gave the amount that the Government would be paying as £7,212 per mile. The lump sum in the contract was £4,450, plus betterment, which would be £600 to £800 per mile. A lot of work had to be done over again, costing £20,000 to £30,000. There was also loss to the contractors through various reasons, the Boers invading the district, and so forth.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He admitted that the department made a very good job of the Toverswater Poort section, but he did not express any opinion on the suitability of the route.

Thomas Rees Price, at present General Manager of the South African Railways, said he was formerly General Manager of the Cape Government Railways until August, 1902, from May, 1901. He also carried on the functions of chief traffic manager from 1893. He was familiar with the Hills contracts. There was an anxiety on the part of the Department to get the work along, and they did every thing they reasonably could to help the contractor. He considered it was quite incorrect to state that the Department starved the contractor in the matter of advances. At that period the country was in a disturbed condition, and many of the advances were made without submission to Parliament. Mr. Hills arrived in the latter part of 1901. He endeavoured to secure special advances from the Government. Witness had correspondence in his department with Mr. Hills, and the Commissioner and the engineer-in-chief. It was correct that £10,000 was advanced to Mr. Hills a week after his arrival. Mr. Hills was mistaken in saying that one-third of the Mossel Bay line had been completed at that time, and that the £5,000 was not to be deducted on the certificates to be given. Mr. Hills was hoping to get £40,000 on the Mossel Bay line, and by a very liberal interpretation of the contract they were able to give him £35,000 on the line, but it was not on the basis that one-third of the line had been completed. The result of the discussion later on as to the granting of the remaining £5,000 was that there was a belief that £5,000 worth of work had been done, for which certificates were to come in and £5,000 was advanced. This was not on the Mossel Bay line. Mr. Hills was mistaken in his view as to the deduction, as the records showed. While he was traffic manager he gave every possible facility to the contractor in the construction of the line.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Mr. Hills, when he came to this country, wanted £20,000 in South Africa and £20,000 in England at once; he was urgently in want of money. He wanted the money before he sailed back home. Witness did not know that the contractor was very short of material, for he sold 3,000 tons. He knew that 3,000 tons of material was sold to the Imperial Government as a special favour during the war. While the C.G.R. had delayed material the contractor was, he said, not so short of material that he actually required.

George Gordon, acting resident engineer on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, said that he had been engaged on that line since 1898. The contractor and him.

self made joint measurements up to April, 1899. After that joint measurements were not always made. There was only one dispute. Witness made measurements and worked out the prices. In case of dispute if witness's certificate did not accord with that of the contractor's engineer, and they were unable to adjust the difference, his own certificate had to stand, and it was backed by the Chief Resident Engineer. When the Government took over the line they proceeded to finish the work. None of the three sections on the line were completed. On three occasions in 1901 and 1902 he drew up a schedule of the value of the work remaining to be done. He was district engineer for a portion of deviation No. 9; his part contained Kraantz Poort, but not Toverswater Poort. At that time the question arose of their proceeding with the work. He told them to stop, because he could not get the complete section showing what the contractors were going to do. He reported to Mr. McEwen. There was not a complete plan when the contractors did that work. The levels were dealt with on an approved plan and section sent in by Mr. McEwen. In the contract of 1900 there was the classification of material, but no such classification was made before the contract, and a good deal of the work had then been done. The rock was nowhere so difficult to get out as it was in Toverswater Poort. He based his calculations on this rock. In his section he had not allowed for any embankments got out in quartzite. He prepared the data for the final certificate on that line. He had good assistance, and he checked the work as far as possible. There was no great divergence between his certificate and the provisional certificate under the contract. As to the alleged rigid exaction in this inspection, he had not been exacting beyond his duties as an engineer of the Government. It must have cost the contractor a great deal to do rightly work that had been done wrongly. He did not know that the work had been delayed at Kraantz Poort through any action on his part, except on one occasion for a finished plan and section where there was a high embankment. They were deviating from the Government standard of curves. When the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line became a contract line he had to do with the measurements of all work done on the old contract in 1898. He showed all the work done up to that time. The contractors' engineer's certificate and his own certificate were identical in amount—£59,015. As to the allowance to the contractor for plant works, etc., taken over, on which the Government had made no advances, those figures were prepared by his staff. The stock was taken by the contractors' own storekeeper. Witness actually gave more value on one section than the figure recommended by a man who had previously been in the contractors' employ. There was a serious discrepancy between the materials advanced upon and the materials found on the line. He had no knowledge of any ballast condemned by the Government officials when used by the contractor, having afterwards been used by the Government. He did not think that the work was afterwards inferior.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: The match-boarding was shown on the plans. The measurements in Kraantz Poort were made by witness; the bulk of them brought up in the accounts were the original monthly certificate measurements. In some cases they measured over again, but the larger proportion were the monthly certificate measurements. The classification was done by Payne on witness's instructions. He was not aware that the classification as given to Mr. Roy was different to the Government's account. Mr. Keeling, district engineer, classified the figures for Toverswater Poort. The bulk of the valuation of plant had not been made by witness himself. There was quartzite at Kraantz Poort, but he called that quartzite loose rock. The work at Toverswater Poort was commenced in November, 1898. His first objection was to a certain gallery; he thought the work was below the 15 ft. level. On the 29th January, 1899, he took this objection. It was not a question of plant, but of river level.

Buchanan, J., said that these mistakes were made, but were afterwards rectified by the contractor, and so far as damages were concerned there was an end to them.

Witness, further cross-examined on the point of the alleged difference of work now and formerly, said he had no knowledge as to the alleged use by the Government of materials which had been condemned under the contractor. That matter belonged to his District Engineer, Mr.

Keeling. Re-examined: He could say from his own observation that the Government was not putting in inferior ballast. In his figures for the Government he allowed for embankments at 1s. 3d. When they worked at Toverswater Poort at first they had no plans or sections.

Arthur May Tippet, chief resident engineer, said he had supervision of these lines. He commenced as Acting Chief Resident Engineer in 1901. The certificates were under his supervision. The gross value of work done and material working to line on Mr. Hills's contract at schedule rates amounted to £369,413 14s. 7d., representing the gross value of work done under the contracts of 1900. From this amount 10 per cent. deductions had to be made for retention money. The figures were put in at the schedule prices. The value of work done based on the prices in the superseded contract on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line was £59.015. Adding this to the gross value, less 10 per cent., they got a total of £391,487, from which had to be deducted £2,263 10s. 1d., value of work done under clause 2 of the contract. He had stock taken of the material which was in possession of the Government and against which advances had been made. He also had stock taken of buildings, plant, and material, which had not been advanced against, but which was taken over by the Government on all the lines. The value against which no advances had been made was £15,000. He could not express any definite opinion personally as to whether this was a reasonable value; he had been given the value by the subordinate engineers, and he had no reason to doubt that they had made a fair valuation. When the work was taken over and got into full swing, Government found that they could do the work at less than the schedule prices in use when the contractor did the work.

The ballasting in the schedule was put down at 103s. 8d. per chain; the Government was doing it at 65s. He thought 103s. 8d. was too high a figure to pay, even during the time of the war. He denied that the work was now of an inferior class, compared to what it was under the contractor; in fact, from his own knowledge he could say it was exactly of the same description now as previously. As to the contractors' work, when correctly done, it was well done; but there was an immense mass that was incorrectly done. The levels had in many cases not been worked to. The ballasting on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line was originally very badly done. As to the embankments, the specifications were 12 to 14 feet wide embankments. If this width had been exceeded by way of betterment, it would be a considerable item. Assuming that that was not allowed to the contractor as a betterment, he could only get the information as to the cost from the contractors' books, and even then it would be difficult. When stocks were taken, a considerable discrepancy was found in the materials against which advances had been made, whether working to the line or not. Certain of the material advanced against was seized and sold in execution. As to the question of betterments, he did not allow anything for the extra width of embankments, because it was not allowed in the contracts. His actual allowances for betterment on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line were: Permanent way, additional ballasting, etc., £502 18s. 2d. per mile; over the 106 miles to deviation No. 9, according to comparative quantities, the amount would be £259 1s. per mile; bridges and culverts, £37 9s. per mile over the 106 miles. He thought some of the betterments were necessary, but the widening of the embankments was not required, and it was no benefit to the line. On the Somerset East-King William's Town line, the permanent way came to exactly the same figure, £502 18s. 2d.; earthworks, £364 7s. 8d.; and masonry, £8 19s. 5d.—making a total of £876 5s. 3d. It thus turned out that if the contractor had continued and had completed the lines, the fullest possible allowance that Government could have made would have been: Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat, £4,150 per mile, plus £799 8s. 2d. for extras; Somerset East-King William's Town, £4,500 per mile, plus £876 for extras. He did not know that they had insisted on Mr. Dalton's report, though he had referred to it as indicating what would be a complete line, and the contractor was to build a complete line. He called upon the contractor to build underground tanks for the cottages. He found mention of the tanks in Mr. Dalton's report, and he knew that it was the custom to build them on the Cape line. The tanks cost the Government £43 each. The contract said that "omissions were provided against," and he put the tanks in as omissions. None of the 10,000 gallon tanks had been supplied. The completed mileages when the Government took over the work were: Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat, 93.6; Somerset East-Fort Beaufort, 40.62; Fort Beaufort-King William's Town, 24.9. This made a total mileage completed by the contractor of 159, while the total length which had not been touched was 71½ miles. Roughly speaking, the total length running was 180 miles, but this was not open; it was simply the length of rails laid by the contractor. As to Toverswater Poort, he did not think the contractor should be allowed for quartzite, seeing that he was already paid twice over as bank and cutting. With regard to the alleged delay in the transport of material to the contractor, there were delays, but not for long; they were of short duration, for cement and coal. During his association with the work, it was proceeding very slowly, and at a very unsatisfactory rate. He was not aware of any undue inspection and exaction by the Government officials on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line. He was put in as referee, and when complaint of rigid inspection was made, he made his decision as lenient as possible. He knew of no superior masonry on the line, such as had been alleged by the witnesses on the other side.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He admitted that on annexure 3 A the Government put down the value of the work done at £2,263, while the actual cost, according to the schedule, was £4,100. He thought that was quite reasonable, when they bore in mind the disorganisation of the works, the natives having left their work and so forth.

Mr. Searle: Yes, but that won't do, Mr. Tippet—collecting natives.

Witness: If you don't agree with me, why ask me? I give you my opinion, that it can easily cost three times as much.

Mr. Searle: But is that your explanation of the large margin of nearly double the amount?

Witness: My explanation is the general disorganisation of the work, and that it was very much more costly to restart it.

Mr. Searle: Will you give me the figures on the other annexures?

Witness: On 3 B schedule, rate £917 14s. 11d., cost to us £864, and 3 C schedule, rate £119 13s. 8d., cost to us £196 5s. 4d. You have naturally chosen the worst from our point of view.

Mr. Searle: Oh, no; I took the first.

Witness, further cross-examined, said he had not said that the contractor was entitled to "better" up to a standard Cape line. He knew that Mr. Dalton allowed £157 extra for the widening of the line up to the standard width; but still it was not authorised in this particular case. The contractor would naturally want to throw his stuff out, and it would be convenient to him to have a wider embankment. He was not aware that an order had been given by the Government to the contractor to bring material to widen the embankment. The speed on that line was, in Mr. Dalton's report, limited to 15 miles an hour. He did not know that there was anything remarkable in that. On the Port Elizabeth-Avontuur line, for instance, the speed was limited to twelve miles. The speed on the principal lines was limited to twenty miles. The work actually done by the contractor was equivalent to 159 miles completed.

Mr. Searle: I suppose you contradict those witnesses who have come here and said that the work which they are doing now on the line is inferior to the work that they were required to do when they were working under the contractor.

Witness: I can only say that if they are doing that they are rogues, because it is against our wish and instructions.

Mr. Searle: Yes, but you know you are at Port Elizabeth, and you can't speak as to the character of the work.

Witness: I have not ordered any deterioration of the work, and my engineers, to my knowledge, have not ordered it.

Mr. Searle: As to the progress of the work, the condition of the country was very different then to what it is now?

Witness: The condition of the country was not such as to interfere materially with the contract if it were properly conducted.

Re-examined, witness said that a great amount of expenditure was incurred in the cost of reparation of the line from Middle Drift to King William's Town.

Allen Grant Dalton said he was assistant engineer-in-chief of the Cape Government Railways. He had been over twenty-eight years in the service of the Cape Government. The report of 1894 was his report. In regard to the origination of the line, he was the author of the estimate for a light railway. The idea of that railway was fairly represented in the Act of 1895. He made a distinction in his report between a new permanent way line and one equal to the Cape Government main line. He showed in his estimates a difference of£1,600 for betterment between one and the other. The principal difference was in the heaviness of the permanent way material. The steel superstructures on the Government line in his opinion were as good as those used in this line built by the contractor. Generally speaking, the specifications for the bridge superstructures were practically the same in the case of the Government line and the contract line. The altering of the gradient from one in 40 to one in 70 would probably increase the cube of earthwork. For the construction of the lines 12 to 14 feet deep, embankments were maintained in the specifications, but the ballast was increased from 12 to 18. He corroborated the figures given by Mr. Tippett. Those figures bore out his own estimate. As to the line between Klipplaat and Willowmore, a great deal of that line was a deviation from the plans. He understood that the contractor started with his alterations right away, actually from the station.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle, witness said he had no instructions as to making his report on the basis that the Government would call for tenders. In one case his estimate was £4,450 a mile, and in the other £5,000, less £300 for equipment. He adhered to his reports. He considered that a line equal to a Cape Government line, Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat, could be built for £6,058 per mile. It would be a one in 40 line, 5 chain curve. If the gradient and curve were altered to one in 70 and 8 chains respectively, the cost would be increased, but he could not give figures. His idea in his estimate of £4,450 was that the ballasting could be reduced in the Karoo. In some respects this Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line was not equal to the Cape Government line. The stations were not so good. He would not say that in some respects the line was not superior to the Cape Government line. The superstructures on the bridges were heavier on the Thames Ironworks contract than on the Cape Government line, but that did not make a better bridge. The bridges might be heavier, but it did not follow they were more substantial. He believed the bridges were very good work. The 6 ft. and 9 ft. culverts on the contract line were of steel. He did not know that any old rails had been used for culverts on the main line. The speed limit of fifteen miles an hour was not unusual for a branch line or a light line. He did not think they would find trains running on the ordinary C.G.R. line at twenty miles an hour, except fast passenger trains.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner, witness said the width of the embankment remained the same as when he made his report for a light line. Taking the contract lines as a whole, the actual work itself was, he believed, as good as they put into their Government lines. The embankments were wider on the Government lines.

Alexander Keeling, district engineer on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line, said his district was No. 3, including Toverswater Poort. The contractors' engineer and himself calculated the quantities after measuring, and they jointly completed the measurements each month. He based his final calculations on the contractors' cross-sections. The greater portion of the rock at Toverswater Poort was quartzite. The Poort extended a little over a mile and a half, and it was in this portion that the quartzite appeared. Outside the Poort he found no quartzite in deviation No. 9. He found there a big proportion of shale. The regrading occupied about three months, and was done for the purpose of making the line safe from the water. The work was good when it was done, but it took a good deal of worry getting it done. The levelling was badly done. There was also an error in masonry. He believed a small portion of ballast was condemned. As to the alleged inferior stuff now in use, he denied that it was "muck, with a little grit." It was pure grit, with a little loose earth on the surface. His inspection was not exacting.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle, he did not approve of the surface stuff that he had mentioned. It was recently put in by the sub-contractor, and he should not sanction it whether it had been done by the Government or the company. Most of the portion in his district was deviation. There ought not to be any difficulty in the levels of the line. That was an elementary principle of railway engineering. He knew a survey had been made some years before, and it was not surprising to him that the centre pegs should have been lost. Very little in the way of widening the formation was carried out in his district. The contractors' engineer and himself made out joint certificates; that practice was continued until December, 1901. The monthly certificate was drawn up by Mr. Gordon. Witness could not say whether Mr. Gordon would draw it out on the joint measurements of himself and the contractors' engineer.

Re-examined by Mr. McGregor: The disapproved surface stuff in the ballasting was put in last December. It ought to be stripped off the ballast. It was put in by the sub-contractor.

George Lacey Good, district engineer, now in charge of the Klip River water scheme, said he had been an engineer on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line up to 40 miles from Klipplaat. When he got there he found the earthworks completed, except the trimming. The 20 miles sections had not been completed when he left. As to the monthly certificates, the contractors' engineer often carried out a joint measurement with himself. He did not think the material or work on the line was any better than on the Government line. He had had to complain very often about the ballast at first, but an improvement afterwards took place, though even then when his back was turned they would go and put in big stones again. He did not think there was even sufficient supervision on the part of the contractors' engineer. The re-grading was consented to as a convenience to the contractor. There was loss through errors. There was a good deal of ballasting to be done over again owing to bad formation. He had to take up all the points and crossings at Willowmore Station at the Government's expense. There were other features in which loss was incurred. There was fault to be found in connection with Swanapool Poort Station. The work was slowly carried out. As to the standard of inspection no complaint was made to him that this was too vigorous. When he made his measurements for the final certificate the contractors' engineer refused to accompany him, as, he explained, he had instructions from the general manager of the works not to do so, because they did not recognise the right of the Government to take measurements at all.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He did not know that Willowmore Station had been paid for a couple of years before this fault was found with the points and crossings. The embankments were trimmed up during his term of office. The embankments were widened at the same time, but he would not say the widening was the result of the trimming. As to levels, they did not expect to have much difficulty in that matter; it was the simplest thing. His assistant (Mr. Everton) told him that even after he had given the contractors' men the levels they would not work to them. He had no complaint to make of the style of work that the contractor did after the faults pointed out had been rectified.

John Gillespie, engineer of the Somerset-King William's Town and the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line at different periods, said he did not think there was any undue inspection of the work. The levels were ignored in the first instance in several places, and re-grading or re-adjustment of the section was necessary. There was considerable deficiency in the ballasting on the Oudtshoorn-Klipplaat line. At Toverswater Poort, Deviation No. 9, the men were working without having approved and signed plans before them. It was his opinion at the time that the formation level was too low. Plans were afterwards approved. He formed a very bad opinion of the quality of the sleepers received at Cookhouse in 1896. They were stringy bark sleepers, and were described to him as Tasmanian. The quantity was about 18,000. During the war the temporary bridges between Willowmore and Toverswater Poort were damaged by the enemy. He always thought the engineering staff of the contractor was inadequate, and that there should have been more supervision.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He did not know what afterwards became of the sleepers that he condemned. There was no practice, as far as he knew, of inspection of materials at the port of arrival.

Edward P. Popkis said he had been engineer on the Fort Beaufort-Somerset East line. At times they had joint measurements, between the contractor's engineer and himself, and at other times he made the measurements on his own account. Mr. Brady (his assistant) took the measurements for the final certificates; it was all measured up again and found to correspond with the provisional certificates. Witness checked Mr. Brady's measurements. A deduction of 7,440 cubic yards was made on account of unauthorised embankment in the neighbourhood of Cookhouse. This was prior to the adoption of the deviation. There were repeatedly mistakes as to levels on the part of the contractor. Fault had also to be found with the ballast over a three-mile length. It was not true that a lower standard of work was sanctioned on the Klipplaat-Oudtshoorn line when the Government took it over, as compared with the work while the line was in the hands of the contractor. He was not aware of any serious delays which would have hampered the contractor in the execution of the work. The engines and rolling-stock furnished by the Government to the contractor were similar to those now in use on the construction, and were similar to those generally used by the Government for construction works. He did not consider that the engines were kept in proper order by the contractor, and he also found that the trucks were roughly treated in the course of the excavations. Except for a fortnight there was no stoppage of work, owing to the disturbed state of the country. Labour was scarce about that time, and there was difficulty in procuring a supply, but he also knew that the contractor discharged men. The men were not paid regularly, a fact which caused a good deal of dissatisfaction, especially among the natives. He invited the contractor's representative to join him in the preparation of the final measurements, but no one joined him representing the contractor, as they said they were not authorised to do so.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: When he told the witness Weber not to be particular about the ballasting, it was in cases where the banks had subsided, and he said that refuse material could be used up to 9 or 10 inches below the surface. He denied that the Government were now using ballast that had been condemned when used by the contractor. He made the deduction of 7,000 odd cubic yards of embankment, because it was unauthorised work.

Thomas K. Brady, assistant to the last witness, spoke to the measurements which he carried out for the final certificate.

Evidence was also given in corroboration of the testimony of previous witnesses by Sidney Firth, Acting Resident Engineer on the Somerset East-King William's Town line; Henry Reid Gordon, assistant engineer to Mr. Firth; and others.

Mr. Schreiner closed his case.

Mr. Searle, K.C. for plaintiff): This action is brought on two counts, viz., on the grievances set forth in paragraphs 12 and 17 of the declaration.

[Buchanan, J.: You do not say that the Government acted unlawfully in taking over the line?]

No; they had power to do that under Article 52 of the General Conditions.

[De Villiers, C.J.: We must assume that the judgment of this Court delivered on June 19th, 1902, was warranted.]

I submit that the Court would never make a final order on two affidavits such as were then produced.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is not now a matter of argument. The Court heard full argument before giving its decision.]

Then I come to the agreements of May 19, 1896, and March 18th, 1899.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But the agreement of July 4th, 1900, is quite against your contention. Would not the Government be entitled to claim damages for your breach of contract?]

I do not think so; the Government tried to get out of their agreement. The mere fact that the Government says that the company has not complied with certain provisions cannot disentitle us to damages. No final settlement was ever arrived at under any of these contracts. These questions of settlement have not been raked up lately, but these different contracts were ways of carrying on business from time to time, and from time to time the conditions have been changed. A considerable portion of our claims accrued while matters were more or less under discussion. Under the agreement of 1898, £120,000, being 10 per cent. of the profits of the company, were agreed upon as rent; but before going into this more fully, I may say that we sue for £492,565 as the measure of our damages. The rest of our claim is for interest, work, labour, and materials. Our alternative claim is based on the value of the property and the actual cost of construction. My first point, then, is the question of damages. I may here point out that during the progress of the work alterations were made in the schedules. Under Act 40 of 1898, as well as under the agreement of May, 1896, the Government recognised the difference between "actual cost" and "value," and yet they made no effort to ascertain what the actual costs were. They, however, knew perfectly well, and even suggested the very principle of ascertaining the actual costs, which we now put forward. As to the refusal of the Government in December, 1898, to allow us to continue our works, Government stood aloof and refused to grant any advance unless we consented to accept it on their terms. In one way the company was bound to go on with the works, but to have done so on the condition the Government now wished to impose would have been to throw away their whole case. On October 12th, 1899, Elliott refused further advances on material for the Oudtshoorn section. A long correspondence ensued, and subsequently the Government undertook to pay for the importation of material. In December, 1899, the Government for the first time took up the position that they would no longer pay on the basis of Sec. 3 part 3 of Schedule A to Act 40 of 1898, but only on the basis of actual costs. This was opposed to Section 5 of the schedule, which was still in full force and operation. Again they changed their ground, and in a most unbusiness-like way come and seize on our whole plant, and most unfairly based their estimate of the actual cost on the cost as over the whole line, instead of on that part which had been actually completed. They had no right to stop payment on construction work certified by the engineer and on the importation of material. (See Sec. 5, part 1, of Schedule A of Act 40 of 1898 and Sec. 8 of Schedule G of Act 19 of 1900. Mr. McEwan's evidence goes too far. There has been no suggestion that the company was not honestly endeavouring to carry out its contract, and yet the Government now say that they were at liberty to delay payment on cement, timber, etc., and that it did not matter to the contractor when he might get paid.

No; none of our witnesses have said that. Some witnesses have said that the cost would work out at £72.000 odd per mile, but some miles are better than others.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But if the same ratio of expenditure had been kept up, the contract would have been a loss.

Mr. McEwan worked out his estimate on 179 miles of rail, but he gave no credit for line completed but on which trains were not yet running. Then the contractor agreed to take over the Mossel Bay line, which was a white elephant to the Government. Mr. McEwan's evidence does not help the Government. The Government again broke their contract with us by refusing to recognise some 2,000 miles of line actually completed. Even now they still refuse to recognise this betterment. We say the betterment is worth at least £2.000. Again in December, 1900, trains were actually running over the line from Willowmore to Oudtshoorn, and yet the Government contended that these sections were not completed, and that their completion would cost over £19,000.

[Buchanan, J.: The Government never took over a single mile of that line.]

It was not a question of taking over, but of paying for work completed. As to the conveyance of material, I admit that the Government did their best to help us; but this was one of the few things they positively undertook to do, and they failed to do it. (See the evidence of Captain Smith.) According to Sec. 30 of the agreement of 1900, the Government will excuse delay in completing the works on account of war, but a state of war actually existed when that agreement was entered into. Again, from £20,000 to £30,000 worth of work which had been completed and certified for was ordered by the Government to be done over again at our cost.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was the work redone under protest?]

Not, I believe, under a formal protest, but we complained about it. Now that our contract of 1900 has been terminated, we ask the Court for an expression of opinion on the merits.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But you are claiming damages with costs. How can you do that if you do work over again without a protest?]

We also objected to being called upon to re-ballast the line. The Government complained of the way in which we had done the work, but we say that the correspondence shows that they approved of the work.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Will not this item come in better under the question of actual costs?]

Yes, possibly, but we say that "actual costs" means the cost of all work done. The men now empoyed by Government say that the Government made exceptional requirements in regard to this line, and that it was quite up to the standard of any Government line. (See the evidence of Hills and of Roy.) Some of the locomotives supplied by the Government were very bad. As to the delivery of sleepers, Government was bound to deliver them at 3s. 9d. each; and yet, after having approved of these sleepers, they rejected a certain quantity. In consequence of this, we had to get sleepers at a higher price, and this cost us £20,000. A reasonable construction of Sec. 52 of Schedule H (Act 19 of 1900) would refer it to all material imported for the purposes of railway construction; but we are not now bringing an action against the Government for taking possession of this material; we ask only for the value of these sleepers at 3s. 9d. each. Again, the Government refused to pay some £12,000 (reduced by counter-claim to £10,000) due under Sec. 7 of Schedule H. As to the 30,000 shares of the Thames Iron Works, the Government seized upon these shares and attached them. This they had no right to do. At all events, these ought to have been given back when the Government took the line and the arrangement under which this security was seized had fallen through. I will now deal with the question of "actual costs."

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Court won't require you to argue about the actual cost itself, but upon the actual cost there was to be deducted, the amounts already paid to order, and there was further to be taken the 10 per cent. deductions, and they may keep those.]

We must give them the 10 per cent.; that must be deducted for the Mossel Bay line.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Should there not be deducted work which was unnecessarily done which was wrongly done in the first instance, and which had to be altered, actual cost of work done twice and unnecessarily? Is it not open to the Court now to appoint a referee; then the point will arise as to the instructions to be given to him, whether or not he should deduct from actual cost, waste of cost? I should have thought you had waived your right to arbitration by suing the Government now.]

We sued them for actual cost, but the arbitration clause is not interfered with.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I am not sure whether it would not be the better course for each party to nominate an arbitrator, and there should be an umpire between the two. The point is, whether it is a referee, an umpire, or arbitrator, upon what basis he should proceed to arrive at the cost?]

It is important to my client that there should be no unnecessary delay in having this matter definitely settled, and it would probably be difficult to procure three men who are able to deal with a matter of this kind. It would be in the interests of expedition if only one man were appointed.

[De Villiers, C.J.: We want a person with peculiar qualifications; he must be a good engineer and a good accountant.]

My only remaining point is that "actual costs" means actual bona fide expenditure. It is impossible at this stage to go into details. The contractor did everything he could to economise, but he gets no benefit from that. If the whole matter were gone into, it would require a most comprehensive investigation, and would show a heavy debit to Hills.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What have you to say as to interest on money expended?]

The London charges on agency and commission were 5 per cent., and that, I submit, is a reasonable charge. These charges are all included under actual costs, because they may be very necessary, and every business man quite understands them. Even if we do get our actual costs, we shall not get all our money back. £40,000 of it is in the hands of the Government, and £30,000 by way of security. There is no saying when we shall get that back. I would press for the appointment of referees; to go into the details of the whole case would be an interminable task.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It will not be necessary for you, Mr. Schreiner, to address the Court on the question of damages; the Court will hear you on the question of actual cost.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C.: I understand that the two first claims of the declaration fall away. As this action was originally framed, the Government were brought into Court for £120,000 and for £492,565 4s. 7d. They say that the Government ought not to have taken over the line. But if the plaintiffs can prove damages for taking over the line, how can they get damages for loss of profit. (See Hudson on Building Contracts.) Could it be said that the contractor could delay for years some two or three miles on each line and then claim payment, interest, etc.? On Mr. Hill's own showing, the Government should pay him from £8,000 to £9,000 per mile for betterment, and also on his own showing portions of this line could be completed at 4 to 4½ thousands. The plaintiff's contention is that the Court must go by the contractor's vouchers. Were this so, the result would be to give the contractor some £8,000 per mile instead of £5,000 per mile. The Government has power to determine the cost under another procedure. I do not wish to make any appeal, but I must crave the indulgence of the Court. This contract is not a confession contract. If the term "actual costs" had had one constant meaning, it might have fallen under the contract of 1896. Then the Government could have taken possession of the assets of the company and bought them out. Under this contract, however, we have a specific contract for £4,150 and £4,500 respectively; and here I come to the question of "actual costs," viz., extra costs of the permanent way. And here I would ask, how can extra costs be computed as actual costs, if in the contract actual costs are to be estimated according to the schedule. If the materials not provided for in the schedule are supplied them, they can be charged for. "Actual costs" in Sec. 53 must mean the same as in Sec. 88 (sub-section 8). By the Act of 1896, "actual costs" were to be ascertained by the certificate of the engineer, endorsed with a certificate of the approval of Government. I submit that if the term "actual costs" is taken in this sense in one clause, it cannot be taken in a different sense in another clause. In brief, the plaintiff's case is that some of the sub-contractors did their work badly; and that the Government is to pay from a quarter to half a million for this bad work. The concession lines and the contract lines were made under wholly different conditions.

[De Villiers, C.J.: "Actual costs" would mean the same in both cases.]

No; in a concessionary line this term does not mean what it does in a Government line. In this case it is not to be expected that the Government will take over a portion of a line along flats—a line which has been very easily made—and have to pay the same rate for that work which we should have to pay for a difficult line, situated in a district where the cost of labour is greater.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But there is another section as to "actual costs" in the agreement.]

But see Clauses 8 and 5; these words would not be there if every species provided for under the Act had been properly done.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is another section as to "actual costs" in the agreement.]

But see clauses 8 and 5. The words there would not have been inserted had every species of article been duly provided. If £30,000 worth was badly done, it is contended for the applicant that the Government must pay once for the bad work and again for the good. If in the course of war, damage is done by the enemy, the repairing of that damage is no part of the actual costs.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The term "actual costs" is there. I do not think it means unnecessary costs.]

I read "actual costs" in clause 52 (schedule to Act 19 of 1900) to mean so much of the actual costs of the line as shall have been actually constructed. Again, it is argued that the Government has taken over a large quantity of material, but what the contract contemplates is, material put into the line. We have given a good equivalent for work done. We allow for contract prices, which are higher than scheduled prices: in fact there is a difference of about £70,000. I am sure that the Government will be prepared to settle this question of actual costs on a basis as reasonable as possible.

De Villiers, C.J.: The claim in this case is two-fold; there is a claim for damages and a claim for actual cost of the work constructed by the plaintiff for the Government. With regard to the claim for damages, I would make this general observation, that it is founded on the allegation that the Government, by divers alleged breaches of agreement, has compelled the plaintiff to carry on the work in such a way that ultimately the Government was forced to take over the work itself. I am quite satisfied, from the evidence in this case, that if the work had not been taken over by the Government so far from the plaintiff having any profit from the work, it would have been a loss to him in the final construction. If this view be correct, then it may be affirmed that there is no loss, no damage whatever proved to have been sustained by the plaintiff in consequence of what the Government has done. That is the general remark which I wish to make upon the different breaches that have been alleged. As to the particular breaches complained of, I have sufficiently indicated my opinion during the course of the argument. Coming then to the question of actual cost, the greater part of the time of the Court has been occupied in a discussion as to what these two words mean, and the Court stated from the commencement that it could not take any other view than that "actual cost" means the cost actually incurred by the contractors in constructing the work, so far as the Government has had the benefit of it. Mr. Schreiner has referred to several sections in the contract in which these words "actual cost" have been used, and in every case where these words are used it is quite clear that they were used as distinct from the scheduled prices or from the value of the work constructed. There is a distinction drawn everywhere between value and actual cost, and nowhere in any of the contracts which have been put in can these words, "actual cost," bear the construction which the Government have attempted to place upon them. In the 7th section of the Somerset East-King William's Town contract, to which reference has been made by Mr. Schreiner, it is provided that the Government shall, within 14 days after approval of this work has been obtained, pay to the contractors the prices in schedule No. 3 annexed the value of the work done on the said line as already certified, or to be certified by their Engineer as to quantities after deducting the amount of subsidies already paid them, and in other portions of these contracts scheduled prices are shown, but nowhere, as I think, do the words "actual cost" bear any different meaning from what is contended for them on behalf of the plaintiff. That being the view of the Court of the interpretation of these words "actual cost," the case becomes very much simplified. It is quite clear from the correspondence that the Government has placed a different construction upon these words, and the Government engineers have failed hitherto to give any certificate of actual cost according to the constructon placed before the Court. They have given certificates for the value of the scheduled prices, but no certificate of actual cost, and, in fact, Mr. Dalton's certificates, which have been put in, do not purport to be certificates of actual cost. Then it is contended that it is a condition precedent to recovering upon these contracts that the plaintiff should produce certificates of engineers of actual cost. Now I quite agree that it is a condition precedent, and if there had been any evidence that the Government was willing to pay upon a certificate of actual cost I should have held that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed in the present case. It is manifest, however, from the correspondence and all the facts disclosed in the case that the only basis upon which the Government was prepared to pay was the amount of scheduled prices, and not the amount of actual cost. By its conduct, the Government practically prevented the accomplishment of the condition that the plaintiff should produce certificates of Government engineers in order to obtain payment, and the Government cannot therefore rely upon the non-production of such certificates as a defence to the action. According to Pothier (on obligations, section 212): "It is a rule common to all conditions of obligations that they be taken to be accomplished when the debtor, who is obliged under such condition, has prevented its accomplishment quicumque sub conditione obligatus, curaverit ne conditio existeret nihilominus obligatur." That principle was considered by the House of Lords in a case which came from Scotland, and which is of importance because the rule of the Civil law were discussed by one of the Lords of Appeal. The question raised was not one of work done by a contractor, but the principle laid down is applicable to the present case: "By a written contract A. agreed to buy of B. a digging machine if it fulfilled certain conditions, one of which was that it should be capable of excavating a given quantity of clay in a fixed time on 'a properly opened up face' at the C. railway cutting. The machine failed at another cutting to excavate the required quantity, and on its being removed to the C. cutting and tried at a face not a 'properly opened-up' one, and breaking down, after a few days' work, A. refused to give it any further trial or to pay the price of the machine." Lord Watson, in his judgment said: "The respondents were only entitled to receive payment of the price of the machine on the condition that it should be tried at a proper working face provided by the appellant, and that on trial it should excavate a certain amount of clay or other substance within a given time. They have been thwarted in the attempt to fulfil that condition by the neglect or refusal of the appellant to furnish the means of applying the stipulated test; and their failure being due to his fault, I am of opinion that, as in a question with him, they must be taken to have fulfilled that condition. The passage cited by Lord Shand from Bell's Principles is to the effect that if the debtor bound under a certain condition have impeded or prevented the event, it is held as accomplished. If the debtor had done all that he can to fulfil a condition which is incumbent on himself, it is held sufficient implement.' expresses a doctrine, borrowed from the civil law, which has long been recognised in the law of Scotland, and I think it ought to be applied in the present case." I think that that principle should also be applied to the present case, that the Government by its own act has prevented the fulfilment of that condition precedent; it would have been a nugatory act to insist upon a certificate of the nature which the Court now holds should have been given, and therefore there has been a waiver of this condition precedent, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover, but the plaintiff is entitled to recover only for actual cost of the contract. In my opinion, such actual cost cannot be held to include interest, or goodwill, or wasted expenditure, or any work or material of which the Government has not had the benefit. As an illustration of what I mean by "wasted expenditure," I may repeat the case of a culvert condemned by the engineers. If in consequence of faulty construction of such a culvert it is broken up and a new culvert is constructed, such new culvert forms part of the work taken over, and has to be paid for.

Materials which have been imported, and which appeared on the books of the plaintiff as having been imported, cannot be regarded as part of the actual cost if the Government has not got possession of them. Of course, if they have possession of them, even if they have not actually been put into the line, it is only right that they should then be regarded as part of the actual cost. In order to ascertain the amount of the actual cost it will be necessary to refer the matter to skilled referees. The engineering skill will be provided by two referees, Mr. Tippet and Mr. Roy, and the accounting skill will be provided by Mr. Gibson, who has been, as I understand, accepted by both parties. The Court will dismiss the claim for damages, and refer to Mr. Tippet, Mr. Roy, and Mr. Gibson as special referees, to ascertain the actual cost of the construction of the line taken over by the Government. With regard to the question of costs, that question must stand over. The referees will report to the Court, and after the Court has received their report it should be in a better position to decide the question of costs.

Buchanan, J., and Maasdorp, J., concurred.

Mr. Schreiner asked that the reference should be made more explicit, and

The Chief Justice then intimated that the judgment of the Court was: "Claim for damages dismissed; referred to Messrs. Tippet, Roy, and Gibson, to ascertain actual cost incurred in the construction of the lines taken over by the Government, including buildings, plant, and material, such cost not to include interest, or goodwill, or wasted expenditure, or any work or material of which Government has not received the benefit, the referees also to ascertain the amount paid by Government on account and the amount of retention money in the hands of the Government. Judgment in terms of the defendant's tender, with costs to date of plea."

Postea (March 17):

Mr. Searle, K.C., called the attention of the Court to the fact that Mr. Gibson, who had been appointed by the Court as referee in this matter, was unable to act. The parties had now agreed, subject to the approval of the Court, that Mr. J. E. P. Close, accountant, should be appointed to act as referee.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., on behalf of the Government, said he had no objection to raise.

The Court assented to the substitution of Mr. Close's name for that of Mr. Gibson.

WHITE V. BARNARD. { 1903. Feb. 23rd.

Application was made by Mr. Beninmin, who appeared for the defendant, for a postponement of the hearing until Monday next, in order that witnesses for the defence might be brought to Cape Town from Carnarvon.

Mr. Burton, for the plaintiff, objected.

T

The action was for the recovery of certain sheep, which had been grazing on the defendant's land. This was not denied, but the sheep were retained for pasturage fees, which the defendant claimed.

The defendant was allowed to purge his default, and take his chance as the case stood on the roll.

NEL V. LATEGAN.

This was an action for declaration of rights on a certain lease of property on the plaintiff's farm, for which application was made that the defendant should execute a certain lease for a year, and give further security.

Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. Bisset) appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Benjamin for the defendant.

Mr. Benjamin, on behalf of the defendant, said that he had been instructed to submit to judgment in terms of the alternative order of the plaintiff's claim.

Judgment was entered accordingly, with costs of the suit.

CRESSWELL V. VAN DER BYL AND CO.

This was an action brought for recovery of account by F. R. Cresswell against Van der Byl and Co., under an agreement entered into with regard to a certain tender to the Cape Town Town Council.

The declaration set forth that in December, 1900, the Town Council of Cape Town called for certain tenders, and it was agreed that upon the plaintiff rendering certain services and giving certain information the defendant would, if successful in obtaining the tender, pay the plaintiff 2½ per cent. on the goods supplied to the Town Council. The plaintiff fulfilled his part of the agreement, and requested the defendant to show the amount of goods supplied under the tender, and to pay the 2½ per cent. commission. The plea admitted paragraph 2 of the declaration, as regards the agreement between the parties, that, in consideration of services and information supplied by the defendant, the plaintiff would pay him 2½ per cent., but it further stated that it was part of the said agreement that the plaintiff was only to receive the commission in consideration of his supplying the defendants with all the brush-ware required by the Town Council at cost price, and they denied any further or other consideration. There was a claim in reconvention in respect of an account annexed for £47, for loss and damage through the defendant's failure to supply the brushware.

Sir H. Juta (with him Mr. Russell) for the plaintiff; Mr. Burton for the defendant.

Isra Amond said that he managed the defendant's business during his absence in England. Plaintiffs had refused copies of the tender and invoices of goods supplied to the Town Council. There was no reason why plaintiff should not tender for the brushware contract. It would not pay anyone to keep a large stock of brushes and sell at 2½ per cent. commission.

Cross-examined: Excepting painters' brushes, witness's firm had all the others in stock. The price of brushes increased during the plague.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiff.

Mr. Burton called Mr. Van der Byl, a partner in the firm of Van der Byl and Co., for the defence. Certain representatives of the two firms had settled the preliminaries of the tender. The plaintiff was to receive the 2½ per cent. commission, subject to certain information and to his supplying the brushes at tender price. Defendant would not give 2½ per cent. for information. The total tender amounted to between £500 and £1,000.

Cross-examined: The plaintiff was to receive from £12 10s. to £25 for keeping an unlimited supply of brushes. He never complained of any loss to the defendant.

Albert Smith stated that he had been a commercial traveller in the employ of the plaintiff. Defendant promised plaintiff 2½ per cent. on the whole turnover, on condition that he supplied the brushes at cost price. Witness was constantly nagged about the brushes.

Sir Henry Juta, for the plaintiff, intimated that since the amount had only reached £483, he would accept judgment in claim of reconvention. He asked his lordship to exercise his discretion in the matter of costs.

Judgment was entered for the defendant in convention and the plaintiff in reconvention, the plaintiff to pay the costs.

[Attorney for plaintiff: W. E. Moore & Son: for defendant: Van der Byl and Van der Horst.]

BARBER V. S.A. HOTELS (LIMITED) AND ANOTHER.

This was an action brought by Thos. Wm. Barber, professional billiard player, against the South African Hotels (Limited) and R. J. Welsh, for damages amounting to £500, for breach of lease, false arrest, ejectment, and trespass.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff rented a billiard-room at the Grand Hotel from the former proprietor, Mr. Cavanagh, on a monthly notice on each side. When the hotel was transferred the conditions remained, but on the 18th October, 1902, the first defendant wrongfully and unlawfully broke the said agreement, and had him falsely placed under arrest. The defendants, in their plea, set forth a twenty-four hours' notice, that the room was not properly conducted, and that the plaintiff had absented himself on several occasions. The defendants had offered to settle the claim for £10, and subject to that tender, they asked that the claim be dismissed.

Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for plaintiff; Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Greer) for defendants.

The plaintiff (sworn) stated that he had a monthly agreement with Mr. Cavanagh. He denied the defendants' allegations, and stated that he was conducted off the premises by a constable, who was sent for by the second defendant. He had suffered severe loss through the ejectment.

Cross-examined: He always ordered any objectionable persons off the premises. He would be surprised to learn that the marker he left in charge on the 17th October, 1902, was very drunk.

George Walker, billiard marker, said that on the night of the 17th October, 1902, two officers, obviously under the influence of drink, smashed a cue, and upon witness asking them to pay for it, they threatened to throw him out of the room. He was dismissed next day.

Evidence was led as to the management of the room.

Postea (February 25): Mr. Buchanan said that since the adjournrment his client had decided to withdraw, and he was prepared to accept judgment in terms of the tender.

Mr. Upington agreed to accept the judgment, with costs after date of tender.

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff in terms of the tender, plaintiff to pay costs subsequent to the tender.

Plaintiff's attorney: G. Trollip: Defendant's attorneys: Scanlen & Syfret.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

MILLER V. COETZEE. { 1903. Feb 25th.

This was an action for damages for breach of promise and seduction.

Mr. Upington appeared for the plaintiff, the defendant being in default.

The plaintiff, Gertrude Miller, stated that she was 21 years of age. She had been acquainted with the defendant Coetzee for the past three years. He was manager of an hotel. She did not know if his parents were well off, nor what he earned. Defendant seduced her in April, 1900. At that time defendant was about 17 years of age. In April, 1901, she was delivered of a still-born child. Defendant was the father of that child. The allegation made in the plea that she was of loose habits was not true. When she had to lie-in, defendant visited her at her request, and he promised to marry her, but said he was too young at that time to do so. About three months after her recovery she again allowed defendant to be intimate with her, and a second child was born on 2nd August, 1902. That child was alive. Previous to the birth of the second child, defendant continued promising he would marry her as soon as he was able, but three days before the birth of the child he refused to marry her. He said he still loved her, but could not tell her why he was unable to marry her. The expenses in connection with the birth of the child now living were £3 3s. She did not have a doctor to attend to her.

The mother and brothers of the plaintiff and other witnesses having given evidence,

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff in £50 damages for seduction and 30s. a month for the maintenance of the child until the age of fifteen years, the defendant to pay costs of suit.

COFEY V. COFEY AND PEPPER.

This was an action for divorce brought by John Cofey, a coloured petty officer in the Navy, against his wife, Sarah Cofey, and for £25 damages against the second defendant.

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the plaintiff, the defendants being in default.

Chas. Wm. Hy. Smith produced a record of the marriage dated April 13, 1892, between John Cofey and Sarah Roberts.

John Cofey, plaintiff, stated that he was a first-class petty officer in the Navy, and that he was married to his wife in April, 1892. There were four children of the marriage. He was compelled to leave his wife in June last on account of her misconduct. Plaintiff witnessed an act of misconduct between the defendants.

A decree of divorce was granted, the plaintiff to have custody of the children, and damages to the amount of £25 against the second defendant, who was also mulcted in the costs of the case.

DU TOIT V. MARAIS. { 1903. Feb. 25th. „ 27th.

Martial Law—Seizure of stock by military—Change of dominium.

Plaintiff's farm had been denuded of certain mixed live stock by the military authorities during the subsistence of Martial Law. Plaintiff, having been absent from his farm on lawful business at the time of these operations subsequently followed up the military column and was told by the officer in command thereof that he was at liberty to take back his stock, or, should he not be able to find the full number of his own stock, to take any other in charge of the military in order to make up the full number. Thereafter the plaintiff found certain of his own stock in the possession of the defendant; these having been similarly handed over to defendant by the military. Defendant admitted to plaintiff that he had more stock than had originally belonged to him; and plaintiff now sued defendant for the return of such of plaintiff's stock as were in defendant's possession, or their value.

Held, that by the said seizure under martial law no change of dominium was effected and that the plaintiff was therefore entitled to judgment as claimed.

Hendrick Petrus du Toit, a farmer, residing in the Fraserburg district, sued the defendant for £250 damages for the wrongful detention of sheep, the property of the plaintiff.

The declaration set forth that plaintiff and defendant occupied adjoining farms in the Fraserburg district. In May, 1902, the defendant wrongfully received some 360 goats and sheep, the property of the plaintiff. In July he restored 150 sheep and 58 goats, and thereafter 75 more. In August, 1902, the defendant removed 175 sheep and 58 goats from the plaintiff's farm. The plea admitted paragraph 1, but denied the rest of the allegation.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta (with him Mr. Bissett) for defendant.

In opening the case for the plaintiff, Mr. Burton said that it would appear that both the defendant and plaintiff had lost some sheep during the existence of martial law in the Fraserburg district. After Major Brock had left the district, the defendant—who had lost some stock—caught the column up, and Major Brock, it would appear, had informed him that if he could not pick out his own sheep to make the number up from any others. The sheep, when plaintiff recovered them, had evidently been freshly marked by the defendant, who claimed that he had got them justifiably, and was entitled to keep them.

Hendrick Petrus du Toit, the plaintiff, stated that the defendant lived on the adjoining farm. He remembered his flock disappearing from his farm last year—on May 21. Major Brock had visited the farm with his column, and witness went after it on May 26. He overtook the column; he did not see his sheep with the column, but he knew they were there. He was detained with the column for a week, but his wife—who had accompanied him—was sent home. He was sent to Fraserburg by the military, and kept there about a month, after which he was sent home. When he reached his farm, he found that some of the sheep were back home; the returned sheep were all his or his family's. A few days after he went to Marais's farm with his son, and asked for his sheep that defendant had got from Major Brock. Defendant said he had been allowed to pick out the sheep by Major Brock, who told him that he could take more than his number if he liked. Plaintiff and his son and one of defendant's servants then picked out their sheep, which he easily recognised by his mark. Plaintiff took 150 sheep and 58 goats, defendant refusing to part with any more, on the ground that they had been given him by Major Brock. Subsequently 75 more of his sheep arrived at his farm. All plaintiff's marks had been altered. Defendant afterwards claimed these 75 sheep, but plaintiff refused to give them up. Defendant, however, insisted on removing 233 sheep and goats. Plaintiff would not sell the sheep to-day under £1 a head; his claim for damages worked out at 16s. a head.

Cross-examined by Mr. Bisset: Of the 1,600 sheep which were taken away, he got back only 435. There was no agreement to exchange sheep. He got no sheep or goats belonging to the defendant. After witness took the 208 sheep and goats from Marais's farm, there would still be about 200 of his sheep in the latter's kraal. He gave no notice to defendant when the 75 sheep strayed into his (plaintiff's) kraal, for he told defendant before that he insisted upon getting his sheep. Plaintiff sent in a claim to the Compensation Commission for the sheep that had been removed.

By the Court: He claimed for 1,200 sheep and goats.

In reply to his lordship, Mr. Bisset said his defence was that in the first place defendant denied that he had ever anything like 360 of the sheep which had previously belonged to plaintiff. After the flocks of sheep were removed by the military they became mixed through no fault of defendant's. There was an agreement to exchange 150 sheep and a certain number of goats. Marais held that Du Toit had got back all his sheep.

The plaintiff's wife, Mrs. Marie Johanna du Toit, stated that she was at the farm when Major Brock's column removed the sheep and goats totalling 1,605. While her husband was away looking for them, 435 sheep and goats were sent back. She did not know why the stock was removed, nor was she aware why a portion was returned. The 435 sheep and goats were brought back by her husbands shepherd, who afterwards returned to the column, and they had not seen him since. There were no strange sheep among these animals.

Joachim Daniel du Toit, plaintiff's sixteen-year-old son, gave corroborative evidence.

This closed the plaintiff's case.

Mr. Bisset then called

Johannus Stephanus Marais, the defendant, who stated that in April and May last Major Brock's column was located about four or five miles from his farm. On May 22 some of defendant's sheep and goats—550 in number—got mixed up with the stock attached to the column. On the following day defendant saw Major Brock on the subject, and obtained permission to select his sheep if he could find them amongst the 4,000 or 5,000 sheep gathered together by the column. Defendant picked out his sheep as far as he could, and as a number jumped over the wall he was informed he could make the number up from the others. He got back 420 of his own, and collected other sheep to make up the total.

Hopley, J.: Did you really think you were acquiring property in sheep like that that did not belong to Brock?

Defendant: I thought they were his, so I took them.

Hopley, J.: It seems to me that you thought wrong.

Proceeding, defendant stated that early in June two of plaintiff's sons came to him about the sheep. On July 3 plaintiff saw him on the same matter, and defendant said that if the former had a right to them he would give him those from the column, but they could not be all plaintiff's, as they came from thousands of others. He gave plaintiff 50 sheep. Plaintiff claimed more than he had a right to. Plaintiff made an appointment for him to get any of his sheep that might happen to be on plaintiff's farm, but when he went for them Marais refused to give them up. In August defendant discovered that 75 of his sheep were missing, and he found them in plaintiff's kraal.

Pieter Andries du Toit, farmer, of Beaufort West, said he was on defendant's farm last April. He heard the parties agree to exchange sheep, as their flocks had been mixed up after they had been returned from Major Brock's column. Plaintiff said he had some of defendant's sheep on his farm, and the latter stated that he had some of the former's sheep on his farm.

By the Court: Marais remarked 75 of the sheep had his mark.

His Lordship: Marais is your cousin?—Yes.

Is he a thief—he stole 75 sheep according to your evidence and ought to be on the Breakwater?—No, I cannot say that.

Further examined, witness stated that Du Toit took away 150 sheep and goats from Marais's place.

Cross-examined: Du Toit claimed from Marais at first between three and four hundred. The plaintiff's family willingly assisted in picking out the 75 sheep bearing defendant's mark, which had got mixed up with Du Toit's.

Frederick Snell, a coloured shepherd, said he was in the employ of Marais in August last. He remembered losing 75 of his master's sheep; they bore defendant's mark when they strayed away, but when they came back they had another mark. He went to Du Toit's farm with the last witness to assist in selecting his master's stock from plaintiff's. He then found that some of his master's sheep had been freshly marked with Du Toit's mark.

Daniel Mills Dyason, an attorney practising at Fraserburg, said that he was consulted by defendant regarding his missing sheep in August last. He was under the impression when he wrote to plaintiff concerning the matter that defendant had a right to retain the sheep given him by Major Brock.

This closed the case for the defence.

After argument, on the facts,

Hopley, J.: This is one of those cases in which, on account of the conflict of evidence and the disturbed state in which the country has been in, it very difficult indeed to make up one's mind to any set of circumstances upon which it is possible to give a judgment about which one feels absolutely safe. The defendant Marais lives in the Fraserburg district. The country in May last was in a disturbed state, and defendant was looked upon by the military as a man they might count among the loyalists. Major Brock's column was operating in the district at the time, and the troops were apparently living on the proceeds of the country. The way in which Major Brock did this was to sweep off the flocks of anyone suspected of being a rebel. He would, apparently, have decided that point on private information and on prima facie evidence, such as a man being away from his farm contrary to the martial law regulations. Acting on some such principle as this, early in May last year the column, when passing by plaintiff's farm, swept off the whole of his flock, amounting to something over sixteen hundred mixed stock. They were carried right away, and plaintiff, being away from home, did not immediately follow them up. He returned to his home the following day, and found what had happened. A very few days after he followed the column, and was then detained by the military, probably on the ground that he had broken martial law regulations, or was a suspect. Anyhow he was kept there and was transferred to Frasersburg, being kept in durance for something over a month. Meanwhile, 550 of defendant's flock had by accident been swept off by the column. This was on the 22nd of May, and on the following day defendant followed his stock up to the column, and got leave from the military to take back the full number of his sheep. It is said by plaintiff that Major Brock told him that he could take even more than his own. At any rate, he could make up his number from others with the column. In the arbitrary high-handed manner the military were assuming at that time they were very likely to have said, "Take your animals." When I say "high-handed" I mean in the view of the law, the military thinking that they had become absolute owners of the stock, and were entitled to give them as compensation instead of commandeering notes. However, this is a system which the civil law cannot possibly recognise, nor can we hold for one moment that such proceedings changed the dominium of the stock acquired by the military in this way. Stock taken from a suspected rebel still remains his just the same as the stock taken from a loyalist still remains his. There was no legal transaction or forfeiture, or anything at all to make a change in the ownership of stock taken by the military under these circumstances. What were the plaintiff's and what were defendant's still remained theirs. One then has to ask how far animals belonging to Du Toit happened to be in the possession of defendant, and whether there was anything that entitled Du Toit to ask for the return of the stock from Marais. It is certain that a large number of Du Toit's sheep and goats did get mixed up with the 550 Marais got back from Brock. Du Toit went and asked Marais for the sheep. What happened at that interview is not in dispute. Du Toit says Marais admitted that he had 150 more animals than were his property. I do not see how the ownship of the stock was changed from that day to this. I think it was likely that defendant was frightened by the letter, which defendant took him from Dyason, in which Du Toit was threatened with legal proceedings if he did not give the stock up. The defendant then took away 233 head of stock, of which defendant must be taken to have admitted that 208 were plaintiff's. Altogether 220 of plaintiff's sheep and goats were amongst the defendant's. It seems to me as to the latter number plaintiff should have judgment, or their value, which was claimed at sixteen shillings a head. This is not an excessive claim, seeing that defendant admits that he got seventeen to eighteen shillings for some which he sold. The judgment of the Court is that defendant should restore to plaintiff the 220 sheep and goats belonging to him, or their value, at sixteen shillings apiece. Now, as to damages, it seems to me that plaintiff was entitled to some damages, but one feels himself on very difficult ground as to their amount. I think if I fix £5 for the wool which defendant has shorn from the plaintiff's sheep and £25 for the lambs, that would be meeting the case.

Judgment was accordingly entered for plaintiff for 220 sheep or goats, or their value, with damages to the amount of £30, defendant to pay costs of suit.

Mr. Alexander moved for the admission of John Christopher Berrange as an attorney-at-law and notary public.

The application was granted, and the usual oaths administered.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

TENNANT V. M. ISAACS.

Mr. Upington, for plaintiff, applied for provisional sentence on two mortgage bonds one for £1,500, and the other for £1,000, with interest.

Mr. Wilkinson, who appeared for defendant, stated that his client was prevented from making payments owing to the fact that certain papers were in the hands of his agent. He asked that the execution of the order be suspended for some time, so that defendant might have an opportunity of settling the questions in dispute and realising on sufficient properties to clear off his indebtedness.

The application was granted, the property specially hypothecated being declared executable, with stay of execution for a month. As two separate summonses had been issued by the same attorneys in this matter, defendant was ordered to pay the cost of one summons only.

LOWRY BROS. V. HUGHES AND MCLEOD.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the final adjudication of defendants' estate as insolvent.

Granted.

STEPHEN, FRASER AND CO. V. GOODWRIGHT.

Mr. Benjamin moved for an order confirming a writ of arrest issued on February 19, in default of defendant paying the sum of £130 14s. 6d. A provisional order for the sequestration of defendant's estate had already been granted.

The defendant, Ernest Henry Goodwright, appeared in person, and stated that he had paid his share of the debt, but his partner, who owed the other half, had decamped. Defendant had paid over £400, while his share of the debts was really only £300. He was willing to pay, even now, if given a chance, but his creditors had not given him half a chance, and had sold up his horses and stock at Middelburg.

Mr. Benjamin also moved that defendant be detained in custody pending a meeting of his creditors. Counsel read an affidavit stating that defendant was found on board the steamer Goth, and was arrested under the 8th Rule of Court. He was travelling to Southampton first-class under an assumed name. He denied his identity, and locked himself in his cabin, coming out only when the captain threatened to have the door forced open.

Defendant informed the Court that he was still being detained in custody. He had paid his creditors as much as he possibly could. He wanted to get home to see his friends to obtain money; he had good intentions of coming back and paying everything. If he wanted to defraud his creditors he could have sold his property, but this he had not done. His ticket for England was now in possession of the Sheriff, and the only money he now had left after paying for his maintenance while under arrest was 19s.

The Chief Justice remarked that plaintiff's application was an unusual one. The Court thought the passage ticket should be handed over to the Registrar. The order for defendant's arrest would be discharged, but any of his property in the possession of the Sheriff would be retained.

REX V. JACOBS AND PARSONS. { 1903. Feb. 26th.

Obtaining goods by means of false pretences—Fraud.

The prisoner, a coloured person, not being a registered voter, informed a licensed liquor dealer that he was a registered voter, and thus induced the dealer to sell him two bottles of brandy.

Held, that as the dealer was not prejudiced by the false statement the prisoner could not be convicted of fraud.

The accused had been charged with fraud before the Resident Magistrate of Willowmore on the ground that he "did wrongfully and unlawfully, falsely and fraudulently give out and pretend to Petrus F. R. Swanepoel, a barman, at the Royal Hotel, Willowmore, that he, the said Jan Jacobs, was Jan Swaartbooi, a registered voter, and did by means of the false pretences, obtain from the said Petrus F. R. Swanepoel two bottles of Cape brandy, whereas as in truth and in fact the said Jan Jacobs, at the time he so pretended as aforesaid, well knew he was not Jan Swartbooi, a registered voter, and thus the said Jan Jacobs did commit the crime of fraud.

The evidence taken in the Court below proved the facts as stated in the charge-sheet. The accused admitted that he did say his name was Jan Swaartbooi. The Resident Magistrate found him guilty as charged, and imposed a sentence of three months' imprisonment with hard labour.

On the request of His Lordship, the Chief Justice, the point was argued on behalf of the Attorney-General whether the falsehoods told by the prisoner constituted fraud in law.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown): In all cases such as this the Attorney-General is guided by Queen v. De Vos (13 E.D.C., 145). In that case, Barry, J.P., and Solomon, J., both held that forgery had been committed and that the element of prejudice was present. If this is law, it is immaterial whether the false representation was made to the hotel-keeper or to his barman, and the present conviction should stand.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the prisoner was not convicted on account of having taken money. If a fraud was perpetrated on the agent of the hotel-keeper and his agent believed the statement made to him, surely he has not incurred any liability.]

I submit that this case is quite on all fours with Queen v. De Vos. To make a false document, such as a permit or a certificate, with intent to deceive the officers of the Government, is forgery.

De Villiers, C.J.: Both Parsons and Jacobs were charged with falsely giving out that they were registered voters, and the summons adds that they did by means of false pretences obtain from the bar-keeper in each case a certain quantity of liquor, whereas in truth and in fact the said prisoners at the time well knew that they were not registered voters, and thus the said prisoners did commit the crime of fraud. Wide as the meaning of the term "fraud" or "falsity" is in our law, it does not appear to me to be wide enough to embrace a case like the present. The prisoners were certainly guilty of telling a falsehood, but neither the object nor the effect of the falsehood was to defraud the licensed dealer. The sole object, as well as the sole effect, was to induce the dealer to sell liquor to them at the ordinary prices for which he sold his liquor to others. It is said that the dealer ran the risk of being prosecuted for illicit dealing, but that prejudice to him would be too remote to constitute the basis of a charge of fraud. It would, no doubt, be highly desirable that the law should be altered so as to meet cases of this nature, but until it is so altered the Court should be satisfied to administer the law as it finds it. The convictions must be quashed.

Hopley, J., concurred.

Gaol-breaking—Theft of prison clothes.

Buchanan, J. mentioned the above case which had come before him as the judge of the week for review. The prisoners had been convicted by the Resident Magistrate of Walfish Bay on a charge of contravening the Gaol Act, by effecting their escape, and also with theft, and a separate sentence was passed upon them on each count. The defendants left a rather unusual letter behind them, addressed to the Resident Magistrate of Walfish Bay, in which they said that, having again to complain of not having sufficient work, they saw themselves compelled to leave the gaol and strike for the country. They evidently thought they were better out of gaol than in it. They were caught eventually, and brought back again. There was a separate charge against the defendants of stealing a pair of boots, but as these formed part of their prison clothes, there was no reason for splitting the charge. The conviction on the first count and the sentence thereon would be confirmed, and the conviction on the second count and the sentence thereon would be quashed.

ECKERSLEY V. ECKERSLEY. { 1903. Feb. 27th.

This was a petition for a judicial separation by Mrs. Eckersley, of Claremont, against her husband, Mr. Stephen Eckersley, of Rondebosch.

Mr. C. de Villiers appeared for the applicant.

It was stated in the declaration that the parties were married without community of property on June 5, 1899; there were no children of the marriage. The husband had not contributed anything to his wife's support since the date of their marriage. He was of intemperate habits, and there were constant disturbances in the house, which plaintiff said made life with him intolerable. The parties were now living apart, and defendant had given his consent to a judicial separation.

The Court granted a judicial separation, with costs.

Leave was granted.

FORD V. FORD.

This was an application by Mrs. Ada Ford calling upon defendant to show cause why he should not pay her £30 to enable her to institute proceedings for divorce, and for alimony at the rate of £10 a month.

Mr. Upington, who was for the plaintiff, stated that the parties were married in London in 1896, and there was one child of the marriage. Defendant came out to Cape Town in 1899, and had informed his wife that he would never return to England, whither plaintiff went a year ago. She returned to Cape Town a fortnight since, and finding that her husband had been unfaithful, she desired to obtain a divorce.

Mr. Wilkinson, who appeared for the defendant, said his client denied the allegations of cruelty and adultery. Counsel submitted that plaintiff had deserted her husband, and therefore the Court should refuse her application.

Defendant was ordered to pay £15 towards his wife's expenses in instituting divorce proceedings.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Will — Transfer of property— Presumption as to possibility of issue—Age.

Where the heir to a certain life usufruct on whose lawful issue it was provided that the corpus of the estate should devolve, asked for an order authorizing the executor to pass transfer to his nephew, the petitioner having no issue and his wife being 70 years of age. The Court refused the application on the ground that on the death of his wife he might remarry and have issue by his second wife.

This was an application for leave to transfer certain property situate in the division of Albany.

The petition of Thomas George Francis, of Mafeking, shewed:

1. That he annexed to the said petition a true copy of the will of the late Thomas Francis, dated 14th March, 1867.

2. That therefrom it appears that the farm "Longwood," in the division of Albany, and a certain piece of quitrent land being a portion of the location of "Morgan's Party," within the said division of Albany, were bequeathed by the late Thomas Francis on March 14, 1861, to his son James K. Francis, to be held and enjoyed by him during the term of his natural life, and at his decease to devolve upon his eldest son living at the time of his death, and in case there should be no son living, then to his eldest daughter, and in case of there being no lawful issue living at the time of his decease, then the said farm "Longwood" is bequeathed to George Francis, another son of the deceased, during his lifetime, and thereafter upon like conditions as above mentioned.

3. That the said James K. Francis has no lawful issue of his marriage with his wife, who is of the age of 70 years, and is past the age of child-bearing.

4. That the said James K. Francis has waived all his claim, and ceded his right, title, and interest in and to the said farm Longwood, to the petitioner, and the said George Francis and his children have consented to the transfer to the petitioner of the said property, and certain piece of land, being allotment No. 7 in the location of "Morgan's Party," being the remainder of the farm "Littlewood."

5. That petitioner annexes the consent paper signed by the said James R. Williams, and that signed by the said Geo. Francis and his children.

6. That petitioner is the eldest son of the said George Francis.

7. That it will appear from the annexures hereto that all parties interested in the said farms, Longwood and Littlewood, have consented to the transfer to your petitioner of the said property.

Wherefore your petitioner prays for an order authorising the execution of the estate of the late Thomas Francis to transfer to your petitioner, the farm Longwood, mentioned in paragraph 2, and the remainder of the farm Littlewood, set forth in paragraph 4 of this petition, or for alternate relief.

The petition was accompanied by the usual verifying affidavit, and by the consent papers mentioned in the above petition.

Mr. Benjamin moved.

The Court declined to grant any order on the ground that although the wife of James K. Francis was 70 years of age, it was still possible that on her demise he might remarry and have lawful issue.

Ex parte ANDRIES TABATA.

Mr. Upington moved for leave to raise money on mortgage on a farm called Tabata, which in 1887 was the subject of an action before the Resident Magistrate of Queen's Town, when it was decided that Andries Tabata was the heir at law. The Court then expressly ordered that the farm should not be mortgaged. The sum of £2,000 was now sought to be raised on the farm; there was pressing need of the money.

The application was refused, the Court holding that notice should be given to all the parties concerned.

ISAACS V. MARKS.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence for £21, being three months' rent.

Mr. Russell appeared for defendant.

The matter was in respect of the payment of rent of No. 7, Justice-street, Cape Town, which defendant had on a twelve months' lease from plaintiff. The rent was £7 a month, payable every three months in advance. Defendant stated on affidavit that on December 1, 1902, he paid £21 as three months' rent to Messrs. Litton Bros. and Symons, the agents through whom he had leased the premises. Plaintiff denied that he gave Litton Bros. and Symons authority to collect the rent—only to let the premises.

The Court granted provisional judgment.

ST. LEGER V. ROYTOWSKI AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Gardiner moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £2,300, with interest at 6 per cent. from March 1 last.

Defendant, who appeared in person, stated that he had paid the money to Mr. Herhold, attorney.

Mr. Gardiner replied that Mr. Herhold was not the plaintiff's attorney.

The Court ordered the case to be adjourned for the purpose of having defendant's statement verified.

Postea (March 12) defendants stated that they would be prepared to pay plaintiff's demand within 14 days. An order was granted as prayed with stay of execution for 14 days.

PALMER V. HADLEY.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for the issue of a writ of arrest against Hadley, who he understood was leaving for Johannesburg. It appeared that defendant borrowed a dog-cart from Palmer and seriously damaged it. He refused to pay the costs of the cart, and an action was now pending. As defendant was leaving for the North the present application was made.

An order was granted directing defendant to give surety for his appearance, in default of which a writ of arrest was to be issued.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BARNETT V. BARNETT. { 1903. Feb. 28th.

This was an action for divorce.

Mr. Benjamin was for plaintiff, defendant in person.

The declaration set forth that defendant resided in Cape Town. The parties were married in New Zealand on December 14, 1896, and it was alleged that since 1901 the defendant had committed adultery. Plaintiff was in such a state of health that precluded her earning her own livelihood. She asked for a divorce, the return of the sum of £300 which she had advanced to defendant, and £10 a month for maintenance.

Defendant admitted adultery, but denied having received £300 from plaintiff.

Plaintiff stated that for five years after the marriage they lived at Napier, after which defendant went to Greytown, but she did not accompany him. Subsequenly she received a letter from him, in which he informed her that he had gone to South Africa. She followed him, and found him living at Woodstock with a woman named Tait.

Defendant stated that he had absolutely nothing at the present time. He lost his situation through his wife's action. The day she broke into the house she took four guineas from him.

Plaintiff denied this, and said the money was taken by the woman with whom defendant was living.

Henry Solomon having given evidence as to the adultery,

The Court granted a decree of divorce, defendant to pay plaintiff £50.

TOUISSAINT V. TOUISSAINT.

This was an action for divorce.

Mr. Gardiner appeared for the plaintiff, the husband.

Plaintiff stated that there were two children of the marriage. He had caught his wife misconducting herself on several occasions, and had forgiven her. He left her in November last, however, when he found her in bed at midday with another man.

Defendant denied having committed adultery with the man mentioned, but admitted that the baby she had in her arms was not her husband's.

A decree of divorce was granted, plaintiff to have the custody of the children.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte SMITH.

Mr. De Waal moved that a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act be made absolute.

An order was granted as prayed.

Ex parte LABUSCHAGNE.

Mr. De Waal moved for the appointment of a curator bonis of the estate of petitioner's father, who was 78 years of age.

The case was ordered to stand over for proof of notice and consent.

Ex parte BREYTENBACH. { 1903. Feb. 28th.

This was an application for an order confirming the sub-division of certain property of the petitioner.

The petition of Louis Carl B. Breytenbach set forth:

1. That he is a farmer residing in the division of Oudtshoorn, at Paardedrift.

2. The petitioner's minor son, Daniel H. B. Breytenbach, is the registered proprietor of 9-50th parts or shares forming the remaining extent of the said farm Paardedrift, and petitioner is the registered owner of 3-50th shares thereof.

3. That the proprietors of the said ground called a sub-division thereof. Petitoner attended the meeting, and represented himself and his minor son.

4. A division was agreed upon, and after a survey, the shares of petitioner and of he said minor son were demarcated.

5. The said partition is a fair one, and is in the interest of both petitioner and his said minor son.

6. As there is a minor interested, the Registrar of Deeds refuses to pass transfer without an order of Court.

Wherefore petitioner prays for an order confirmng the said sub-division, and ordering the partition transfers to be passed in terms of the survey.

The Master recommended that the petition be granted.

On the motion of Mr. P. Jones, an order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Fairbridge, Arderne, and Lawton.]

Ex parte VAN DER MESCHT.

This was a similar application. The petition of Johanna Dorothea van der Mescht, widow of the late Jan M. H. van der Mescht, and natural guardian of Petronella J. van der Mescht, one of the minor children of their marriage, set forth that on the death of her late husband his property was divided amongst his children in undefined shares. That the co-owners of the property with the said Petronella J. van der Mescht, then transferred, are now desirous of partitioning the same, and that it would be to the advantage of the said minor that such partition be made. The Master's report was as follows: "I beg to recommend that Mr. Wm. Miller, J.P., of Swanepoel's Poort, in the district of Willowmore, be appointed curator ad litem to protect the interests of the minor in the sub-division of the properties, and that when he has lodged his certificate with me that the minor has been awarded the ground to which she is entitled, and that it is of equal value to that awarded to the other proprietors, the mother and natural guardian may be authorised by me to sign the necessary documents to complete the partition and transfer."

On the motion of Mr. H. Jones, the Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

[Applicants' attorneys: Findlay and Tait.]

Ex parte VERMAAK.

This was an application for an order to transfer certain property situate within the divisions of Uitenhage and of Humansdorp.

The petition of Johannes Cornelis Vermaak set forth that he and his deceased wife had executed a certain mutual will which was invalid by reason of its not being witnessed. They had, however, executed a valid codicil to the said will. By this codicil the surviving spouse and the children of the marriage were instituted joint heirs of the joint estate, the survivor to enjoy a life usufruct. The petitioner being now too old and infirm to attend to the said farms prayed for an order authorising him to transfer the said property to his four surviving sons.

Mr. Gardiner moved.

The Court refused to grant any order as the children of petitioner were not before the Court.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Dempers and Van Ryneveld.]

Ex parte NOLTE.

This was an application for leave to raise money on a certain mortgage. The petition of Wilhelmina Johanna Nolte (born Olivier) stated:—

1. That she was the surviving spouse and executrix testamentary of the late Jan H. Nolte, of Victoria West.

2. That the said late Jan H. Nolte was the owner of the farm "portion of Jacomynsaar," in the division of Victoria West, and that in 1899 he exchanged the said farm for certain erven known as "Kapoksfontein," in the town of Victoria West, then the property of one Alfred Goldmann

3. That the said Jan H. Nolte had to pay to the said A. Goldmann £200 in order to effect and complete the said exchange.

4. That petitioner's late husband was under the necessity of borrowing the said sum of £200, and that he did so, passing a promissory note therefor.

5. That the said £200 was paid over to Goldmann.

6. That therefore on January 26th petitioner and her said late husband executed a mutual will whereby they bequeathed the said erven "Kapoksfontein" to their children after the death of the survivor.

7. That on January 27th, 1900, petitioner's said late husband died, leaving no money nor any moveable property wherewith to repay the said sum of £200.

8. That the said sum is now demanded from petitioner as executrix of the estate of her late husband, and that there are no funds in the estate to meet the said debt.

9. That petitioner fears that legal proceedings may be instituted against the estate for the recovery of the said sum and that the properties may have to be sold at a loss to realise the amount.

Wherefore petitioner prays for an order authorising her to raise £250 on mortgage of the said property to pay off the debt thereon, together with interest and legal costs.

On the motion of Mr. Russell the Court granted an order as prayed.

[Applicant's Attorney: G. Trollip.]

Ex parte MIEKLEIN.

Mr. Russell applied for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to issue a certified copy of a certain mortgage bond, the original having been lost.

The Court granted a rule nisi calling upon all persons concerned to show cause on March 12, 1903, why an order should not be granted as prayed.

Postea (March 18th). The rule was made absolute.

Ex parte KOTZE.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order authorising the Master to pay out certain moneys.

A rule was granted calling on all persons concerned to show cause by April 12 why such an order should not be granted.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D. (Chief Justice), the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

DE WIT V. LUYT. { 1903. Mar. 2nd.

Buchanan, J., in giving judgment in this case, which was heard on February 16th, said that this was an appeal from a decision of the Resident Magistrate sitting at Riversdale. The case was one in which the plaintiff found that certain of his ostriches had strayed and were found in the defendant's possession. When found the ostriches had been plucked and branded. The Magistrate found that the defendant had acted in mala fide, and without going into the merits of the case dismissed it. It did not appear whether the defendant had plucked the feathers or not, so the case was sent back to the Magistrate to ascertain that fact. The Magistrate now said that from the evidence before him he did not believe that the defendant had offered to pluck the birds or offered to give up the feathers to the plaintiff. Upon that finding the appeal would be dismissed.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice HOPLEY.]

BRAUDE V. BRAUDE. { 1903. Mar. 2nd.

This was an action for account.

The declaration alleged that plaintiff was a feather buyer, carrying on business in the Sutherland district, and the defendant was a feather buyer, of Calvinia. In February, 1901, plaintiff obtained a special permit to buy ostrich feathers in the Sutherland district. In April of the same year plaintiff and defendant met on the farm Grootberg, on the confines of the Sutherland and Calvinia districts, and it was agreed that, inasmuch as plaintiff had the sole right of buying feathers in Sutherland district, they should enter into partnership, defendant to advance certain moneys for the carrying on of the purchase operations. The profits, it was decided, should be shared equally, but no further terms of partnership were agreed upon. Defendant then advanced £100, plaintiff putting in £110, and also other sums, while defendant also advanced various other sums. Plaintiff continued to buy feathers, which were sold in Cape Town and Port Elizabeth in the name of defendant, large profits being made. In July last defendant repudiated the agreement, and refused to render an account. Thereupon plaintiff gave notice to terminate the partnership, and he now desired from defendant an account. He claimed he was entitled to one-half of the profits through the sale of the feathers. The defendant alleged that he had no knowledge of plaintiff having a special permit to buy feathers. He admitted an agreement was made in April, 1901, but he maintained that the agreement was that plaintiff should purchase feathers in the Sutherland district, and that he should remunerate plaintiff for his services at a rate to be subsequently agreed upon. In June it was agreed that defendant should pay plaintiff £10 a month, £5 a month for board and lodging, and all reasonable expenses. Defendant denied any partnership, and said he had duly paid plaintiff his remuneration and expenses. In reconvention, defendant claimed the proceeds of a promissory note made by plaintiff, who, however, claimed to set that off against the account due by defendant to him. The whole point was whether there was a partnership or not.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington), for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Alexander), for defendant.

Sir Henry Juta called

Maurice Braude, the plaintiff, who stated that he was the only person who received a permit from the Commandant to buy feathers in the Sutherland district. In April last he met the defendant—his cousin—and they entered into a partnership, agreeing that the profits should be equally divided. Plaintiff paid £657 for the first parcel of feathers, which was sent to Cape Town in defendant's name. The second parcel cost £447; the third parcel, £412 10s.; the fourth parcel cost £492; the fifth, £407 10s. Plaintiff paid for the buyer's licence of £5 a year out of his own money. A man named Lavine wanted witness and his cousin to enter a feather ring to raise the price of feathers, but they refused.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He was a spy for the British Government, and took out a licence to sell feathers, so that he should not be suspected by the farmers. He was buying without a licence in 1897.

[Hopley, J.: That is a criminal offence.]

He was well off when he met defendant; he had horses, a cart, and £350. The Government offered him £1 a day to act as a spy. He never told anybody he was buying for defendant, who had been in partnership with five different persons, and quarrelled with them all.

John Henry Ulyett, a speculator, said he was in the Intelligence Department in the Sutherland district, where he met the two parties concerned in the case. On one occasion Joseph Braude complained to him of the high price that plaintiff had paid for certain feathers, and said that he would not sell them on account of the partnership, but on his cousin's sole account.

Cross-examined: He was not buying feathers with plaintiff now, and had never done so.

Amos Brumawitz, formerly a trooper in the Sutherland District Troops, said he met the parties in the Sutherland district. He heard defendant use similar words regarding the partnership account as those testified to by the previous witness.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. Gardiner called

Joseph Braude, the defendant, who denied that he ever entered into partnership with the plaintiff. They met at the farm Grooteberg, and he engaged his cousin to purchase feathers for him, and for this purpose advanced him £100 in £5 bank notes. Plaintiff asked him to have one of the notes changed, as he desired to buy groceries for his own use; witness told him to get the note changed himself, and this plaintiff did. His cousin said he had no money of his own, and witness agreed to give him £10 per month to forward to his wife in America, £5 per month for board and lodgings, and pocket-money besides. Plaintiff bought ostrich feathers for defendant, giving the farmers a note stating the amount for which they had been purchased, when the farmers took these notes to witness he paid them for the produce. Witness paid for all the feathers, plaintiff never advancing any money for them. Defendant never informed anyone that he was in partnership with plaintiff. Witness invariably forwarded the feathers to Cape Town for sale in his own name. Witness put in a promissory note which he had made out.

Hopley, J., remarked that the note was not signed. There was, he added, a heavy penalty for this offence against the stamp laws.

Sir Henry Juta believed defendant was liable to a fine not exceeding £20.

Hopley, J.: I will adjourn the matter of the fine for the present.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta, defendant admitted that he had no books in which he entered his accounts; he had one book, but plaintiff stole it from his bedroom. Witness never had receipts for sums he paid out; he entered these amounts in a note-book.

Re-examined: His account book was stolen when his bedroom was broken into last July.

Hopley, J., fined defendant £3 for not stamping the promissory note, remarking that the country was poor, and had to live out of stamp duties, and so forth.

Carl Augustyn said he remembered in April, 1901, the two Braudies visiting his farm Grooteberg. On that occasion he saw Maurice give Joseph £100, and plaintiff asked defendant for £5 with which to purchase groceries.

Jacobus Johannes Cloete, a farmer, of the Sutherland district, stated that defendant wrote to him stating that plaintiff would buy feathers, and he (defendant) would pay for them. Witness sold feathers to plaintiff, and received payment for them from defendant.

Stephanus Coetzee alleged that he sold feathers to plaintiff, who said his cousin would pay for them.

Cross-examined: Witness sold the feathers on a promissory note signed by M. Braude.

Bismarck von Moltke Louw, attorney, of Sutherland, stated that he was defendant's attorney, and first heard of the alleged partnership between the parties in July last, when plaintiff asked him for £130 to pay for some feathers. Witness told plaintiff that he could not give the money without defendant's permission; plaintiff replied that he was defendant's partner.

Mr. Alexander read the evidence, taken on commission, of the Cape Town produce merchant who sold the feathers, and who stated that he disposed of them on account of defendant, and he had not been informed that a partnership existed between the two Braudes.

This closed defendant's case.

After argument on the facts,

Hopley, J., said: This is one of those cases—of which we have unfortunately a good many—of people giving absolutely contrary accounts, and one of whom must knowingly have spoken that which is not true. It would have been very much pleasanter to the Court to have had the assistance of a jury to try the case. But as one has not got such assistance, he has to face the difficulties of a position like this time after time, and do the best he can according to his lights. Here plaintiff claims a partnership, and defendant denies it. It might be said on the one hand that plaintiff might come with a trumped-up story, and has everything to gain; but on the other hand, it could be said that it was easy for defendant to deny the partnership. There is no a priori reason why the Court should believe one more than another. Proceeding to review the evidence in detail, His Lordship said he thought the likelihood was very much greater in favour of a partnership having been entered into than the loose, unbusiness-like arrangements which had been suggested on behalf the the defendant. His Lordship thought there was a partnership, and ordered judgment to be entered for plaintiff, defendant to pay the costs of the action, and further ordered the books to be referred to a chartered accountant (Mr. Maynard Nash), for the purpose of ascertaining what amount was due under the partnership to plaintiff. Defendant to pay costs of reference. Judgment was entered for defendant in reconvention.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION:

[Before the Chief Justice (the Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

LITTLEJOHN v. KINGSWELL. { 1903. Mar. 3rd

Injuria—Attempt on the chastity of a woman—Damages.

In an action for damages against the defendant for having entered the bedroom of a young unmarried woman, with criminal intent; it was found as a fact that the defendant had entered the room without knowledge of the circumstance that it was occupied by the plaintiff.

Held, that the defendant was not liable.

This was an action for damages for trespass.

Plaintiff alleged that defendant broke into the bedroom she was occupying at the Mount Nelson Hotel on February 14, 1902, and stayed for some time just inside the room, and thereupon plaintiff claimed £500 damages. The defendant's allegation was that he did not break into the room, but that he found the doors between his room and plaintiff's partially open.

Mr. Rowson for plaintiff; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Close) for defendant.

Miss Agnes Littlejohn, the plaintiff, stated that about the middle of February, 1902, she was staying at the Mount Nelson Hotel. She occupied room No. 88, or 89, on the third floor. The morning before she left her baggage was removed to the adjoining room, because it was a smaller one. The rooms were connected by two doors—one on either side of the wall. On the night of February 14 she retired about 10.30, and she saw then that the doors connecting the two rooms were fastened, she could swear that the door in her room was locked. After she retired she heard a slight knocking; she thought it was at the door leading to the corridor. She asked, "Who is there; what do you want?" She received no reply, although she called out two or three times. There was a couch against the door leading into the adjoining room, which door could not have been opened without the couch being removed. As she received no answer she concluded the knocking must have been at the door of the next room opening into the corridor. In a minute or two she heard some more knocking, or a slight rattling; she thought it was someone moving about. After a few minutes she heard a voice crying, "Miss Littlejohn, Miss Littlejohn." She was fully awake at the time. She thought the voice came from the corridor, but on looking around she saw defendant in the room; he told her who he was. He said, "You know who I am—I am the editor of 'The Owl.' Don't be a fool, don't make a noise." He repeated that several times. He must have been standing there several minutes. I came forward and touched the electric bell, which, however, was broken. When he saw this he went off, and I ran along the corridor to the servants' room and asked the maids to help me; I was very angry. While I was speaking to Maggie Young, one of the maids, the defendant passed along the corridor and said, "You fool, why did you make such a noise?" I replied: "You scoundrel, you dragged me through the muck of your dirty little paper a year ago, but I'll make you smart for it." I rang the bell in the lavatory, and the night foreman and the waiter arrived on the scene. They went back with me to my room, and they saw that the furniture was not in the condition in which it was when I went to bed. I had only spoken to defendant once before; he had put several things in his paper about incidents that had happened at Devonshire Hill, and he sent me the "Owl" cake. In May there was another paragraph in defendant's paper about me, and I felt very much annoyed about the matter. Subsequently I received a letter from defendant, in which he apologised to me for having opened the door.

Cross-examined: I issued two summonses, the first on April 26th, in which I claimed £500 damages by reason of the defendant forcibly entering with criminal intent my room. I did not prosecute that action. In the following September I issued the other summons.

Mr. Searle: Do you suggest any criminal intent in this matter at all?

Plaintiff: What do you suppose a man breaks into a woman's bedroom for at midnight? It is criminal to break into a place where you are not supposed to go.

Cross-examination continued: I met defendant in May of the previous year. Naturally I was annoyed at being presented with the "Owl" cake. On May 10 last there was a reference in the "Owl" to which I took exception, and in consequence I went to see defendant, but I was neither angry nor excited on that occasion.

Mr. Searle: Did you take a sjambok with you?—Plaintiff: That is an absolute lie.

Neither a stick nor a sjambok?—Neither.

Replying to further questions, plaintiff said she had a silver-mounted walking-stick; she could not swear that she never went to defendant's office with it. Proceedings were taken against her by her brother in August for ejectment from his house Devonshire Hill, but she did not see defendant in regard to a report of that case. The key was in the door of her bedroom at the Mount Nelson on the night in question; both the doors were locked, and the keys were on the inside. She did not examine the lock, but she saw the key the next morning. She did not see a soldier named Gray standing near the lavatory when she rang the bell.

Plaintiff observed that if she had kith or kin to stand by her, she would not have brought that case; she would then have passed it over like any other insult. She had brought the case to clear her character.

Re-examined: She had never owned a sjambok in her life.

William Edward Moore, who at one time acted for the plaintiff in the case, deposed to receiving a letter from defendant apologising for having entered her room.

Castille Ogier, manager of the Mount Nelson Hotel, stated that on the morning after the occurrence he examined the door and lock of Miss Littlejohn's room, neither of which were broken.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How do you account for the defendant going into the room?]—If the door was locked, no one could get in without the key. No.

[Then defendant must be mistaken when she says that the door was locked?]—Yes.

There was no sign of breakage?—No.

He could not have gone in with a false key, because the key was in the door?—Miss Littlejohn said the key was in the door.

Further examined, witness said the doors were usually kept locked; they were good locks. The bedroom door the next morning was absolutely intact. The key Miss Littlejohn showed him was a little twisted, but the lock was absolutely intact. They had dozens of keys, however, which were twisted in a similar fashion to the one produced. Defendant did not sleep in the hotel that night; witness presumed that he did not care to stay after the occurrence.

Cross-examined: The two rooms were usually let together. Defendant had previously stayed at the hotel.

Maggie Young, chambermaid at the Mount Nelson Hotel, deposed that on the night in question the plaintiff came to her room in a very excited state. Witness told her to ring for the night porter; she did not go into plaintiff's room, which was not under her charge.

Thomas George Wilson, night fireman at the Mount Nelson Hotel, stated that on the night referred to he was summoned by the ringing of bells. When he went to the corridor on the third floor, plaintiff, who was in her room, came to the door and made a statement to him. He replied that the night porter would be there in a minute. He thought the door connecting the two rooms was open about 6 inches, but he did not notice the position of the sofa.

Louis Ogier, waiter at the Mount Nelson Hotel, deposed that he heard the bell ring on the night of February 14, 1902, and saw the plaintiff, who made a communication to him. He did not go into her bedroom.

This closed the plaintiff's case.

Mr. Searle then called

George Herbert Kingswell, the defendant, who stated that he was proprietor and editor of the "Owl," editor of the weekly edition of the "Cape Times," and the Cape representative of the London "Daily Express." Prior to February 14, 1902, he had visited the Mount Nelson Hotel from time to time, and sometimes stayed the night there. He generally stayed on the second floor. There was a number of rooms leading into sitting rooms. On the night in question he was dining with a gentleman at the Mount Nelson, and after dinner, he engaged a room for the night, and was given a room on the third floor. He went up to his apartment about 11.30, and switched on the electric light. He looked at the doors; the one on his side of the wall was open, and the other was open about half an inch. He saw there was a light in the other room, and he opened the door very slightly; he thought the connecting room was a sitting-room. He opened the door partially, and just looked in. He saw a woman sitting on the bed; before that he had not the slightest idea that she or anyone else had the room. He had not seen the plaintiff in the hotel before that. Plaintiff looked up and said: "Who are you? What do you want?" She was in her dressing-gown. Witness replied, "I beg your pardon, I thought this was a sitting-room." Plaintiff jumped up and said: "Who are you?" Witness replied: "My name is Kingswell." She responded: "I know you; what do you want here?" He explained that he had made a mistake, and she came up to the door, and again said, "What do you want?" He did not want to slam the door in her face, so he asked her why she had not locked the door. She observed that she would make him pay for it. He then closed his own door and put on his coat and went into the corridor, where he saw the plaintiff, who said, "I am rousing the house on it." He replied that that was very absurd, as he opened her door thinking it was a sitting-room. She answered: "You did me a shot in the eye once; I will make you pay for it." This conversation took place outside the lavatory door, and a man named Grey was standing near. Witness had kept Grey here from April to the end of August to give evidence, but Grey then left and went to Western Australia, whither witness had sent a commission to get his evidence, but it had not been able to find him. Witness left the hotel that night. He had met plaintiff four times previously in connection with the awarding of the "Owl" cake to her. She first saw him in February, 1901, when she came to his office and asked him what he meant by sending her the cake. She lost her temper, and in the end he ordered her out of the office, as she became abusive. The next time she called was about May 11; she had a stick in her hand, and said, "I have a good mind to put this across your shoulders, you damned hound." She was very excited, and he again ordered her out of his office. In the following August, she again came to his office, and asked him to insert in the weekly "Times" a long statement about the ejectment case, and as he refused, she became abusive. At the Mount Nelson he only put his head and shoulder into her room; he was not half a minute in the room. It was absolutely false that he broke the door open and pushed away the furniture.

He had no criminal or wrong intent against plaintiff or anyone else.

Cross-examined: He left the hotel immediately after the occurrence and proceeded to the City Club, as naturally he did not desire to occupy a room near the plaintiff's.

Charles Richard Goodspeed, works manager of the "Cape Times," said that he saw plaintiff at the office of that paper in St. George's-street, several times. On one occasion, she was in a very excited condition, and she asked for Mr. Kingswell; she had a stick or a sjambok in her hand. When she came downstairs, she informed a lady who was waiting for her that defendant was out, and she made use of a very strong expression regarding him.

The evidence of Lieutenant Cladden, formerly of an Australian troop of irregulars, taken on commission, was that he was staying at the Mount Nelson Hotel on the night in question, and that while he was in one of the lavatories he overheard voices. He heard a female speaking with a decided Scotch accent, and saying that she would rouse the whole hotel. He heard a man—whom he afterwards recognised as the defendant—say, "What do you want to do that for; I looked into your room by mistake." The female replied, "You know you did me a shot in the eye once; now I will do you one."

Mr. Rowson, addressing the Court for the plaintiff, said that this was an action for trespass, inasmuch as the defendant was alleged to have entered the plaintiff's room at the Mount Nelson Hotel on or about February 14, 1902. That entry was effected, and was placed beyond doubt by the defendant's own admissions. He wrote a letter saying, "I sincerely apologise for the serious blunder I made last night in entering your bedroom at the Mount Nelson." He did not say "opening the door," but "entering." He also wrote a letter to Messrs. W. E. Moore and Son, in which he said, "I apologise to Miss Littlejohn for having opened the door of her bedroom at the Mount Nelson Hotel." If a man admitted having opened a door, if he admitted having entered a room, how was it possible to go behind the very best evidence that they could have, viz., the defendant's own written admission. If their Lordships agreed with him in that view, then the question, he thought, was, what was the amount of damages. This was not a mere action for trespass. It was an actio injuriæ. There was no more serious affront that a man could put upon a woman short of assault upon her person than to enter her bedroom. There was a great conflict in the evidence. The defendant said that the door entering his room was left wide open, and that the door on the other side was partly open. What motives would possibly induce a woman to leave her bedroom door partly open at an hotel? He submitted only two—either that it was open for the purpose of solicitation, or it must be for the purpose of entrapping the man into a damaging position, and afterwards bringing blackmail against him. Did the subsequent events as admitted by the defendant himself bear out these suppositions? He submitted not. He contended that the subsequent conduct of the defendant in leaving the hotel was not the conduct of a man with a clear and clean conscience. A man did not wander about hotels at night and enter rooms occupied by ladies for any good purpose. The defendant had displayed a certain amount of animus against the plaintiff by various little paragraphs which had appeared in his paper. Counsel contended that his client was entitled to substantial and exemplary damages in consequence of this injuria, and that the claim was an exceedingly modest one.

Mr. Searle was not called upon.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is not necessary for Mr. Searle to address the Court on behalf of the defendant. I quite agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiff that if the defendant had intentionally and wilfully entered the bedroom of the plaintiff at night while she was in bed with the object of making an attempt on her chastity it would be an injury, for which he would be liable in very heavy damages. The mere fact, however, that he entered her bedroom is not sufficient, for if it were done by mistake, without any improper intention, he could not be held liable. In the present case counsel for the plaintiff relies mainly upon the letters written by the defendant, and he contends that these letters contain a clear admission of guilt on his part. I do not so read them. There is an admission on his part of having entered the room, but in the first letter which he wrote he spoke of it as a "blunder," and in the second he spoke of it as a "mistake," clearly showing that there was no admission that it was a wilful or intentional act on his part, but implying that it was a mistake which he made on the night in question. If it were a mistake, if without any intention of entering a room which was occupied by another person, he opened the door or looked in, that would not be trespass; there must be something wilful in the conduct of the person for the purpose, at all events, of holding him liable, and a mere mistake in entering a room would not render him liable. The plaintiff in her evidence states that there are double doors opening between the room occupied by the defendant and the room occupied by herself, and she states that the door at the side of her own room had been locked by her, and was locked at the time this occurred, and she states, moreover, that there was a couch against the door, and near this was some luggage which would help to prevent the door from being opened. She is positive that this door was locked. The manager states that he was roused by this occurrence, and that on going to this door, he found a key in the plaintiff's hand, that the door was slightly open, but it was intact. Now it would have been wholly impossible for the defendant to have entered this room without either a false key or breaking it open, if it were locked; but he could not have used a false key, because, according to the plaintiff's statement, the key was in the door, and therefore the only alternative, and really the alternative which was relied upon, was that the defendant broke open the door. That is wholly inconsistent with what the manager says about the state of the door, and the only conclusion that I can come to is that the plaintiff was wholly mistaken in stating that the door had been locked by her. That statement is wholly inconsistent with the other admitted facts of the case, and she was mistaken in such an important point, it is quite possible that she may also be mistaken in other incidents One cannot help sympathising with a lady in such circumstances; it is an awkward and unpleasant circumstance for her that any gentleman should enter or even put his head into her bedroom, and I can quite understand that there would be considerable excitement, and her imagination would probably magnify the circumstances to a considerable extent, and undoubtedly the plaintiff in this present case appears to have altogether magnified all the circumstances connected with the occurrence. It seems to me quite consistent with all the facts of the case that the conduct of the defendant is perfectly innocent. He made a mistake, and it seems to me not such a very extraordinary mistake either. He occupied a room ,and near that room there was a door leading to another room. If he is right in saying that that door was slightly open, and there was a light on the other side, it does not seem to me an extraordinary thing that he should open that door for the purpose of seeing what there was on the other side, and it is quite posible he may have supposed there was a sitting-room on the other side. It would have been a perfectly innocent act, and a mistake for which he would not have been criminally or civilly liable. The only circumstance of the case which does lend itself to suspicion is the fact that the defendant left the hotel the same night, and counsel for the plaintiff has properly commented on it, but even that circumstance appears to me quite capable of explanation. The defendant had had previous unpleasantness with the plaintiff, and here I may remark that if the suggestion is that his object was to make improper overtures to the plaintiff, it does seem to me unlikely that he should select the object of his overtures a lady with whom he had hitherto had such unpleasant relations. It seems on the face of it somewhat unusual. However, let that pass. The point the plaintiff relied upon is that the defendant left the hotel that night. Well, if he suspected that the incident might be used against him, and if he saw this lady was in a somewhat excited state, one can quite imagine that it would not be pleasant for him to remain in such immediate neighbourhood to the plaintiff. If he were to occupy the next room to the plaintiff, he might fear that there would further trouble during the night, and might honestly believe that it would be far better for him to leave the hotel than to expose himself to the possibility of a fresh occurrence. I think myself that it would have been wiser for the defendant to have remained in his room that night, but I do not consider that his action necessarily argues a guilty conscience on his part. For these reasons, I am of opinion that, much as one sympathises with the plaintiff for the fright which she had and for the excitement to which she was subjected, she is not entitled to succeed. As I am of opinion that there was no improper conduct on his part, I think that the judgment of the Court should be for the defendant, with costs.

Judgment was entered accordingly.

[Plaintiff's Attorney, W. G. Coulton; Defendant's Attorneys, Tredgold, McIntyre and Bisset.]

SIEBERT V. KESSLER AND OTHERS. { 1903. March 3rd.

This was a claim for work done.

Mr. Wilkinson said that he appeared for the defendant, but the plaintiff was not present or represented.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the plea?]

The action was for £32, price of work and labour, and a quantity of material. The defendants admitted that the work and labour was done for them, and admitted the amount claimed, but they said they claimed two sums on account of this, one of £15 15s., and the other of £9. The plaintiff denied this. The defendants had tendered the balance.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You tender costs to date of tender?]

Before the action was brought, the amount was tendered to the plaintiff.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There was no order made in the other Court when this case was mentioned?]

No.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You may take judgmetn for the plaintiff in terms of the tender, with costs up to date of tender, the plaintiff to pay the costs subsequently.]

With regard to the date of tender, the tender was made before the action was brought.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then there will be no costs; what is the date of tender?]

I have not the date of tender. These people are very illiterate, and they neither read nor write English.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Very well, then, you may take judgment in that form.]

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

BLAKE V. WARREN. { 1903. Mar. 3rd.

This was an action for payment for work done in connection with certain six platelayers' cottages on the Moorreesburg line. The plaintiff had a sub-contract from the contractor, Mr. Warren, to build these cottages, and after he had built six of them, the Government engineer, who had repeatedly found fault with the work, and complained of its quality, and so on, summarily dismissed him. He condemned the last two cottages. The contractor, Mr. Warren, proceeded to have these cottages repaired and put in order at his own expense. When the case was started, it was quite impossible for him to say whether the work would be done within the amount of the sub-contract or not, and that was why he simply denied liability. Within the last few weeks the work had been completed, and that morning only, Mr. Warren had received from the Government a note to say that the cottages had been passed. That meant that the work had now been done to the satisfaction of the Government engineers. The defendant was now in a position to allow the plaintiff on the original contract price the money tendered.

Mr. Burton for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C., for defendant.

Sir H. Juta said that in justice to the contractors in regard to the two cottages which the Government engineer condemned, he should add that those two cottages were immediately taken and occupied by the Government for the purpose for which they were built.

Judgment was given by consent for £450 and costs, the plaintiff being allowed his witnesses's expenses.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D. (Chief Justice), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

VENTER V. VENTER. { 1903. March 4th.

This was an action by Hermanus Venter for the dissolution of his marriage on the ground of his wife's adultery.

The declaration stated that the the petitioner was 82 years of age, and resided at Klipfontein, in the district of Philip's Town. He had been thrice married. He married the respondent in the division of Colesberg in 1883 in community of property, and there were six children of the present marriage. On divers dates between 1897 and 1901 at Philip's Town, it was alleged the respondent committed adultery with a hawker named Clotton, to whom she had given birth to two children.

Mr. Burton appeared for the plaintiff, the defendant was in default.

Mr. Burton said that the plea admitted the whole of the declaration from beginning to end, and the petitioner sought a decree of divorce, with custody of the six children and forfeiture by the respondent of the benefits of marriage on account of such adultery. The plaintiff in his declaration said that he was desirous of providing for the defendant, and he undertook to pay all the costs of the action, both hers and his own, and in addition, to give her £100 sterling, and to allow her to retain the place or farm called Kraaifontein, together with 250 Merino sheep, certain cattle, furniture, and so forth.

The Court granted a decree of divorce, with custody of the children of the marriage to the plaintiff, and forfeiture by the defendant of the benefits accruing from the marriage, further conditions being incorporated in the judgment in terms of the plaintiff's proposal to provide for the defendant

WHITE V. BARNARD.

This was an action brought by Daniel White, farmer, late of Klipkloof, in the district of Williston, against Frank Barnard, also a farmer, to recover the possession of 300 sheep, or their value, £300, and £100 damages for unlawful detention and use of the sheep.

The declaration stated that last year the plaintiff joined the forces of the enemy. In January, 1902, the defendant had been compelled to leave his farm. In June plaintiff had his sheep, 300 in number, removed to the defendant's farm, and the defendant returned to his farm later on and took possession of the sheep, and now refused to give them up. Plaintiff tendered three guineas for the grazing. The defendant said that he was entitled to £50 in respect to the hiring, grazing, and dipping of the sheep, and that he was willing and tendered to give up such of the sheep as were still alive, and an account of the shearing on payment of £50. Defendant had also filed a counter-claim for £100 damages for trespass, and £50 for grazing. On the claim in reconvention, White admitted that he joined the Republican forces, but he denied that he had any part or lot in the damage which was done to defendant's property.

The Chief Justice: Has he been punished for going into rebellion?

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Van Zyl), appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Gardiner for the defendant.

Mr. Burton: Oh yes, he surrendered under the Proclamation, and he has suffered the punishment. He has been disfranchised for life. There was good veld on the defendant's farm at a time when the veld in the neighbourhood was bad. Damage was done to the defendant's farm. His house appeared to have been entered, and destruction was wrought to his house and his furniture. The plaintiff said that the damage to the property was not done by himself or the commando that he was associated with. The damage was done, practically all of it, by a commando under Commandant Van Reenan.

The Chief Justice: If there is a considerable number of people engaged in an unlawful act of trespass every one is liable.

Mr. Burton: Broadly stated, as a proposition of law that is so, but the question is whether that proposition applies to such circumstances as these. These were acts of war; the plaintiff had joined the Republican forces, and they were acting within their rights as belligerents.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But he was a citizen of this colony, the rights of war would apply to the enemy, but not to the citizens of this country. I understood that the plaintiff was connected with a rebel commando.]

I did not say he joined a purely rebel commando, but that he joined the Republican forces. He was detained three months in gaol after his surrender, and since his release he has applied to the defendant for his sheep.

Maasdorp, J.: Would you justify his sending his sheep on to defendant's farm because he was told to do so by the commandant?

Mr. Burton: I would not go so far as to say that: so far as the plaintiff was concerned, it was not a trespass.

W

The plaintiff, being called, said that when he was residing at Klipkloof in the district of Williston, in February of last year, he joined a force under Londt, composed of about forty men. Londt, who was a rebel, was field cornet. He left about 330 sheep behind. In company with the men of this commando he went on the defendant's farm, Kleinvlei, about the end of March. Londt's was not the first commando to go there; Van Reenan's commando, of a little over 100, was already there. They remained there for some time. Witness was never connected with Van Reenan's force. They stayed there off and on until June, but they moved about from time to time. In June the whole of Londt's force joined Pienaar's commando, but still remained on the defendant's property. Pienaar was a Free Stater. While he was in Pienaar's commando they did no damage, except that Commandants Pienaar and Londt had some sheep, probably 70, slaughtered, the property of the defendant. Witness took no part in any damage that was done. When they got there damage had been committed. Van Reenan's men had measles, and the house was being used as a hospital. He did not see any damage done. They heard about the declaration of peace about June 13 or 14, and they surrendered at Kenhardt on the 24th. He took his sheep to the defendant's farm on the 11th June on the suggestion of the field cornet, Londt, to whom the orders were given by Pienaar. His sheep had previously been on the farm of a man named Simpson. He hired a "boy" to look after the sheep, and arranged to pay him on his return. They were detained in the camp from the 24th June to the 2nd September after surrendering. On his release he went to the defendant's farm to claim his sheep at Van Wyk's Vlei on the 11th September. Plaintiff told defendant he had heard that he (the defendant) had taken his sheep, and he offered him £3 3s. for the grazing, at the rate of 7s. per month per 100 sheep, which was more than the recognised rate, the Government rate being 2s. 6d. per month per 100 sheep. The defendant said he would not give up the sheep, and that there was the Magistrate's Court and there was the Supreme Court. The defendant added, "You have slaughtered my sheep, and I will take yours instead." Witness had left 300 sheep on the defendant's farm, and the flock were valued at £300. In the correspondence, defendant's attorney said he had commandeered his shepherd, but witness denied that. The plaintiff's sheep were being looked after by some other coloured people, and not the "boy" witness hired.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The veld was bad at Klipkloof, but he did not think that if they had left the sheep they would have died. He did not know that certain of his sheep had died while in Mr. Barnard's possession. He denied that they had orders to destroy everything, "as Barnard was a khaki," or that he cut the silk in front of the piano and broke the strings. He was not a corporal when he was in the commando; he did not send out scouts, but he was sent out. Pienaar's commando was mostly composed of Free Staters and Transvaalers. Defendant did not say he would give up the sheep if witness would pay him reasonable damage for the trespass.

In reply to Maasdorp, J., witness said he did not know that anyone had taken sheep to the defendant's farm besides himself.

In reply to De Villiers, C.J., witness said he had not a farm now, and he was without parents. If he got the sheep he would hire them out at Van Wyk's Vlei.

A farmer named Wilhelm Voss, of the Carnarvon district, said that he also joined Londt's commando. He saw Van Reenan's men bring out the piano and play upon it, but he did not see any damage done. Londt's and Van Reenan's commandos were followed by Pienaar's commando of about forty men. Van Reenan was a rebel, and Pienaar was a Free Stater. A short time before Pienaar came, Frazer was there with a commando from the Transvaal. He saw plaintiff's sheep there; he could not speak as to the shepherd.

The defendant said he lived in the district of Carnarvon. He left his farm in January, 1902, and he was afterwards joined by his wife, who gave him a report as to what had happened at the farm, and he, therefore, did not return. He left a flock of over 1,200 goats and sheep on the farm, as well as six trek oxen and his furniture and clothing. He returned on June 24. He found that about 400 had gone, and there were only 150 lambs, whereas there should have been 400 to 500. He found 371 sheep running in a flock, some of which, probably about 100, belonged to his man, Juister. He did not know how many of the sheep belonged to Whyte. He agreed to hand over the sheep identified by White on payment of damage. At the interview in September with White, the latter asked him about his sheep, and he told the plaintiff that he would give him his sheep if he paid the damage that had been done. Plaintiff's sheep were not in good condition. Witness had not returned to his farm because his house was destroyed. The sheep were mixed with his own, and were looked after by his man. The sheep were dying off through poverty. Seven of the plaintiff's sheep died when he dipped them. A number of the sheep when he found them were worth very little, and now he estimated their value at 15s. each. Everything was destroyed at his farm, including a piano and a pump, the latter of which had cost £38. The doors were broken, and the windows and sashes destroyed. At least £50 damage was done to his house. All the oxen had gone, valued at £90, and 400 sheep had all gone, which he valued at 20s. a head.

[By De Villiers, C.J.: He had claimed £1,150 from the Compensation Commission, but he had not yet received anything.]

The claim you now put in includes all these damages which you now speak of?

Witness: Yes, with the exception of a few items that the Commission would not entertain, indirect losses amounting to about £50.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The plaintiff's sheep suffered from scab. He mixed his own sheep with them because he had only one herd. He claimed £500 for damage to his furniture. He left his farm by donkey cart. All he got out of the furniture were a table and bedstead valued at £12; chairs had been removed. The piano was in the stable, with the strings broken, and the case broken at the back.

Defendant's herd said that the commando with which White was connected was the first to visit the farm. Witness looked after sheep. White's flock were lean and scabby. He saw the Boers smash up things under White's orders.

Cross-examined: White gave the orders about scouting. The furniture was broken by the commando when they left the house. The pots were carried away.

Plaintiff asked him to look after his sheep, but he did not make any promise of pay.

Piet Boardman, a servant of the defendant, coroborated the evidence of the last witness as to the visit of the commandoes and the damage of property. Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Some of the sheep were slaughtered under the orders of White. White was the only man who gave orders in the commando. Re-examined: White and Van Reenan were not on the farm together.

Hertz Stephanus Maritz, who had been overseer of the defendant's farm since the declaration of peace, said that certain sheep had been pointed out by the defendant and the "boys" as not belonging to Mr. Barnard. These sheep were in a poor and diseased state, and about 100 had died. He saw plaintiff near Van Wyk's Vlei about April last year, with six other men. White told him he was corporal. Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He could not say how many of White's sheep died between July and September. Some of Mr. Barnard's sheep had died as well as plaintiff's.

The witness Voss, re-called, said, in answer to the Chief Justice, that the plaintiff was a private while they were on commando, but he afterwards became a corporal when they were laying down arms. He was not in the same company as White when they were in the field.

After counsel had been heard in argument on the facts.

The Bench conferred for some time in private, and then asked whether it would be possible to get evidence as to whether Van Reenen's or Londt's commando went to the farm first.

Mr. Gardiner said it had been suggested to him that perhaps the commandant, who was at Carnarvon at that time, and who was now in Cape Town, might be able to help the Court.

Mr. Burton said he could also call a brother of the witness Voss, but he supposed that his evidence would not be regarded as any more independent than that of the man who had been called. The best witness, of course, would be Van Reenan, but he had gone over the border into German South-West African territory.

After further consultation, De Villiers, C.J., said that the case would stand over for the present, and the parties might perhaps be able to produce evidence of an independent character as to whether Van Reenan's or Londt's force went to the defendant's farm first. The Court would take time to consider the decision, and if the parties could bring such evidence as had been described then the case might be mentioned in the meantime.

Postea, March 10th.

Mr. Gardiner applied for stay of execution of the above judgment; but as no notice of this application had been given it was refused.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case the Court took time to consider its judgment so as to enable either party to produce further evidence as to what took place on the defendant's farm after the plaintiff had come upon it, and more particularly the Court required further evidence as to whether Van Reenen's commando came there first or the commando of which the plaintiff had been part. No such evidence has been tendered, and now upon the claim in reconvention the Court is left in a state of extreme doubt as to whether the plaintiff did occasion any part of the damage which was done to this property. The plaintiff and his witness swear positively that no damage was done by them, but two coloured witness called on behalf of the defendant ascribed the greater part of the damage to the plaintiff. There was a conflict of the evidence in this way as to whether Van Reenen's commando had been there before, and upon this point, as I said before, there is really no evidence forthcoming. It lies upon the defendant, who makes this claim in reconvention, to prove his case, and as he has not clearly proved it the only course open to the Court on the claim in reconvention is to give absolution from the instance thereon, leaving it then to the defendant to proceed afresh, and bring his action afresh if he can bring direct evidence on the point. As to the claim in convention, that is a claim for 300 sheep or their value, which had been retained by the defendant. Now, the fact that these sheep were brought upon the place is admitted, and the detention is also admitted. The only question is, what was the number of sheep that were on the farm after the defendant returned there? There were 300 left there, but out of those 300, according to witnesses for the defendant, about 100 died, some dying after the defendant had taken occupation. In the opinion of the Court value of all the sheep that have died ought to be deducted, and as 100 are said to have died there will be the value of 200 sheep to be allowed for. The plaintiff assessed the value of these sheep at £1 each, but in view of the condition in which they were the Court is not satisfied that that is a fair value. We think 15s. a head would more fairly and more nearly represent the value of the sheep. That would make £150, the value of the 200 sheep. But, on the other hand, the plaintiff admits that some amount is due to the defendant for the grazing of the sheep, and he tenders £3 3s. In the opinion of the Court the tender is wholly insufficient, and defendant claims £50. That seems a somewhat high claim, but, seeing that the sheep came upon the defendant's farm by virtue of a trespass on the plaintiff's part, the Court will assess the grazing money at the highest possible rate, and that rate, according to the defendant's assessment, is £50, which will, therefore, be deducted from the £150, and judgment will be given for the plaintiff for £100 with costs. As to the claim in reconvention, there will be absolution from the instance.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

DE WIT v. ESTATE DE WIT. { 1903. Mar. 4th.

Will—Witnesses—Evidence.

Where it was sought to set aside a will which ex facie appeared to have been regularly executed, but which the plaintiff alleged had not been signed by the witnesses in the presence of the testator: the Court held that as the onus of proving his contention was upon the plaintiff and that the evidence of his two witnesses (the witnesses to the will) was unsatisfactory, judgment must be given for the defendants.

This was an action to set aside a certain will. The plaintiffs were Jurie J. H. de Wit, Jan D. de Wit, jun., Cornelis J. G. Nortier, married to Martha M. M. de Wit, and Pieter M. du Toit, married to Sarah S. de Wit. The defendants were Susanna H. de Wit (born Uys) and Jacobus F. van Wyk, executors testamentary of the late Jan D. de Wit, sen.

The plaintiffs' declaration was as follows:—

1. The first plaintiff is a son, the second plaintiff is a grandson, and the third and fourth plaintiffs are the husbands of two grand-daughters of the late Jan D. de Wet, sen., in his lifetime residing in the district of Riversdale, where he died on or about May 29th, 1902.

2. The defendant (Susanna H. de Wit) is the widow of the late Jan D. de Wit, sen., and she and the second defendant, Jacobus F. van Wyk, hold letters of administration as executors testamentary of his estate from the Master of this Court.

3. The said letters of administration were granted on the faith of a certain document filed in the Master's office on May 28, 1902, purporting to be the last will and testament of the late Jan D. de Wit, sen, wherein the defendants are named as executors thereof.

4. The said document purports to be signed by the late Jan D. de Wit, sen., and the first defendant in the presence of two witnesses, L. J. E. Mostert and W. J. Pentz, but in truth and in fact the said late Jan D. de Wit, sen., did not in the presence of them or either of them either sign or acknowledge his signature to the said document as by law required; nor did they, or either of them, sign in his presence.

5. By reason of the premises the said document is null and void as the last will and testament of the said late Jan D. de Wit, sen.

Wherefore the plaintiffs pray for: (a) An order declaring the said document to be null and void as the last will and testament of the late Jan D. de Wit, sen., and setting aside the appointment of the defendants as executors testamentary thereunder.

(b) An order authorising the appointment of an executor, or executors dative to liquidate and administer the estate.

(c) Other relief.

(d) Costs of suit.

To this declaration the defendants pleaded as follows:

1. Paragraphs 1 and 2 are admitted.

2. The defendants deny paragraph 3, and say that letters of administration were granted on May 30, 1902, in virtue of a will dated August 9, 1899, filed in the Master's Office on May 28, 1902, wherein the defendants are named the executors thereof.

3. The defendants say that the said will is the valid and legal last will and testament of the said late Jan D. de Wit, senr., and they deny the allegations in paragraphs 4 and 5.

Wherefore they pray that the plaintiff's claim may be dismssed with costs.

The plaintiffs' replication was as follows:

1. The plaintiffs admit that the document referred to in paragraph 2 of the plea, which is the document referred to in paragraph 3 of the declaration, was filed on May 28, 1902, in the Master's Office, and not on October 17, 1902, as alleged in the decelaration, and that it bears date August 9, 1899.

2. Save as aforesaid, and save in so far as any of the allegations in the declaration are admitted in the plea, the plaintiffs deny all allegations of fact and conclusions of law in the plea, join issue therein with the defendants, and again as before pray for judgment with costs.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. C. W. de Villiers) for the plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. de Villiers) for the defendant.

Sir Henry Juta observed that, as far as the plaintiffs were concerned, the discussion that day was academic; another will, dated May, 1899, had been filed.

Mr. Benjamin said that point did not affect the present case. The will of May, 1899, had only just been filed, and after the present action was commenced.

Mr. Benjamin called

Lewis Johannes Edward Mostert, who stated that he lived on the adjoining farm to deceased's; witness was a bywoner of his. Mrs. De Wit asked him to witness the will. He went into the dining-room with Mrs. De Wit, and at her request he signed the will. They were the only two in the room at the time. Mr. De Wit was not in the room, nor did he speak to witness concerning the matter. Witness left the house by the back door, and proceeded to Mr. De Wit's bedroom, which was an outside room.

Cross-examined: He went to ask deceased for peas to plant; witness did not tell him that he had just signed his will. The "old man" did not speak about it. Witness could not remember the date, neither the year nor the month. He had an idea that it was about August, or the middle of the year.

By the Court: He did not know that he was going to witness the will when he went to the house.

Cross-examination continued: Deceased's daughter was sent by her mother to fetch Pentz, the other witness to the will. Mrs. De Wit did not sign the document. He subsequently told one Cronje that he had witnessed the will, but denied that he informed anyone that Cronje was sitting in the room at the time. He did not speak to Pentz about the matter until after the death of deceased.

[Buchanan, J: How came you to witness a signature which you never saw —you said there were no names on the will when you signed?]

Mrs. de Wit showed me the line on which I had to sign.

Wouter Jacob Pentz stated that he lived at deceased's farm. He was sent for by Mrs. De Wit, and went into the dining-room, where he found Mrs. De Wit and Mostert. The latter had a pen in his hand, and the former simply asked witness to sign his name, which he did. He did not see deceased.

Cross-examined: He could not remember the year nor the month this took place, nor whether it was winter or summer, or morning or afternoon. He was now eighteen years of age, but could not say what his age was when he signed the will. Witness signed twice. He did not notice whether the document was written or printed; he did not see any other signatures on the will at the time, but he did not take particular notice. In answer to the next question, witness said Mostert's signature was on the will before he (Pentz) signed.

Mr. Benjamin closed his case.

Sir Henry Juta called

Mrs. Susannah de Wit, one of the defendants, who stated that two wills were made, and both were signed by her husband in his sick-room. She gave the will to her husband, and also read it to him. She sent for Mostert and Pentz; her husband and herself were sitting in the dining-room when her daughter Nellie went for the two witnesses. She and her husband both told the witnesses what they had to do. She believed Pentz was about 15 or 16 when he witnessed the will.

Cross-examined: She agreed very well with her husband, but she was not on very good terms with her stepson Jurie, the plaintiff. Under the will in dispute, plaintiff lost about £40. Their legal adviser was Mr. Reitz, but she did not like him, and when the will was altered, she sent for Mr. Hauptfleisch. Both she and her husband wanted the will to be altered. She could not understand what Pentz and Mostert meant when they stated that deceased was not in the room when the will was signed, unless they had been talked over by someone. The will arrived by post, and she had it signed the same day. The date was filled in by someone else, it having been omitted when the will was signed. Her husband signed the will willingly, but hurriedly.

By the Court: She pointed out to witnesses where they had to sign; there was no professional man present.

Petronella Marie Cronje, the daughter of the previous witness, deposed that she remembered the will being signed; there were present her father and mother and Pentz and Mostert. Her parents requested her to call Pentz. Her father signed first, then her mother, and then the two witnesses. She believed the date was entered in the will.

Charles Alfred Hauptfleisch stated that he was an attorney; he drew up the will in question on instructions received, and sent it by post to the farm.

Cross-examined: He had destroyed the memo. of instructions sent him; the instructions were unsigned.

Re-examined: The instructions were brought him by Van Wyk, one of the executors.

Mrs. Anna de Wit, wife of Jacobus Francois de Wit, stated that deceased was her husband's brother. The witness Pentz was her nephew, and she remembered seeing him at Riversdale last August. He came to see her, and she asked him if he signed deceased's will. He replied that he did not know, and it was so long ago that he did not remember whether deceased was present or not.

Cross-examined: She was perfectly certain this was in August.

Jacobus Cronje, a farmer of the Riversdale district, and husband of Petronella Cronje, stated that he knew Mostert, and remembered speaking to him about this action. He was not sure of the month, but it was last year. He asked Mostert if he had been to his (witness's) mother-in-law, and witness replied that he had no time. Subsequently Mostert told him that he had witnessed the will at deceased's request.

Sir Henry Juta read a letter from plaintiff's attorneys to defendant's attorneys, dated November 6, 1902, stating that a search had resulted in the discovery of an earlier will, apparently properly executed. This had led to complications, and compelled them to wait further instructions before filling the declaration.

Mr. Benjamin having addressed the Court,

Sir H. Juta was not called upon. The Court gave judgment for the defendants.

Buchanan, J.: This is an action to set aside a will filed with the Master and under which letters of administration were issued to defendants, made by the late John Daniel de Wit, and his surviving spouse, on August 9, 1899, upon the ground that the testator did not in the presence of witnesses sign or acknowledge his signature to the said document. The document has been produced, and is on the face of it in due and regular form. It has not been attempted to deny that it is signed by the testator, the only ground on which it sought to set aside the will is that testator did not sign or acknowledge his signature in the presence of witnesses. It is alleged that there were six persons present when the will was signed - Mr. and Mrs. De Wit, Mrs. Cronje, the two Mosterts, and Pentz. One of the Mosterts has since died, and Mr. De Wit has also since died. Mostert and Pentz have been called for the plaintiff, and Mrs. De Wit and Cronje have given evidence for the defendants. From the evidence of some of the parties it is clear they had considerable knowledge as to how wills should be executed: and the requirements of the law, they allege, were carefully complied with. If the evidence of Mrs. W. de Wit and Mrs. Cronje is to be believed, the whole of the parties signed the document at the same time, in the same room, and in the presence of each other. We have, therefore, a document in due form and executed; we have the evidence of these two persons that it was so executed. Against this we have the evidence of the two witnesses, Mostert and Pentz, and I must say their evidence was given in such a vague and uncertain manner and in such a way that it does not in my opinion carry credence with it. Mostert tells us he was sent for, and he came in, not knowing what he was wanted for; and that when he went into the dining-room, Mrs. De Wit was the only person in the room at the time he signed the will. Then he states that he went to the room of Mr. De Wit, the testator, and that in the course of his conversation he never referred to the fact that he (Pentz) had signed De Wit's will as a witness. Pentz said he did not know what he was signing; how he knows, if that is the case, that it was De Wit's will he was signing, seems difficult to understand. Now these two witnesses (Pentz and Mostert) have been called upon to decry the document produced, and also to flatly contradict the other witnesses, who also stated that they were present, and that everything was done in order. The onus is upon the plaintiffs to establish their contention, but in cases where the testator is dead, I think the Court ought to be exceedingly chary in accepting statements made by witnesses such as those called by the plaintiff. Several wills have been made by Mr. and Mrs. De Wit; it is true one set was drawn up by one set of attorneys, while the last will was drawn up by another attorney. It is evident there was some very good reason which induced Mrs. De Wit not to have her old attorneys to draw up the will in question. The way in which that document was drawn up was perfectly open and above board. It was sent to Mr. Hauptfleisch with instructions for him to make certain alterations; but the two wills follow very largely on the same lines. Hauptfleisch, who was an attorney and notary public, drew up this will; he sent it out to the testator's farm; it was not approved of, and a fresh copy was sent, and the signatures on it are all genuine and proper signatures. The witnesses were all people about the farm, and if there had been any attempt or desire to defraud, these persons who could have disclosed the attempt would not have been called in. Then it must be remembered that Mrs. De Wit does not reap any more benefit under this third will than under the others. The will when drafted by Mr. Hauptfleisch contained a blank after the word "August"; this was overlooked at the time, but was afterwards filled in by Van Wyk, who put in the word "nine" before "August." This is very objectionable and improper, but it does not in any way invalidate the will. The evidence of the two witnesses called for the plaintiff is not of that clear, precise, and explicit character which would have justified the Court in upsetting the will. The Court holds that the will was properly executed, and judgment must be given for the defendants, with costs.

Mr. Benjamin submitted that the costs should come out of the estate.

His Lordship said that costs would have to follow the judgment.

Judgment was accordingly entered for defendants, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN, and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.

THOMAS v. THOMAS. { 1903. March 5th.

Mr. Upington applied in this matter for leave to take certain evidence on commission. The plaintiff, he said, had obtained leave to sue by edictal citation for damages on the ground of his wife's adultery. A certain Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Ballister went to England in January by the steamship Scot, and the boat reached Southampton on or about January 24. On her outward journey again she called at Cape Town on February 24, and at that time certain evidence was obtained from certain members of the crew as to the defendant's conduct with the said Ballaster, with whom she travelled to England as his wife. The Scot would again call at Cape Town on her homeward journey, and was due to leave this port on the 11th inst., and counsel applied for a commission to take the evidence of the members of the crew in question, and suggested that Mr. Gardiner should be appointed for that purpose.

Order granted as prayed.

THE CAPE DIVISIONAL COUNCIL v. THE COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. March 5th. „ 9th.

Expropriation of land—Railway acts—Siding—Main Road—Divisional Council—Interdict.

The Government on purchasing the Wellington line of railway under Act 15 of 1872 from the company which constructed it under Act 20 of 1857 acquired no greater rights than it could itself have conferred on the company. Such company acquired no right under the Act of 1857 to expropriate land for the purpose of making a siding near Cape Town for the conveyance of stores required for workshops erected for the manufacture and repair of carriages, engines and trucks for use on the railway system beyond Wellington.

The Divisional Council held entitled to an interdict restraining the Commissioner of Public Works from constructing such siding across a main road.

This was an action brought by the Cape Divisional Council against the Colonial Government for the removal of certain lines of rails laid by the defendants across the Cape Town-Maitland main road and the stoppage of engines from going over the said road.

The declaration was as follows:—

1. The plaintiff is the Cape Divisional Council. The defendant is the Minister of Railways of the Colonial Government and the proper party to be sued.

2. The Colonial Government is the owner of the railway running from Cape Town to Salt River Junction, whence the main line of railway, also the property of the said Government, runs inland, via Maitland, parallel for some distance with the road hereinafter mentioned.

3. A duly proclaimed public main road of the Colony and vested in the plaintiff runs over the first-mentioned line of railway at Salt River Junction by means of an overhead bridge, and then runs inland via Maitland parallel for some distance with the aforesaid main line of railway.

4. In or about the month of November, 1900, the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully laid two lines of rail across the aforesaid public main road for the purpose of running his engines from the said main line into some sheds on the other side of the main line, and does so run his engines, and by means of the said lines and engines the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully blocked and impeded and does continue to block and impede the public traffic along the said public road.

5. The said main line has been further wrongfully and unlawfully so laid at the foot of the said overhead bridge that the public lawfully using the said road over the said bridge and thence on towards Maitland by vehicles and animals are in constant and imminent danger of life and limb by reason of the said engines crossing the said public road.

6. The defendant, though requested so to do, refuses to remove the said rails and to stop running the said engines thereover and claims the right to keep the said rails there and run the said engines as aforesaid.

Wherefore the plaintiff prays: (a) For an order directing the defendant to remove the said two lines of rail and to cease running the said engines thereover; (b) alternative relief; (c) cost of suit, including the costs of a motion between the same parties heard in this Honourable Court on November 27, 1902.

The defendant's plea admitted that the acts were done, but denied that the acts were done wrongfully or unlawfully, that the traffic was impeded, or that there was any danger to the public, and said that the acts complained of were necessary for the construction and working of the railways referred to in the declaration, of which the lines complained of formed part.

The replication was general.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Bisset), for the plaintiffs; Mr.

Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Evans), for defendants.

Sir Henry Juta said that the matter was before their lordships some time ago by way of interdict proceedings, but now, he thought, they were able to lay before the Court a document which had never previously been laid before their lordships. As their lordships would remember, it was by Act 20 of 1857, that this line came into being; it was not an act which gave any power to any company to construct a line, it was an Act which set forth that it should be lawful for the Governor of the Colony for the time being to make and conclude with any joint stock company a contract for the construction and working of the railway on certain conditions as to the interest to be borne by the capital, and the restriction of the cost to a sum not exceeding £500,000. There was a contract, said Sir Henry, entered into between the Governor and the company, the original document could not be found anywhere, nor could the plans which were annexed thereto.

[Buchanan, J.: Those papers were supposed to be burned.]

It may be that is the explanation. According to the contract, a line of railway had to be staked out in accordance with the plans, and it was impossible to find those plans, but they had the contract, that had been found, though they could not find the original. There was only one copy, which was presented as a Parliamentary paper to the Houses of Parliament, which was available, and he proposed to put that in. According to that contract, a line of railway had to be built; it had to be concluded within three years, and the cost had to be estimated and fixed, because there was a guarantee to be paid upon it. There were certain sections which had an important bearing upon the the matter. For instance, what was meant by the line of railway as stated in section 4? The company were allowed to take certain lands, whatever land they wanted for terminal purposes had to be transferred to them, and the land which the company might take was stated as to amount in article 16. The land so conveyed or so vested in the company should be sufficient for a double line of railway, and the works connected therewith, sidings from out and passing places on the terminal and intermediate stations, and also for the terminal and other stations on the railway. There were several other sections to show that this contract was final. Then, by Act 15 of 1872, the Government bought this railway, which was known as the Cape Town-Wellington railway. The Government now proposed to run a line of railway of two rails from the main line across the public road, the Maitland road, on to some property which now belonged to them, and by means of which they were carrying stores to their Salt River depot. The plaintiff Council complained that, inasmuch as the Government had no further rights than the company had at the time, that the contract was completely and finally fixed, they had no right now to run these lines over this public road.

[Buchanan, J.: What you say is that this was a new line outside the other line?]

Yes, a new line outside the contract.

[De Villiers, C. J.: They could not appropriate these sidings to the Wynberg line?]

No, they are not part of the Wynberg line.

Alexander Shand, engineer to the Divisional Council, said that in 1900 proposals were made by the Government to the Divisional Council with regard to the crossing in question, but the meetings and correspondence did not end in a satisfactory result. The main road from Cape Town to Maitland passed over an overhead bridge at Salt River Station. He had prepared a plan showing the gradient of the bridge, with the two lines of rails laid by the Government. On one portion of the bridge, coming down towards Maitland, the gradient was 1 in 19.5, but then it eased off a bit to 1 in 48. At the foot it became level; that was where the lines were placed. According to the plan, the lines of rails which had been laid ran into the loco. sheds. On the eastern side of the sheds there was a line known as the Milnerton line, from which was a line running to the sheds, so that any goods which the Government brought from Cape Town to the sheds could be carried by that line without crossing the main road. As an engineer, he considered the placing of these lines across the foot of the bridge very dangerous to traffic, besides which, they would cause an obstruction. On either side of the bridge they could not see engines approaching which were about to cross the main road.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He showed on his plan an inclination of one in 48 to the crossing; he had taken it down to the railway crossing for the last 60 feet.

[Buchanan, J.: What is the distance for the one in 48 portion?]

170 feet. There was very litt'e difference in the lower 20 yards portion. The rails crossed at the foot of the general gradient; not exactly at the foot of the bridge. He had stood and watched the traffic when a train brought goods into the stores yard. He had seen a train cross from the main line too slowly. He would not deny that it would cross at four miles. He noticed a man with a flag, but he did not see that the train held up before it crossed the road, and waited till the signal was given. Vehicles heavily laden coming down the incline would be endangered if there was a train blocking the road. He had been a railway engineer for seven years, but he did not know the regulations for railway traffic in this country over level crossings. He referred to the crown of the bridge, when he said they could not see any of the engines approaching. There were swing gates across the rails; there was no swing gate across the road. He should say that a swing gate across the road would be no assistance to traffic, but rather a great inconvenience.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: The road was narrowest at the point of the crossing; there was not sufficient room for a team to turn.

Sir H. Juta: You were asked about the regulations as to railway traffic; are you aware that people are run over almost every week, regulations notwithstanding?

Oh, yes; we see cases in the daily paper repeatedly.

Henry van der Westhuysen, secretary of the Council, said that he had known the district for about twenty-five years, and he remembered the time when there were very few buildings at the side of the station where the depot now stood; in fact, it was practically open ground then. He certainly thought the crossing was dangerous, but he admitted that he had not watched trains go over the crossing. He knew the road thoroughly well, and that it was traversed by very heavy traffic. It was on account of the heavy traffic that the overhead bridge was built.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The overhead bridge was erected over many lines, carrying the suburban and main line traffic. He had not taken any figures as to the trains over that crossing between November and now.

Robert Starke, farmer, Koeberg, a member of the Council, said he knew the station at Salt River so far back as 1862; it was on the opposite side of the present station. The Government had gradually put more buildings there. In 1862 there were very few buildings on the side of the old station, and the whole place was now covered with all kinds of buildings. He constantly used that road. He thought it was most dangerous that there should be a railway crossing at the bottom of the bridge. From the summit of the bridge they could not see the crossing. He was acquainted with the negotiations between the Council and the Government.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had not seen trains cross this line, but he had seen them in the yard off-loading. They could not see an engine when it was close to the crossing. He was afraid his children might meet with an accident there.

John McGregor, Mayor of Maitland, said that the land between the main line and the road over which the crossing was made, was private property up to ten years ago. He spoke as to the increase of the Government works. He agreed that the bridge was dangerous. He objected at the time to the crossing being constructed there.

Sir H. Juta handed in the correspondence which had taken place between the parties with regard to the crossing.

For the defence, Mr. Schreiner called Frederick Law Dwyer, resident engineer of the Western system, Cape Government Railways. He said that the siding was constructed under his instructions. He was satisfied that for the working of the depot the crossing was necessary. The road was frequently blocked by Government traffic, and the Chief Storekeeper asked for special accommodation. This crossing to the stores yard was requisite for the working of the Western system.

[By De Villiers, C. J.: They did not want the crossing for shunting purposes, but only for carrying stores.]

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: He had known the station for 27 years, and he was acquainted with the extensions that had taken place. If they were simply running from Cape Town to Wellington, they would not want so many stores, and they would not require this level crossing. Salt River was the depot for the whole of the Western system, in fact for the running of trains right up to Rhodesia and the North.

[By Buchanan, J.: They used the crossing about twice a day.]

[By De Villiers, C. J.: It would not be impossible to erect another bridge, but the cost would be very great; the present bridge cost £20,000. They would not require so large a bridge.]

Sir H. Juta said that the Divisional Council had another scheme of bringing a line parallel with the present line and bringing it under the bridge.

Mr. Schreiner said that the outlay entailed by building another bridge would be out of proportion to the advantages that would accrue.

[De Villiers, C. J.: If the depot had been confined to the Cape Town-Wellington line, this crossing would not have been necessary?]

Witness: No.

James Powis Shannon, district engineer of the Cape Government Railways, also spoke to the need of the crossing for the working of the railways; it was used, he said, for bringing stores from the Docks to the railway store yard. He could not see that it could be done by using the Milnerton line; there was always great difficulty in getting through the loco. yard in passing the traverser, which was kept very busy all the day through. The gradient of the bridge was one in 70 just before it crossed the road. There was no difficulty in pulling up a train travelling at four miles an hour until it was signalled to go over the crossing.

Louis Henry Cochrane, district engineer of the No. 1 Western system (predecessor of the last witness), said that during his term of office strong representations were made by the storekeeper for this crossing. The gradient of the bridge for the last sixty feet before it reached the crossing was one in 88, and then the road became practically level.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: They wanted this crossing permanently.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: They put guard-rails at the crossing to prevent vehicles from skidding.

[Buchanan, J.: I see in one of your letters you say that this crossing may not be required above once in every two or three weeks?]

Yes; but that was in 1891.

[Buchanan, J.: And it is now twice a day.]

Mr. Sinclair, chief railway storekeeper, said the siding was a necessity in order that proper access should be had to the stores. Before the siding was constructed, there were very great delays. With the three methods previously in existence, it was practically impossible to work.

Mr. Dwyer (recalled) stated in reply to Sir Henry Juta that a road could be brought around the sheds, but not to the same position at the far end. There was, however, ground upon which the stores could be put.

By Mr. Schreiner: To carry out this would mean using the ground which was intended for an extension of the locomotive sheds towards the sea.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the plaintiff Council): By Act 40 of 1889, section 141, the Divisional Council not only possesses the right, but has the duty imposed on it of superintending and preserving all main and divisional roads within its own division. It has, therefore, a clear right to come into Court and object to any encroachment upon any of these roads, or to anything which may interfere with the traffic on them. It is, in fact, in this respect, the guardian of the rights of the public over these roads, and this would seem at one time to have frankly admitted by the defendants; for long before laying down the sidings which we now complain of they approached the Council, and requested permission to do so. It was only after that permission had been definitely refused that they took up the position, that the Government has a common law right to expropriate land for purposes of public utility. Granting for the sake of argument that the Government may so expropriate land for the purpose of making a public road, or even a Government railway, does it follow that they could use the property of the Divisional Council for workshops, stores, etc., and crossings to give access to these, when such workshops, etc., are not necessary for any local requirements, but for general railway purposes. It must be remembered that the line from Cape Town to Wellington was originally made by a private company, which had no running powers beyond Wellington. By Act 15 of 1872, the Governor was authorised to purchase the railway, and was on such purchase "vested with the same rights, powers, and privileges as to working the said railway as theretofore the company was vested with, and that the Government should be in the like position in all respects as if the said railway were a railway belonging to a company, and the said Government were a board of directors of the said railway." It is then quite clear that by purchasing this line the Government acquired no rights which the original company did not possess; hence even if they have a right to expropriate land adjoining this line for purposes connected with the working of the line itself from Cape Town to Wellington, they certainly cannot take land for purposes connected with the working of the line far beyond Wellington, and, in fact, right up to Bulawayo.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C.: I quite admit that as regards this line the Government is in the same position as a private company. But the law has never said precisely how a railway should cross a road. Section 30 of Act 19 of 1861 was the only piece of general legislation on the subject till the passing of Act 16 of 1889, which is even more elastic. Then we have Act 31 of 1896, which makes very little change in respect of this matter. This is a "siding" within the meaning of the Act As to the power of the State at common law to expropriate, see Grotius (2, 32, 7) and Voet (1, 4, 7). The English cases all show that a court will not readily grant an injunction against a railway company. Garrett on Nuisances (page 72). We have no law to restrain a railway from making a level crossing. These may be made anywhere under certain conditions. Refer also to Mew's Digest (Vol. 11. 1,411 and 1,413). The Divisional Council has merely a servitude—a right of way across the line. This siding has been established by Government for the purpose of relieving traffic on the main line, and the Court will never grant an interdict unless the plaintiffs can prove (1) that irreparable damage will result to them from this action of the Government; (2) that they have a clear right to the property in question. As to expropriation, the Court can always protect the rights of the private owner if the expropriation is mala fide. Logan v. Colonial Government (11 Sheil, 114). Our whole contention is that we are allowed to take land for railway purposes, and this siding, which is for the use of the whole Western Sytem is certainly for railway purposes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Suppose the Government had never taken the Wellington line over from the company, could the company have used these crossings?]

I would hardly say that: under Act 20 of 1857 the line crossings would hardly have been necessary. The present case is not on all fours with the case of The L. and S.A. Exploration Co. v. Kimberley Divisional Council and another (4 H.C. 278 and 5 Juta, 143). Here the Divisional Council show no grievance. See also Sevenoaks Railway v. L.C. and D. Railway (11 Ch. D. 625) and Dartford Council v. Bexley Heath Railway (H.L. 1898, 210).

Sir H. Juta (in reply): Parliament will probably sit within the next two months, and then the whole question of danger to the public arising from these level crossings can be gone into. It has been argued for the Government that because they own land on each side of a road they are at liberty to run level crossings across the road. The full rights of the princeps of the Roman Law authorities is claimed for the Government, but surely, with us, the princeps is the legislature. The Crown, qua Crown cannot go all over the country and take land wherever it pleases. This so-called siding is not for the use of the Wellington line, but is a mere depot for the construction of rolling stock, stores, etc. In fact the place is not a siding in the ordinary acceptation of the term. The Acts of 1857 and of 1872 give the Government all the powers in respect of this line originally possessed by the Company, but nothing more.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (March 9).

De Villiers, C.J.: In December last the Cape Divisional Council applied to the Court for an interdict restraining the Commissioner of Public Works from maintaining a so-called siding or line of rails which he had caused to be laid across the main road at Maitland. The ground of the application was that the construction of the siding was not within the powers of the company which had originally been authorised to construct the line of railway from Cape Town to Wellington, but the evidence as to the real nature and object of the siding was so meagre that the Court did not feel justified in granting the interdict on motion. The Council has now proceeded by action and the Court is in a position, upon the fuller evidence presented to it by both sides, to pronounce a final judgment between the parties. The evidence shows that the siding branches off from the main line east of the Salt River junction, and leads to extensive workshops erected north-west of the junction. These workshops, according to the evidence of the Resident Engineer of the Western system of Cape Government Railways, constitute a depot for the whole of the Western system, including even the Rhodesian Railways, where carriages are built and engines and trucks are repaired. "If," he said, in cross-examination, "we were only running a railway to Wellington, all the stores which we now have would not be required, and consequently we would not want the crossing over the main road now in question." And in answer to the Court, he said: "The new siding in question is urgently required by the great increase of traffic. If the line had been confined to the Wellington railway it would never have been required." Upon this state of facts the question arises whether the defendant, in his capacity as Commissioner, had any authority to order the construction of the siding over the main road without the consent of the plaintiff Council. The defendant himself seems at first to have thought that such consent was necessary, as a formal application for leave was made, and it was only after a long correspondence ending in a refusal on the part of the Council to give an unconditional consent that the work was commenced without such consent. In support of the defendant's course of action, his counsel places some reliance upon the common law, according to which, he contends, the Government, as representing the princeps of the Roman law, has a general right of expropriating land for public purposes of utility, and in support of this contention he has cited the case of Cape Town Council v. Commissioner of Public Works (Foord's Rep., 21). In that case, however, the Court by no means held that the rights of the princeps under the Roman law as defined by Voet (1, 4, 7) are now vested in the Crown, but the Court expressly confined those rights to the exercise of such powers as were absolutely necessary to enable the Crown to construct works which had been authorised by the Legislature. The case was one in which the right of the Commissioner to expropriate land for the purpose of a railway authorised by Act 19 of 1874 was in question, but the question as to the rights of the Crown in the matter arose out of the construction to be placed on the 12th section of Act No. 9 of 1858, which authorises the Governor to expropriate land for the purpose of making such roads as were authorised under that Act. There is a wide distinction between main roads which exist for the free use of the public and railways which constitute a commercial undertaking bringing in a large revenue to the Government, but even if no such distinction existed I am clearly of opinion that the defendant had no authority, as representing the Government, to exercise for railway purposes any rights over land situated between Cape Town and Wellington except such rights as were conferred by Act 20 of 1857 and Act 15 of 1872. By the 11th section of the former Act the powers of the Central-road Board in regard to taking or acquiring lands and materials necessary for the making or repairing of main roads were bestowed on whatever company should contract for the making of the Wellington railway, and by the second section of the later Act the rights of such company as to working the railway and otherwise were transferred to the Government. Under these Acts it was decided in Davison v. Railway Department (14 S.C.R., 297) that the powers of the Government to expropriate land were not exhausted by the original construction of the line and that the Government was entitled under them to take additional land required for the same railway. The additional lands thus required were for the purpose of laying down additional rails, which had become absolutely necessary for the efficient working of the traffic between Cape Town and Wellington. The Court went further in that case than it has done in any other in giving a wide interpretation to the powers of the Government under the Railway Acts, but the ratio decidendi is perfectly intelligible. If it would have been in the power of the Government when it entered into the original contract for the construction of the Wellington railway to authorise the laying of the additional rails it was equally in its power after the construction of the railway to authorise such additional rails. It cannot, however, under the widest possible interpretation of the Acts, be held that the Government had any power to authorise the company to erect workshops rendered necessary for the purposes of a railway beyond Wellington extending northward and eastward for many hundreds, if not some thousands, of miles and to construct sidings away from the original line over the main roads for the conveyance of stores to such workshops. The Government, on purchasing the Wellington line from the company, did not acquire any greater rights in this respect than it could originally have conferred on the company. Large as those rights were, they did not, in my opinion, include the right of expropriating land for the purpose of constructing the siding in question. It follows that, in my opinion, the plaintiff Council is entitled to the relief asked for. The 141st section of Act 40 of 1889 confers on every Divisional Council the right and imposes on it the duty of superintending, maintaining, keeping in repair, preserving, and improving all main and divisional roads within the division represented by such Council. By virtue of such right and duty the Council is clearly entitled to protect the roads under its superintendence against any interference with the ordinary traffic thereon. If any doubt existed on this point it would be removed by the 142nd section, which expressly vests in the Council the right to and property in the roads under the superintendence of the Council. With all the precautions proposed to be observed by the Railway Department, the use of the siding over the main road at Maitland constitutes an undoubted interference with the ordinary traffic. It is quite true that, in practice, wherever the construction of a line of railway has been authorised from one place to another, the lines have been laid across the main and divisional roads without the permission of the Divisional Councils concerned, but this practise has arisen out of the fact that under Act 19 of 1874 and most of the other Railway Acts the power is conferred on the Railway Department to enter on the land required without any previous agreement as to compensation. As it would be difficult to assess the compensation payable to Divisional Councils for the crossing of their roads by rails, the Councils concerned have never raised any objection to the interference with the traffic on the roads. It is a different matter, however, where a line of rails is laid without any legislative authority whatever. In such a case, the Council is justified, and, indeed, is in duty bound to guard the rights of the public against any obstruction to the traffic. Upon the evidence now before the Court I am of opinion that the plaintiff Council has made out a case for the interposition of the Court. I understand, however, that the Council does not object to the siding remaining as it is provided that the Railway Department undertakes to construct an overhead bridge for vehicular traffic. In order that there may be ample time for the construction of such an overhead bridge or for making other arrangements for the conveyance of stores to the workshops, there will be no summary interdict or order of removal. The Court will order that the line of rails be removed within six months from this date unless the defendant will in the meantime undertake that he will within twelve months from this date complete the construction of an overhead bridge for the conveyance of the ordinary road traffic over the siding in dispute. The defendant will pay the cost of this action.

His Lordship added that Buchanan, J., concurred in this judgment.

Maasdorp, J., also expressed his concurrence, and added that it seemed to him that this line crossed the road at a rather awkward spot, and he would suggest that the Government take special care to carry out the arrangements which had already been made and which they had so far observed for the safety of the public.

Mr. Schreiner asked whether the costs in the action would include the costs of the interdict.

The Chief Justice: I specially said "costs of the action," because the costs of the interdict were decided at the time. They did not bring forward all the evidence that was available, and I do not see now that the question of costs, not having been reserved, will be affected by the costs of this action.

Sir H. Juta said it seemed somewhat hard that the Divisional Council should have to pay the costs of the interdict.

The Chief Justice: It was not a case for a motion at all; there was no such hurry about it. The order as to costs only refers to the present action.

PRICE v. STEYN. 1903. Mar. 9th. „ 10th.

Malicious prosecution — Reasonable and probable cause.

In an action for malicious prosecution it was proved that the affidavit made by the defendant in support of the prosecution, although substantially correct, erred in some unimportant details.

Held, that the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed.

This was an action brought by William James Henry Price, late of Woodstock, against Johannes L. Steyn, of Hout-street, Cape Town, for damages for alleged wrongful and malicious arrest and imprisonment.

The declaration was to the effect that in the course of last year the parties were associated in partnership in the buying and selling of coal ashes taken from the steamers at the Docks, the arrangement being that the plaintiff should provide horse and cart, manage the business, and bring into it a certain quantity of ashes, and the plaintiff should provide the necessary capital, some £300 being advanced by the defendant in this way. At the end of July, it was contended, the partnership came to an end, the plaintiff signing a promissory note in favour of the defendant for £340 4s. Subsequently the plaintiff was arrested at Kimberley, whither he had gone to join Texas Jack's Wild West Show, and he was brought to Cape Town and charged with theft on an affidavit sworn by the defendant. He was detained in gaol for some time, but the charge was afterwards withdrawn on the instructions of the Attorney-General.

The defendant, in his plea, admitted the partnership, and he admitted that it was unsuccessful, but he did not admit that plaintiff expended the money of the partnership in the way alleged. He denied that he acted falsely or maliciously, or without probable cause, and he also denied that the plaintiff had sustained damages in £2,000, or in any other amount.

Mr. Wilkinson (with him Mr. Upington) for plaintiff; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin) for defendant.

Wm. James Henry Price said that on the 13th May last he had an interview with the defendant, and at that time he was carrying on a business on his own account in the buying and selling of ashes. As a result of that interview an agreement of partnership was drawn up, and the following day they commenced business. Steyn provided the money from time to time as required, amounting altogether to about £300, for the business, besides which the defendant made advances on plaintiff's private account. Witness bought about 178 loads of ashes from steamers, generally from the chief engineer or the second engineer. No receipts were asked for or given; it was simply a cash transaction. Witness sold about 30 or 40 tons of ashes, and he informed the defendant. He paid certain sums to the defendant for ashes sold. He provided the horse and cart, and only charged for feeding and stabling. He brought a quantity of ashes into the business when the partnership commenced. He disbursed about £105 for labour and extra cart hire, and about £90 or so for ashes. Receipts were not usually given for cart hire. He had employed three "boys" as labourers and one carter. He had pointed out the heaps of ashes belonging to the partnership at the Docks to the defendant. In June the sea rose owing to a strong wind, and the result was that about 20 or 30 loads of ashes were carried away. Another washaway occurred in July, and the result of this was that nearly all the ashes went into the sea. He estimated that about 150 loads of ashes were lost by the two washaways. About the 24th July he received a letter from the defendant with regard to a loan of £50 with interest and commission amounting to £6 17s. 6d. That was a personal advance; no arrangement had been made as to the payment of interest. He believed he received the money early in June or the last week in May. He had tried to work out the rate of interest, but he had not been able to do so; he believed it was about 82 per cent. After receiving that letter, he saw the defendant and told him he was not prepared to meet the demand, but that it should stand over till the settlement at the end of six months. In the latter part of July he received a demand for £340 4s. and also a demand for rent. He saw Mr. Swanepoel, Mr. Steyn's chief clerk, as Mr. Steyn was absent and Mr. Swanepoel said that he had to draw up a promissory note and witness was to sign it. In that statement £30 was charged for interest and commission, the rate being about 180 per cent. He afterwards received a letter, calling upon him to pay all the money advanced to him, with interest, or drastic measures would be taken against him. He signed the promissory note in Mr. Steyn's office. Shortly afterwards he had an engagement with Texas Jack's Wild West Show. Two days after receiving the letter about the drastic measures he called at Mr. Steyn's office, and said he would sign the promissory note on condition that a statement was drawn up showing a reasonable amount of interest. He received a letter from Texas Jack's Show, appointing him assistant manager, at a salary of £10 a week for the first two months, and afterwards £15 a week and 2½ per cent. The partnership was concluded on the 31st of July. The arrangement with Texas Jack took effect on the 11th of August. There was no secret about his departure to the North. He left his affairs in the hands of Mr. Poole, with whom he placed a power of attorney. He had been in Kimberley about a fortnight when, after the Saturday night performance, he was called away from Texas Jack and arrested by detectives. Ultimately he was brought to Cape Town. He was detained in gaol about a month. He was first brought up in Cape Town on September 11, in custody, and taken first to Wale-street and then to Roeland-street, where he was remanded for a week. He was remanded on the second occasion for another week. After his third appearance he was let out on bail, and he received notification on November 11, through Mr. Shaw, that the proceedings had been dropped. As to his damages, he had lost a situation equivalent to £1,000 a year under a two years' agreement. His arrest and prosecution greatly affected his wife. He had incurred in the way of expenses in the Magistrate's Court about 16 guineas, and sundry medical expenses for himself and wife amounting to about £20.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He had accounted to Mr. Steyn for all the ashes he had sold. He had accounted to Mr. Steyn for ashes sold to Mr. Edwards, besides the two firms mentioned. He told Mr. Steyn about this transaction in his office. He received from Mr. Edwards £50, less £10 10s., deducted for a debt that he owed to Mr. Edwards. He told Mr. Swanepoel about the transaction with Mr. Edwards. He got an advance of £25 from Mr. Van Wyk, but he brought it up. He sold ashes to Mr. Vitch, but that was after the partnership had been dissolved, and the ashes had then become his property. He did not tell Mr. Steyn that he had 800 loads of ashes at the Docks. He had owed money to Mr. Vitch, which was deducted in account. He had got 178 loads of ashes from different vessels. He gave Mr. Steyn the money that he drew for the ashes, viz., £8 6s., £17 3s. 6d., £7 13s., and £23. The two latter items were absorbed by wages. Mr. Cheatham's ashes were in a much more sheltered position than witness's. He was not "flush of money" in July. His mother-in-law paid for his carriages and theatre-going. He had been in the ashes business about three years. He was very hard-up in March. He got some money from Thomson Watson and Co., at Mr. Coigne's instigation, in the name of John Barron. He obtained £27 from Thomson, Watson and Co. He saw Mr. Coigne in March about some money. He had often been called Barron. Coigne said that if there was any trouble about this bill he would buy it over. He did not beg Mr. Coigne to buy the bill. He got the money from Thomson, Watson and Co. to pay for some ashes in a steamer that was discharging. He signed the bill at Mr. Coigne's instigation. The money was not obtained by false pretences. He knew there was another man, called John Barron, at the docks, but he (witness) was known to Thomson, Watson and Co. as Barron, and he denied that the money was lent, except as a loan to himself. He did not see the defendant at the time the partnership was dissolved. It cost £50 to carry on the business during the two months. In addition to the £50 for stabling and forage, he charged for cart hire certain sums, but held no receipts. He rented a house at Woodstock from Mr. Steyn; he did not go away without saying anything. He arranged with a person to pay the rent. He knew that the promissory note was not met, but at the time of the arrest he was arranging about the note being met with Texas Jack. The note was due on the 1st day of September. He told one of the young men in Mr. Steyn's office that he was leaving Cape Town the following night to join Texas Jack's show, and that Mr. Poole held his power of attorney, and that he would settle with him about the promissory note. He also sent a letter to Mr. Steyn, telling him of this. He did not have this letter returned through the post. Mr. Swanepoel told him that nothing could be done unless Mr. Steyn approved. He did not tell Mr. Steyn that he was going to sell his furniture on the Parade. He saw no need to do this, as he had given Mr. Steyn the promissory note. With regard to interest on the £50, Mr. Steyn did not arrange with him to pay ordinary bank rates. The interest, he considered, was most extraordinary. With regard to the other item, he thought the commission and interest charges in this account were excessive. The ashes he sold to Edwards were his own property, and had been put to one side to repay the loan of £10 10s. He signed a guarantee to Mr. Van Wyk for the supply of certain ashes on payment of £25. He did not supply the ashes, but it was because of Mr. Van Wyk's own fault. He accounted for £17 of this money, and the balance went in wages. He had since been negotiating with Mr. Van Wyk with a view of supplying him with the ashes. He signed the promissory note because he did not want to see Mr. Steyn lose any of the money. He did not know the quantity of ashes washed away until after he had signed the promissory note.

Re-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: He understood, after the dissolution of partnership, that any ashes remaining would belong to him. The arrangement was that Steyn should keep the books. He subsequently told witness it was too much trouble to keep an account, and he asked witness to render him statements, which witness afterwards did week by week. Witness referred Swanepoel to inaccuracies in the account. This was the cause of an argument between Swanepoel and witness. Of the £25 received from Van Wyk, witness paid Steyn £17 3s. 6d., and paid in the balance to the partnership's account. The ashes were used for brickmaking purposes. Witness's mother-in-law lived in Fleming-street. Steyn had been at the house previously. His mother-in-law could have told Steyn where he had gone. When witness left he made arrangements to pay the rent with Mr. Poole. Witness also wrote to tell Steyn that Poole had his power of attorney, and would deal with the matter of the promissory note. Witness was sued by Steyn for two months' rent. He tendered the amount of a month's rent, and the magistrate gave judgment in terms of the tender.

Christopher Carstens, clerk in the Resident Magistrate's Office, at Cape Town, produced the record of proceedings.

John J. H. Smeeda said that during July ashes at the Docks were washed away. A considerable quantity of Price's heap was washed away—sixty or seventy loads, witness believed. A portion of the tip was washed away.

Cross-examined: Witness lost eleven loads at the time. Witness's heap was nearer the sea than Price's.

Re-examined: It was where Price's heap projected beyond witness's that the washaway occurred.

This closed plaintiff's case.

Mr. Searle called,

Johannes L. Steyn, partner in the firm of Steyn and Serrurier. He said Price was introduced to him by one of his clients. Witness advanced him a £50 loan in connection with the ashes. The advances were correctly shown with the account produced. Price usually came in on Saturday's. He always said he was storing the ashes for the winter, when the price would be better. He once told witness he had about 800 tons. Witness went to the Docks in July with Price and Swanepoel. Plaintiff pointed out as his three heaps which witness estimated contained 800 tons. Witness went on advancing money, but, later, the plaintiff not having been to the office for a fortnight, witness made inquiries and found out he only apparently had 14 or 15 loads. Some of the heaps which Price had previously said belonged to him were claimed by others. Witness went to Price's house, but did not find him there. He wrote a note and left it at the house to the effect that witness had found he had not the quantity of ashes he had represented, and that he would communicate with the police. Subsequently witness found that Swanepoel had taken the promissory note from Price. This he had no authority to do. Witness had not the slightest idea Price was going away. When he had gone witness made efforts to trace him, and afterwards found he was in Kimberley. Witness did not receive a letter from Price stating that Poole had been appointed his attorney, nor did he hear from Poole. Afterwards witness went to the Magistrate, and made an affidavit (produced). He charged Price with theft by means of fraud. Price never said anything about the money received from Edwards and Van Wyk. Price never said there were amounts for wages to be added to those brought up in the Magistrate's Court.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: Witness had accounts in his books of every transaction reported to him in regard to these ashes. It was early in July, witness believed, that Price said he had 800 tons; he could not say for certain; it was some time in July. Witness had never inquired the whereabouts of Price at the house of his mother-in-law. He never knew Price had a mother-in-law. He heard about the alleged power of attorney to-day for the first time. Witness went to Mr. Tennant, the chief clerk in the Resident Magistrate's Office, to swear an affidavit, and to get a warrant. Mr. Tennant referred witness to his solicitor. The police drew the affidavit, which witness took to Mr. Tennant. Witness afterwards consulted his attorneys, who drew up the affidavit upon which the warrant was issued. Witness always charged commission and interest. During the transactions Price came to the office and said he had lost about two loads of ashes, which the Harbour Board had replaced. This was the only time witness heard of a washaway. That took place in June, witness believed.

Johannes J. Swanepoel, clerk in the employ of Messrs. Steyn and Serrurier, said he was present when the agreement of May was drawn up. The witness corroborated the evidence of Mr. Steyn as to what took place at the Docks. On the 31st July Price came to see Mr. Steyn, who was, however, not in. He asked witness to make an account showing his indebtedness, and to draw out a promissory note. Witness made out the statement put in showing a balance of £340 4s. He took this to Steyn's house with a letter dated July 31, with which was enclosed a promissory note for the amount. Witness did this before seeing Mr. Steyn. Price was not in, and witness left the letter at his house. Afterwards Price came to the office, and left the bill. Witness said he would have to come and see Mr. Steyn about the bill, but he never came back. Witness made up the items for interest with the account. He was unable to see Mr. Steyn before doing so. Price said he was perfectly satisfied with the statement. Witness charged eight per cent. for finding the money. This was the usual commission.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: He took steps almost immediately to return the promissory note to the plaintiff. He went to plaintiff's house; he left word for the plaintiff to call again at the office, but the man did not call.

Richard Spencer Cheetham said his father was a dealer in coal ash at the Docks. His heaps of ash in June and July last were near the plaintiff's. He was not aware of any considerable washaway of ash at the Docks during June and July. None of their stock was lost. He should not think that plaintiff's stock exceeded about sixty loads. Further evidence was given to the effect that no serious washaway of ashes had occurred during June and July.

William Henry Coigne gave evidence as to a promissory note given by the plaintiff to Thomson, Watson and Co. under the name of Barron, but it was held to be irrelevant to the issue before the Court. Plaintiff still owed witness £41 for the purchase of ash that he sold to Vitch. He had originally lent the plaintiff £70. Witness did not know that the plaintiff was in partnership with Steyn at the time.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: He did not consider that the money was borrowed from him under false pretences; it might have been lent in April.

Alven Hansen, clerk in the employ of Steyn and Serrurier, said Price never told him he was going away, as he had stated in the witness-box. Witness only saw him on one occasion—on the 1st August—when he gave him a receipt for the rent.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

After Counsel had been heard in argument on the facts:—

De Villiers, C.J.: If in this matter the defendant was guilty of malice, and if there was no reasonable and probable ground for the prosecution, the defendant must be held liable, and must pay damages. I will deal only with the question of reasonable and probable cause, and for this purpose it is necessary to go shortly into the facts of the case. It appears that the plaintiff and the defendant were strangers to each other, and that in the month of May last the plaintiff was introduced to the defendant, and suggested that they should go into partnership for the purpose of buying and selling ashes. Such a partnership was entered into, and the agreement was that the plaintiff was to do the work of buying and selling, and the defendant was to supply the funds, and also keep the books. From time to time moneys were advanced by the defendant, to whose office the plaintiff repeatedly came. After some time, a fortnight elapsed without the plaintiff coming to the office, but before this, according to the evidence, which I entirely credit, the plaintiff and defendant had gone together to the Docks, and the plaintiff had then pointed out the ashes which had been stacked from time to time, and had told the defendant that there were 800 tons of stuff there. He pointed out several heaps, one of which, he said, belonged to McKenzie, and the rest to himself. Then, as I said, a fortnight elapsed without the plaintiff coming to the office, and the defendant then became suspicious, and went again to the docks, and found there were only about thirteen tons. He thereupon tried to find the plaintiff, and went to his house. Plaintiff was not in, and the defendant wrote a letter in pencil which he left for him, and it is in the concluding portion of this letter, no doubt, that the words "drastic steps" appear. But unfortunately the first portion of this letter is torn out. Now, it is a somewhat extraordinary circumstance that this mutilated letter should have been put in at all. It is put in for the purpose of proving the use of the words "drastic steps," but a portion of it is torn off. That being so, the defendant was allowed to give oral evidence as to the contents, and this is what he says in his evidence: "I said I had just come from the Docks, and found that there were only ten or fifteen loads of ashes, and not 800, as he had told me; and that things had become so unsatisfactory that unless plaintiff showed me to the contrary I would consider that plaintiff acted dishonestly, and I would communicate with the police." The important thing is that the defendant states that in that letter he told the plaintiff that he had informed him there were 800 tons, and there is no answer to that statement, no immediate denial by the plaintiff to the defendant that he had ever said so. Now, as this piece of the letter is torn off and as the defendant has been allowed to give evidence upon it, I am quite satisfied that the version now given by the defendant is the correct one. Then the plaintiff, upon the receipt of this letter, went to the office of the defendant, but the latter was not in. I am satisfied that it was not at the plaintiff's suggestion that the account was drawn up and the promissory note made by the plaintiff in favour of the defendant. It would suit plaintiff well now, after what occurred, to be able to give a promissory note, and gain time for his purpose. Swanepoel, after the note had been signed, informed the defendant of the fact, and defendant then at once took steps to have this matter remedied, and to return the promissory note. But shortly afterwards the plaintiff disappeared; he went as manager to the Texas Jack Wild West Show. He says that before he left he informed defendant of his intention to go. I am satisfied he never did anything of the kind. He pointed out a boy in Court as the one whom he stated this to, but this boy has been called, and denied it, and I quite believe him. Nor do I believe that the letter was sent, of which what was said to be a copy was produced. During these months, according to the admitted account, only £25 had been paid by the plaintiff into the partnership. Now, the question is: Was not the plaintiff justified in coming to the conclusion that all these large quantities of ashes which the plaintiff had received had been sold, that he had gone away with the partnership money, and that there was an intention to commit a fraud or to commit a theft? I think that, from these circumstances, the defendant would have been justified in drawing these conclusions, and I think if we look further into the documents which are put in by the plaintiff, these documents, on the face of them, seem to have shown that the plaintiff had been using partnership funds for the purpose of paying some of his own private debts. He produced receipts for ashes which had been sold to persons, and from these amounts were deducted, amounts owing by the plaintiff to these parties, but when he rendered an account to the defendant these items were not brought up. According to the plaintiff's own statements he appears to have acted dishonestly in his dealings with the defendant. Now, this being proved to the satisfaction of the Court, I do not think the Court should inquire very minutely into the terms in which the affidavit of the 4th September is framed. No doubt if criticised very minutely some of the statements are somewhat exaggerated, but the question is after all, whether, substantially, the affidavit makes a true statement of the facts of the case. Now, to my mind, substantially the affidavit is correct. It errs somewhat in detail, but the substance of it seems to show there was reason for believing that the plaintiff had committed a fraud upon his partner. I do not say now that, upon the full facts of the case, the Attorney-General erred in not prosecuting. It is unnecessary to go into that; the point we have to consider is whether, upon the facts known to the defendant, he was justified in coming to the conclusion he arrived at, and being satisfied upon that, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed in this action. The judgment of the Court must therefore be for the defendant, with costs.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr Justice MAASDORP.]

CLIFFORD v. CLIFFORD AND ANOTHER. { 1903. Mar. 10th

Adultery—Damages.

In an action for damages against the co-defendant who had committed adultery with the defendant, the wife of the plaintiff, it was proved that the plaintiff had frequently used foul language towards his wife. No damages were awarded, but the co-defendant was ordered to pay the costs of the action.

This was an action instituted by John Whiteside Clifford, of Cape Town, for divorce, on the ground of his wife's adultery with the co-defendant, R. Boutellier, against whom £500 damages were claimed.

The declaration set forth that the parties were married in 1890 in England, and that on divers occasions since June, 1901, the defendants had committed adultery. The wife was in possession of certain furniture, purchased about 1901 from the co-defendant for the sum of £40 out of moneys which the plaintiff alleged belonged to him. The plaintiff sought a decree of divorce, with custody of the children, an order for the return of the furniture, and judgment against the co-defendant in the sum of £500 and costs.

The defendant in her plea admitted possession of the furniture, but denied that it was bought with the plaintiff's money, or that it was his furniture; she said it was bought with her own money and belonged to her. There were three children of the marriage, and she alleged that she had been denied access to them. While living in England the plaintiff frequently struck her, and a month after her arrival in this country he violently assaulted and beat her. Paragraphs 3 and 5, as to the alleged adultery and the damages, were denied. The defendant, Mrs. Clifford, sought a judicial separation, with custody of the children, and asked for alimony for herself and children.

Mr. Benjamin for plaintiff; Mr. Wilkinson for defendant.

The plaintiff, John Whiteside Clifford, in his evidence said that he and his wife were married on November 1, 1890, at Derby, England. They lived in England until November 30, 1890, and then he came to this colony on doctor's orders, leaving his wife and children in England. They followed him in March of 1901. He made provision for their support during the interval. He denied that he had cruelly treated her. Hitherto they had lived amicably together. They lived for about two months at Mount Nelson Villas, Sea Point, and they were joined by a boarder, named Boutellier, the co-defendant. Witness had to complain to his wife about her going to balls and dances with the co-defendant. He then discovered a letter written by her to a lady in England; it was under a blotting pad. He left it there, and she had since told him she had torn it up. He spoke to her about the contents. The letter described the lovely country, and said what a nice young man the lodger was, that he had made her a present of a fan, and had taken her to a ball on the previous evening. Witness had never struck the defendant; she struck him with a stick, and she fell and bumped her forehead. They afterwards removed to Blackheath Villas. Witness objected to Boutellier joining, but his wife wanted him to go, as she said she wanted to let the room. They stayed there from August to December, and witness then went to Robben Island, where he was sent on Government survey. He returned on the last day in February. On his return he found that his wife had gone from Blackheath Villas. While he was at Robben Island he continued to support her. He then learned something about his wife about the end of January, which caused him to stop payments. The furniture was paid for out of witness's money, which had been left with his wife when he came away from England. There were three children of the marriage, and witness asked for the custody of the three.

Cross-examined: He took exception to Boutellier when they were removing to Blackheath Villas. He had no quarrel at that time respecting any suspicions of infidelity; he only quarrelled about the letter. He regarded Boutellier as a friend at that time; he objected, however, to the boarder making his wife a present of a fan. Their married life in England was happy. He did not assault her or ill-treat her, or use foul language towards her. He had not assaulted her in this country. He admitted writing a long letter to his wife, in which he spoke of the coming suit, and said he would see that the case got into the Burton and Liverpool papers. He had pretty letters from Colville, Burton, and Derby as to her carryings-on. He only hoped she would face the music and listen to her little son giving evidence against her with Mr. Lovejoy. It was through his influence that Mr. Lovejoy obtained work with the American firm, the manager being a great friend of his (witness). She was quite welcome to the bargain she had made. The letter also referred in opprobrious terms to the defendant's character. He denied that he struck his wife, or that she screamed, or that the boarder interfered. He was not turned out of Mount Nelson Villas through ill-treatment and abuse of his wife. They first lived in apartments on the Beach-road, and he denied that he was turned out from there for quarrelling. He took the lodgings for three months, and paid £24. He only stayed there four days. Mrs. Bishop persuaded him to buy the furniture from the co-defendant. He did not every week while his wife was in England write to her and request her to come out; on the other hand, he advised her not to come out till the plague was over. He did not know at the time that his wife was going to live with Boutellier as his housekeeper, and he did not learn it till afterwards. He denied that he requested the Mother Superior at the Orphanage not to allow his wife to see the two children. He accused the co-defendant of being a scoundrel, and the latter then took him by the throat. On the occasion of the marriage, his wife only brought £5 worth of furniture. He had lately inherited £150, a reversionary interest of his cousin's estate. He was now employed as a temporary clerk of works in the Public Works Department at £20 a month.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He had raised the £150 in order to proceed with the case. The balance of the money was with the solicitors in England for litigation. There was about £7,000 at stake; the matter had lapsed twenty years ago, and it might be difficult to get a penny. He forfeited the rooms at Beach-road, although he only stayed there two nights.

Mrs. Cornish, maternity nurse, spoke to having been called to attend the defendant while she was living at Albert-terrace. She was called in by the co-defendant, who, on the way, asked her to call the defendant "Mrs. Boutellier." Dr. Elliott performed an operation on the defendant. Witness spoke to acts of familiarity between the defendant and co-defendant.

Harry Edwin Carter said that he had been staying in a house for which he had made arrangements for a certain period, when the co-defendant came and told him that he had bought the house, and that he had engaged Mrs. Clifford as his housekeeper at £10 a month. He did not notice any familiarity between Mrs. Clifford and Boutellier. He did not remember making a statement in the St. George's Hotel to the plaintiff and another gentleman, Mr. Whitaker. He remembered the day referred to; they were all drunk together. Of course a man made statements then that he forgot afterwards. He was quite sober now. He was a friend of both parties. He denied that he had recently spoken to Boutellier about this matter. Clifford offered him £5 to sign an affidavit which was not true. Mr. Price Hughes, the plaintiff's solicitor, threatened to put witness in the "tronk" for perjury.

The evidence of Dr. Elliott, taken on commission, was read. He stated that on the birth of the child, which was premature, Boutellier came for him. He referred to the woman as Mrs. Boutellier, and gave the witness to understand that she was his wife. If Clifford had ceased to cohabit with his wife in the middle of July the child could not be his.

Mr. Benjamine losed his case.

Mr. Wilkinson called

Mrs. Clifford who said that during her residence in England she did not live happily with her husband. Directly after the marriage the unhappiness commenced. Her husband assaulted her, and on one occasion the marks caused by his blows obliged her to remain indoors for six weeks. Clifford came out here in December, 1900, and witness remained with her three children in England. Her husband wrote asking her to come out, and promised to turn over a new leaf, saying he would give up drinking. Witness thought drinking was the cause of his conduct. She did not keep the letters. Witness came out on the 10th June, 1901, and went to live with her husband. She remained with him up to the 19th August. During this time he was in the habit of using the vilest of language, and he also assaulted her. The landlady of the house said she could not put up with so much quarrelling, and so witness left the place. She did not remember saying she would go to the world's end with Boutellier. She told Mrs. Cornish that she would not go back to her husband. Witness went as housekeeper to Boutellier. She had not been allowed to see her two sons. Witness had some furniture when she was married.

Mr. Benjamin said he would abandon the claim for furniture.

By De Villiers, C. J.: It was not true that Boutellier ever lay on the bed as stated by Mrs. Cornish. When witness was ill people came and sat on the bed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Witness did not give instructions to her attorney that she had ceased to cohabit with her husband about a month after her arrival. Witness did not fix the date after seeing Dr. Elliott's evidence. Witness dared say that Boutellier had kissed her in sympathy when she had been crying over letters from her husband; and so had Mrs. Cornish.

Re-examined: Witness remembered the 19th August because it was the date of the Royal procession.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Witness was still housekeeper to Boutellier. She wanted the custody of the girl, who was 3½ years old, and she wanted access to the boys.

Albert Edward Boutellier, cabinet-maker, said that on a day in the middle of August he heard the cries of the children, and came downstairs. He saw Clifford standing with a stick in his hand and the woman lying on the floor. Witness arranged with Mrs. Clifford that she should act as his housekeeper. Witness denied the allegations as to adultery. Witness had sat on the bed, but had never laid down. Witness went to the doctor's on the occasion of Mrs. Clifford's confinement. He might then have referred to her as Mrs. Boutellier, in view of the fact that she was in such a condition. He might have kissed her in sympathy in the presence of Mrs. Cornish. From the language witness had heard Clifford use, he should not think him a proper person to have charge of the children.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Witness did not give the doctor to understand that Mrs. Clifford was his (witness's) wife. Witness could not swear whether he told Mrs. Cornish to call Mrs. Clifford Mrs. Boutellier.

This concluded the evidence, and counsel were then heard in arguments on the facts.

Mr. Benjamin said the plaintiff would be content to have the custody of the two boys, and was willing to leave the girl with the mother, and to contribute 5s. a week as maintenance if she led a proper life.

De Villiers, C.J.: The chief question to be decided in this case is whether the first defendant has been guilty of adultery with the second defendant. The defendants themselves deny such adultery, but I am satisfied from the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff that the adultery was committed. There is no direct evidence of adultery, but all the circumstances of the case lead to the conclusion that the connection between these two was a guilty one. The taking of her as a housekeeper was a mere blind. It may be, no doubt, true that he was induced to take compassion upon her by reason of her husband's ill-treatment of her. That may be the case, but I have no doubt whatever that their connection was a guilty one. The doctor's evidence in regard to the birth of the child satisfies me that the child, which was born in February, was not the plaintiff's, but was the child of the second defendant. He engaged a doctor, and told the doctor to come and see Mrs. Boutellier. He told the nurse to call her Mrs. Boutellier, and I quite believe the evidence of Mrs. Cornish as to what took place while she was attending as nurse to the first defendant. I quite believe her statement as to the familiarity of the first defendant with the second. There is no suggestion made that on the occasion in which they were seen together on a bed there was any adultery, but the fact that they were lying together on one bed goes very far to show what were the previous relations between the two. Then there was also the kissing; and all the other circumstances go to show that their relations were of a guilty nature. On the other hand, I am of opinion that this is not a case in which any damages whatever should be awarded to the plaintiff. His conduct has not been that of a kind husband. The language which he used towards her was, even with the provocation that was received, so gross as no husband should use towards his wife. He denied ever having used foul language, but a letter containing the foulest possible language was produced, and I am quite satisfied that if a man could deliberately sit down and write in such foul terms to his wife, he would use even fouler language when provoked by the altercations which from time to time took place. And if a man could use such language towards a wife it is not surprising that she became disgusted with him and sought for sympathy and consolation elsewhere. Therefore, I shall not in this case award any damages whatever to the plaintiff. As to the costs of this action, these, I think, should be paid by the second defendant, because, whatever foul language plaintiff may have used towards his wife, that was no reason for the second defendant doing anything to induce the wife to leave her husband. It was his duty to have acted as peacemaker, instead of which he took her away. As to the claim in reconvention, alleging cruelty, that, of course, falls to the ground when once adultery is proved. Plaintiff naturally is entitled to the custody of the children, but the daughter is of very tender years, and for the present at all events the daughter must be allowed to remain in the custody of the mother. Plaintiff is to have the custody of the two boys, with the right of access for the defendant at all reasonable times and places. Defendant is to have the custody of the daughter of the marriage, with similar right of access for the plaintiff, and with leave to the plaintiff to apply again for the custody of such child. The claim in reconvention is dismissed, and a decree of divorce is granted, with costs against the second defendant.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ABRAHAMS v. KAISER BROS. { 1903. Mar. 11th.

Damage to house—Negligence of owner of adjoining property.

Through the defendant's negligent construction of a house on his land the house fell and part of the debris struck the roof of the plaintiff's house, which adjoined the new building. The roof was so much damaged that it became necessary to place a practically new roof on the plaintiff's house, and there was no evidence to show that the value of the house was increased by reason of the new roof.

Held, that the measure of damages was the cost of placing the roof as nearly as practicable in the condition in which it was before the accident, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount which he had paid to the contractor for the repair of the roof.

This was a claim for £185 damages, alleged to have been caused to the plaintiff's property by reason of the collapse of property in Sir Lowry-road, Cape Town, belonging to the defendants.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff was the proprietor of certain landed property in Sir Lowry-road, Cape Town, where he carried on business as a forage and grain merchant, and the defendants, who were proprietors and speculators in land and buildings, acquired a plot of ground adjoining the plaintiff's property. They commenced to build, but on the 24th June their structure collapsed and came down upon the plaintiff's building, which was, in consequence, seriously damaged, as was also his stock. Plaintiff claimed £185, of which £153 was the amount spent on the repairs, £13 spent on tarpaulins to cover the stock, and £15 damage done to goods and cost of labour in removing the same. The defendant refused to pay the amount claimed. Defendants' plea admitted the first three paragraphs of the declaration as to the names of the parties and the ownership of the land and buildings. They said it was on the 23rd of May that the collapse took place. They admitted that some of the debris did fall on the plaintiff's ground and building, but denied that their building was constructed in a negligent or improper manner. They denied that they had admitted any liability or that they had requested the plaintiff to effect any repairs or arrange for the purchase of tarpaulins, or that they had said that they would pay for the damage. They further said that the plaintiff had not only done the repairs to his building required through the mishap, but that he had done repairs in excess of such damage. On the 13th February of this year the defendant's attorneys wrote a letter, in which they said they had no wish to indulge in expensive litigation, and that, while they could not admit their liability, they tendered £75, and taxed costs to date, in full settlement of the plaintiff's claim. They added that they should put in this tender at the trial

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. M. Bisset), for plaintiff. Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. C. W. De Villiers), for defendant.

The plaintiff in his evidence said that he owned a building in Sir Lowry-road, used by him as a forage and grain store. He bought it three years ago for £3,000. This was adjoined by property belonging to the defendants. Shortly before June he had to repair the roof a little, but the building itself was in good condition. The defendants bought land, and in April of last year they commenced to build. Jacob Kaizer came to him and asked him whether he wanted to make a party wall. Witness refused, and then the defendant said that whatever might happen he would give him a written guarantee against damage. Kaiser came again the following day, but witness still refused. Kaiser afterwards wanted to buy the property, but witness told him that he would not take £7,000 for the property. The defendants did not lay a proper foundation for their building, but simply a few brick piers, about 18 inches high. Two stories were erected over the beams. The piers were close to the wall of witness's property. The whole building would be about 40 feet high. Witness's building was lower, 27 feet to 30 feet. On the morning of June 24 he found that the defendants' building had collapsed, and that his own building had been damaged. The roof was broken, and there was a lot of rubbish about, slates and bricks, and so on. Witness's store was filled with forage and grain—over 4,000 bags of grain, wheat, barley, and so on, apart from the oat hay. Rain was falling in upon his stock, which was damaged. From 80 to 100 bags would be affected He claimed for these £13, and £2 for labour for removing them. The whole damage would be over £200. He saw Jacob Kaiser the same morning; Kaiser said he was sorry, but it was not his fault. His man had done it, because he had taken some corner blocks out of the building. Kaiser told him that he must start with the work at once, and said he must remove his stock to a store which he (Kaiser) would provide. Witness suggested that tarpaulins be put over the stock, and Kaiser agreed, and said that tarpaulins could be used afterwards. About four o'clock the roof was covered. He got Davidson, the contractor, and they started to put on a new roof. The work occupied about three weeks. The contractor's tender was £153. Witness thought that was a very low price, and he was well satisfied with it. One of the "hips" of the roof was broken by the debris. The bricks for three or four feet down had been broken. There were also cracks in the wall. Damage was also done to the window frames. The roof had now been restored to as good a state as it was formerly in. Witness did not think any work had been done beyond that which was necessary to restore the roof to its former condition. Soon after the collapse of the building, Kaiser called on him and offered him men to put on an iron roof. He declined, however, to consent to an iron roof. Witness did not return the tarpaulins to the defendants, because when he sent in the bill they refused to have anything to do with it. He was still willing to hand over the tarpaulins if the defendants would pay for them. He had to have his name painted on the building again in consequence of the mishap. He did not get possession of the old materials.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: His roof had four pitches. Kaiser's building fell in, and the debris fell almost all over the roof. It did not fall on one side simply. There was more than one hole in the roof. He was not aware that there were cracks in the wall before the mishap occurred. It was not true that Kaiser came and wanted to rebuild all witness's walls as a party-wall, but nothing was said about rebuilding. He did not know whether the debris was removed by Kaiser's men. He painted the whole building on the front. He had nothing in writing at the time the contractor began the work of restoration.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: It was important after the collapse that the work should be begun at once, otherwise with the wet weather they might have lost £2,000 through damage to stock.

James Davidson, builder and contractor, Woodstock, said he had seen the building before the collapse occurred. The building had four sides to the roof, and it was a good one, with a slate roof. The walls were in good condition. He saw Kaiser's building after the accident; he could see the place where the piers had been. He should think they were about 14 by 18, and about seven feet apart. Kaiser's building was about 50 feet high at the front, while the plaintiff's would be under 30 feet. Kaiser's building was composed of dagar, and it had not been plastered. Witness was being questioned as to the cause of the collapse, when Sir H. Juta interposed, and said that there was no need to go into the question.

De Villiers, C.J., said he did not understand that the defendant admitted liability for the collapse.

Sir H. Juta: If we tender we must admit liability.

De Villiers, C.J.: If you admit negligence then we shall have no need to consider the question of negligence.

Sir H. Juta: It is a mere question of how much; we do not admit negligence.

Mr. Searle: The defendants' attorneys say, "Although the defendants cannot admit their liability for any damage, etc."

Sir H. Juta said that for the purposes of the case he would admit liability to the extent of the tender.

Mr. Searle said that would shorten the case considerably, and that there were certain witnesses whom it would not now be necessary to call.

Witness (proceeding) said he could not give a tender at once, but it was important that he should begin the work at once. If it was said that there was only one hole in the roof, then that hole was all the roof. The main principal was broken. He did not use the old material from the roof; it was understood that the defendants would take the old materials. Kaisers had two men for one day helping to remove the debris. He denied that he did a good deal of unnecessary work. The roof was about as good as prior to the mishap, but the walls received a shock, and they were not as good as before, and on one side had gone out of the perpendicular. The front of Kaiser's building was strongly built, heavy in the face, and the structure fell inwards and about 20 ft. of material dropped on the plaintiff's building. There was a foundation to the building.

Cross-examined: The roof was entirely new, except for the six principals. He put on new guttering. Mr. Godfrey, a plumber, tendered for some of the work, the amount of his tender being £57. Witness used wood of the value of £37. He used none of Kaiser's wood for the roof; the wood from Kaiser's was used for the hoarding in front of the building. He denied that he took materials belonging to some other people, for which Kaisers had to pay. A little rain fell on the 24th June. There was a hole on the side of the roof next Kaisers' buildings, and there were holes on two other sides. Witness could not form an estimate at once, because he could not see the full extent of the damage. He used 2,800 bricks at £5 a thousand.

De Villiers, C.J.: From what you saw it was necessary, in order to make it a decent job, to do everything you did?

Witness: Yes.

To put it in the same condition as it was before?--Yes.

Witness said that all the old rafters removed were put into Mr. Kaisers' building.

Richmond E. Richards, architect, of Woodstock, said he was called in to make an estimate of the damage. The whole side was nearly broken in, and the plates on the walls had been shifted. It was absolutely necessary to have a new roof. As to the tender of Mr. Davidson, it was a wonder to witness how he came out successfully with it. Witness estimated the work would cost £200. It was necessary to rebuild parts of the walls.

Cross-examined: Witness could not swear that a board was broken on the three sides other than the one nearest Kaisers'.

Re-examined: The whole roof was strained and shifted, and everything had to be removed before the roof could be restored.

Ernest J. R. Jansen, plumber, deposed that about a month before the accident, he had repaired the roof, which was, in his opinion, as good as new when he had finished.

Daniel Mills Abrahamse, son of the plaintiff, said that in June he was managing the Sir Lowry-road establishment for his father. He saw the building after the accident. The roof was smashed in and covered with debris. On the first layer about 80 to 100 bags of cereals, bran, etc., were damaged by rain and debris. Of these about a third had to be entirely thrown away. The rest had to be removed to another store. Witness considered that £13 was a reasonable amount to charge for the goods damaged. As a fact, the damage amounted to £200, the goods below for about five or six layers being damaged. Witness did not know of this when the account was sent in. There was rain while the roof was being repaired, and in witness's opinion it was necessary to get tarpaulins. Everything was done to prevent damage to the goods.

Mr. Searle closed his case.

Sir Henry Juta called

Charles Stewart, clerk to the Meteorological Commission, who produced records of the rainfall in Cape Town for the month of June. From the 22nd to 25th there was no rain. The records were taken at the S.A. College and Burg-street. From the 26th to the 30th there was rain.

Thomas Swain, building inspector in the employ of the Cape Town Council, deposed to having inspected defendant's and plaintiff's buildings. He found a good amount of debris had fallen on the plaintiff's roof nearest Kaisers', where there was a hole about five feet in diameter. On the other sides there were slates removed by the shaking, but there were not what would be called holes. Witness considered that the roof could be repaired without the whole being removed. He thought that £50 or £60 would be a fair amount to allow for repairing the roof.

Philip Booysen, foreman builder to defendants at the time of the accident, said he made a careful inspection of the roof immediately after the accident. On the three sides farthest from Kaisers', slates were shifted, but no woodwork was broken excepting one piece, which was easily to be replaced. He did not think it necessary to put a new roof on. By stripping the one side he could have made a better job of it than it was before. He would have done the work for £40, allowing for a profit. Witness had seen the contractor's men taking away the old material from the roof; it was not deposited in Kaisers' building. Some of the rafters were rotten through old age. Witness estimated the cost of repairing the wall at £7 10s. After the accident witness examined the bags of grain with young Abrahamse. Witness then saw no damage, and Abrahamse did not point out any injury. Witness remembered Mr. Kaiser offering to repair the damage. Abrahamse then said: "No; I have given it to Mr. Davidson."

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: If a new roof had to be put on witness considered £150 excessive. Witness would undertake to do a roof at £5 per square. There were 14 squares on that roof. Witness thought the brickwork Davidson did was worth about £15. He considered this work unnecessary.

David Thomas Godfrey, plumbing and drainage contractor, Cape Town, said he was doing work on Kaisers' building when it collapsed. He had previously worked on the plaintiff's roof; it was an old roof. During the mishap there was one hole knocked into the roof of the plaintiff's building on one side, besides a little more damage. On the other side there was very little damage, and no hole had been caused. He afterwards did work on the plaintiff's building after the collapse. He considered that after the collapse of the building it could have been made watertight, as it was before, without taking down the whole of the roof. The defendant's wall did not fall on the plaintiff's roof; it was only some of the debris that fell. Defendants' wall fell inwards. His account amounted to £57. He considered that all the work which was necessary to be done in the way of plumbing and slating in order to restore the roof to its former condition could have been done for £20. He asked Mr. Davidson what he was going to do. The latter said that Mr. Abrahamse told him to put on a new roof. Witness did not think that a new roof was necessary. There were cracks in the front wall of plaintiff's building before the collapse occurred. It was usual for contractors to provide canvas when they undertook repairs to buildings such as this. If the work actually required had been done, nothing like so much canvas would be required as the plaintiff put on the building.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He did box guttering, ridging, and slating on the plaintiff's building, but no wood work. He did not examine the premises with a view of making an estimate of the whole work. He would not pit his evidence as to whether the work executed was necessary against the evidence of an architect. He saw some cracks in the plaintiff's wall before the collapse happened, but he would not say whether they were merely cracks in the plaster.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He did not remove the slates. He saw the slates when they were off; the under parts were perfectly rotten, and were unfit to be used again. The boards on the other side furthest from Kaisers' building would have been fit to use again. That side was perfectly sound except for a few slates.

J. Mackay, building contractor, Cape Town, said he was doing contract work on the defendants' building when that structure fell in. On the side of the roof, near the defendants' building, two holes were caused in the plaintiff's building by the collapse, but on the further side very little damage had been caused. He did not think there was any need to put a new roof on. He should have been prepared to put the roof into order for £40 to £50. Materials belonging to him were taken away by Abrahamse's men, and had to be paid for by the defendants.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He did not go inside the plaintiff's building. He saw the damage which had been done from Kaisers' wall. He did not make the inspection for the purpose of framing an estimate. He would have patched up the plaintiff's building so as to make it waterproof for £40 or £50. He would have made everything good. He denied that all the rafters were broken. He saw the rafters from defendant's building. Lime, cement, and sand taken away by Davidson's men belonging to him was paid for by Kaisers to the amount of £1 2s. 6d.

[Maasdorp, J.: What was it caused the building to collapse?]

Witness: I believe there was a column a little out of plumb, and the foreman, I think it was, went to put two uprights alongside the beam that it was resting upon.

[Maasdorp, J.: Had you any responsibility for this?]

Witness: No; I was simply doing the plasterwork.

Sir H. Juta said that at the inquest it was found that the work and the material were very good, and what was found by the magistrate was that there was a column out of plumb, and he was going to put it right; but it did not appear to have been underpinned properly.

Mr. Searle said that that was not their evidence. There were some very important deviations from the plans as submitted, and the building inspectors were hauled over the coals in regard to the matter.

Jacob Kaiser, one of the defendants, said that before the building collapsed he spoke to the plaintiff about having a party wall. Plaintiff said that if they would give a guarantee in case the walls came down then he would agree to have a party wall. Plaintiff's was an old building. He inspected plaintiff's building after the collapse. There were two holes on one side, and on the other side there were simply a few slates off. On the other three sides the building was in perfect order. He offered to the plaintiff to repair the damage, and said he would cover it in the meantime. Plaintiff said he had his own contractor. Nothing was submitted by plaintiff to witness. He did not receive any of the old material. He gave Davidson permission to take wood for the hoardings and the roof, and the latter also took cement and so on. The contractor took down a large portion of the wall; witness considered that was quite unnecessary. He thought that the tender of £75 was sufficient to cover any damage done by the collapse. He made no arrangement about the tarpaulins.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He had no conversation with the plaintiff about the tarpaulins. He did not mention anything of that kind to the plaintiff. Plaintiff told him afterwards that he had bought tarpaulins. He was running up this building of his without an architect. There was, of course, the building inspector. The piers were shown on the plans; in some places were solid walls. He could not go on with the building according to the plans, and he found it necessary to make a deviation. There was only one of the rafters that was cracked. The plaintiff's store had to be covered at once. He knew the day afterwards that Davidson was working at Abrahamse's building. He spoke to the plaintiff, and the latter said he should not take advantage of witness. He did not erect buildings for any one else. He did not see any damage done to the plaintiff's stock. He never suggested to Abrahamse that the stock should be removed. There was very little rubbish lying on the bags in the plaintiff's store. It was not true that 30 or 40 tons of material fell on plaintiff's building. He saw a load of old material cleared away from the plaintiff's building. He supposed that a good deal of the old material was built into the building again.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: After he had given the wood for the roof he did not expect any further claim to be made upon him.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He admitted liability for the damage done to one side of the plaintiff's roof. The reason why he denied liability in his plea was that he thought the materials which he supplied towards the repairs would be sufficient to clear him of all liability. He could have done the work cheaper than the contractor.

De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but you see your roof might have come down in the same way that your building came down.

Sir H. Juta pointed out that at the inquest there was no question as to the workmanship.

Sir H. Juta closed his case, and counsel were then heard in argument on the facts.

De Villiers, C.J.: According to the pleadings in this case the defendants have all along denied all liability in respect to the damage done to the plaintiff's building. The plea expressly denies any negligence and any liability, and it was only some time after the plea had been filed that a letter was written on behalf of the defendants to the plaintiff, tendering the sum of £75 in full satisfaction of any damage done. But even in that letter there is a disclaimer of any liability, and consequently a disclaimer of any negligence. The evidence, however, has clearly established negligence. This wall was certainly constructed in so negligent a manner as to cause the fall of the house and serious damage to the plaintiff's property. Now, what is the measure of damages in a case of this kind? Clearly the measure of damages is what it would cost the plaintiff to replace his house as nearly as practicable in the condition in which it was before the damage was done. It is not his duty to patch up the work just as he can, but to make it as good and serviceable a building as it was before. Now, the evidence is that it was a perfectly sound house before the damage. The roof was sound, and the building was quite capable of being used as a storehouse for the cereals which plaintiff kept in the place. Then came this damage, which plaintiff had to repair. If his house had been entirely destroyed, and he had consequently been obliged to build a new house on the site there would have been good ground for holding that some allowance should be made for increased value of the new building as compared with the old. But the old walls remained and a practically new roof was added. There is no evidence whatever that the house with the new roof is more valuable than the house was with the old roof. The plaintiff was quite satisfied with the old roof, and he would not have had it replaced by a new roof unless the damage was such as to necessitate the expense. No doubt the main damage was done on the side of the house on which the fall occurred, but the shaking was sufficient to remove some of the slates on the other side, and according to some of the witnesses for the plaintiff, the shaking was so great as to shift the roof plates several inches on the wall. Well, one doesn't need to be an architect or a builder to understand that such a severe shaking would wrench the whole thing out of joint and, in order to make a good job of it, that it would be necessary to construct a new roof. Upon this point we have the evidence of the architect who examined the place and gave his opinion as to what was necessary, and of the contractor who gave his evidence in a very intelligent manner, and who did what he says was necessary. But great reliance is placed by defendants' counsel upon the evidence given by Swain. Well, no doubt Swain does not go quite so far as plaintiff's witnesses, but he does not give his evidence with that certainty which would justify the Court, by reason of his evidence, in entirely setting aside the evidence for the plaintiff. He admits he did not inspect the building solely for the purpose of repairs, and I have no doubt if he had gone there with the view of deciding as a contractor what work would be necessary to replace the roof he would have inspected more closely, and would have given a considerably greater estimate of the damage. For the rest all the witnesses for the defendant were somewhat connected with him, and could not give that perfectly impartial evidence which is desirable. I am satisfied on the whole of the case that practically a new roof was necessary in order to place this building in the condition in which it was before the damage. The price of the contractor was, no doubt, a very liberal one, and I am certain it must have paid him very well, but, still, under the circumstances the plaintiff did the best he could —he selected a competent contractor, and he is entitled to recover the money he paid to replace the roof. For the amount of £153, therefore, judgment will be given. Then as to the extra labour and damage to the goods I am satisfied that the extra labour and damage amounted to even more than the amount claimed, and for that also judgment will be given. As to the waterproof canvas I am not satisfied that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. I am not satisfied either that the painting was necessitated by reason of the damage. Judgment will be for the plaintiff for £168 and costs.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

The summons, he said, called upon the defendant to appear there that day to answer a judgment obtained against him in the Magistrate's Court, Cape Town, on the 26th August last, and to pay the amount due, and unless he did so to show cause why a writ of attachment should not issue. The defendant had left the Magistrate's jurisdiction, and so a writ of attachment could not be granted against him by the Magistrate, or, if granted, it was not effectual. The amount of the debt was £120, with interest at 6 per cent. from October, 1902.

The defendant Goodwright opposed the application, and said he was willing to pay the money if allowed time. He had paid more than half his share now, his partner had left him, and he could not pay the whole account at present, but if given a few months he would pay everything.

De Villiers, C.J.: How do you propose to pay it?

I will pay within four months.

Mr. Benjamin: I think the defendant was arrested going out of jurisdiction.

De Villiers, C.J.: Did you not take a passage to Port Elizabeth under an assumed name?

Yes.

Mr. Benjamin said the defendant had had a large business at Middelburg, the business had been disposed of, and they did not know what had become of the assets. There was nothing left, and this man had attempted to go out of the jurisdiction. Mr. Benjamin added that the amount of the debt was £130 14s.

De Villiers, C.J.: Can you give security for that amount?

My property is worth much more than that. Defendant added that he wished to go home and raise the funds among his friends.

De Villiers, C.J.: I am afraid we cannot help you.

Order granted as prayed.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

ROSS V. NATIONAL BANK. { 1903. Mar. 12th.

Arrest—8th Rule of Court—Confirmation—Provisional Order of Sequestration—Anticipation of return day—Release from imprisonment—Ord. 6 of 1843, sec. 23—Security.

R., who was indebted to the bank in a sum of over £4,000 was arrested at the instance of the bank manager under the 8th Rule of Court while attempting to quit the Colony under an assumed name. The bank now applied for a confirmation of the writ of arrest. This was opposed on behalf of R. on the ground that he had obtained a provisional order of sequestration and he now claimed his discharge from prison, but consented to the return day of the provisional order being anticipated and the order at once made final

Held, that the Court had discretion under Section 23 of the Insolvent Ordinance either to grant or to refuse the confirmation of the order for civil imprisonment. In the circumstances the Court in this case ordered the prisoner's discharge on his finding security to attend the meetings of his creditors in £500 and granted a final order of sequestration.

This was an application by the plaintiff, Hugh Stewart Campbell Ross, for his release from gaol. Mr. Searle, K.C., appeared for Ross, and Mr. Schreiner represented the bank.

Mr. Schreiner asked that the writ of arrest should be confirmed. He submitted that the writ was rightly taken out, because, on the affidavit, the man was shown to be about to leave the Colony.

The Chief Justice: But the effect of this provisional order is to stay all proceedings, is it not?

Mr. Schreiner: It does not absolutely stay proceedings. The position would be this, that the costs which will probably have been incurred in such a matter would be unprotected in so far as the insolvency is concerned.

Mr. Searle read the petition of the applicant, which stated that he was arrested at the instance of the National Bank of South Africa, and lodged in the gaol at Cape Town, where he still was. He was indebted to the said bank for something over £4,000, being money advanced to him for the purpose of buying cattle for the Repatriation Department, Transvaal. The cattle were brought from Basutoland, where the inspector passed them. He paid for them by drawing cheques on a bank in Johannesburg. The said cattle were afterwards quarantined at Edenburg, and the Transvaal Repatriation Department refused to take them, and the petitioner was forced to sell them at a loss. It was the petitioner's intention to leave for England for the express purpose of raising funds for the discharge of the said debt. The petitioner had, and still was, willing to discharge the said debt.

Mr. Schreiner read the replying affidavit, which set forth that the applicant had not paid in the proceeds of the cattle which he appeared to have realised. Upon his arrival in Cape Town the applicant applied to the Standard Bank for a draft. It appeared that the offer made by the debtor was not a bona-fide one. He told deponent that he had no cash, whereas it seemed that he handed to the manager of the Grand Hotel a considerable sum of money, alleged to be £400, for safe custody. He also said he had remitted no money to England, and as a matter of fact drafts for £425 had been issued in his favour. Applicant's wife had been staying at the Grand Hotel since his arrest, and she was now staying at the Mount Nelson. Deponent was convinced that, if released, the petitioner would leave the country, and would not be in attendance to meet the creditors of his insolvent estate. From inquiries which had been made, it would appear that the petitioner had been making away with his assets, and it was imperative that he should be in attendance to meet his creditors to answer certain questions. A further affidavit set forth that the moneys had been advanced in November, 1902, and that the defendant had at the time of his arrest booked passages by the German. He was staying at the Grand Hotel under the name of Ford, and he booked his passage under the name of Rowe. It was alleged that he was possessed of the following moneys: Deposited with the manager of the Grand Hotel, £400; Standard Bank, £900; passage of the petitioner and his wife and manservant, £100. At the interview with the applicant he said he was insolvent, and unless his friends came to his assistance he should surrender his estate. Deponent was of opinion that, if released, Ross would leave the country and defeat his creditors, and that it would be to the benefit of his creditors if his estate were placed in sequestration in the hands of the Master of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Searle read the answering affidavit of the applicant, which set forth that the draft had been cancelled and recollected, and had since been tendered to the respondents. He denied that he had handed £400 to the manager of the Grand Hotel, or that when asked if he had any money he said, "No," and he declared that the only money he had in his possession was £20. He declared that the said draft was never paid in England. He denied that his wife had been staying at the Grand Hotel, and that the money was being used for her maintenance. He repeated that he wished to proceed to England to raise money to meet his debts, and that he would return to South Africa after an absence of three months. He denied that he had been making away with or squandering the assets of the estate. The cattle were quarantined, having contracted lung sickness, and he could not leave them, and he was prevented from attending to other cattle on which he had an option. The passage he took on the German was for himself and his wife only, and represented about £60. There were no other assets in his control or possession. With the exception of the draft that he tendered to the respondents, he was not possessed of any other assets. He denied that he wished to leave South Africa in order to defraud his creditors. He had asked that Mr. Harry Gibson should be appointed curator bonis.

Mr. Schreiner intimated that the manager of the bank and the manager of the Grand Hotel were prepared to give evidence if the Court thought it necessary.

Mr. Searle said the point was: what was to be gained by keeping the man in prison? He owed this money to the bank, and he said he had actually tendered the draft, and he was willing to give up everything to pay his debts. He admitted his insolvency. The return day was not till the 14th April, and it would be open, he supposed, to him to file his schedule of debts. It seemed a pity that the proceedings in the estate should be delayed so long, and he submitted that no good object could be gained by keeping the man in prison.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What was his object in going under an assumed name?]

Mr. Searle: That I don't know. It is possible that he did think they would try and stop him. Still, the mere fact that he did that does not show that he was going with a bad motive. Even now he says he would like to go and endeavour to get funds to pay his debts, and come back in three months. Whatever name he had gone under, they would have stopped him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is it not a case in which the whole of his conduct will have to be minutely examined?]

Mr. Searle: That is so.

Counsel consented to the order being made final, and to the discharge of defendant, upon giving security.

After argument as to the amount of the security,

De Villiers, C.J.: It seems to me to be in the interests of all parties that the provisional order should now be made absolute. That is consented to by both sides, and will be granted. In regard to the custody of the defendant, it is quite clear that, under the 23rd section, the Court is not bound to release the defendant. The conditions on which the Court would release him are those mentioned in the 22nd section. In the present case, if the Court sees cause for refusing to make the order, it is quite competent for the Court to do so. Now, in my opinion, this order should be refused under all the circumstances disclosed by the affidavits, unless the defendant is prepared to give security, and the question is: what should be the amount of the security? Now that amount should not be prohibitive, and I think that anything approaching £4,000 would be so, but at the same time the amount should be one which the defendant may reasonably be expected to find security for. I am of opinion that the sum of £500 will be sufficient. The Court will confirm his arrest, and order defendant to remain in custody until he gives security to the satisfaction of the Registrar of the Supreme Court in the sum of £500 that he will remain in the Colony for a period of two months and appear at all meetings of creditors of his estate which he may lawfully be required to attend. I think the costs should be made a charge against the insolvent estate.

Ex parte PALMER.

Mr. M. Bisset moved to make absolute a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act.

Granted.

Ex parte BERMAN. { 1903. Mar. 12th.

Lunatic—Curator—Domicile.

S. had been appointed curator to the person and property of his wife, who was of unsound mind. Thereafter a rule nisi was obtained calling upon S. to show cause why his appointment should not be cancelled. On an application to have this rule made absolute,

Held, that as it had not been brought to the notice of the Court that all the said property was situated in the Transvaal and that S. was there domiciled the application must be granted.

This was an application by one Jacob Berman to make absolute a rule nisi, calling upon Morris Segale to show cause why his appointment as curator of the person and property of his wife Rebecca Segale (born Berman), should not be cancelled.

The affidavits upon which the rule nisi was granted were read.

In a replying affidavit, Segale denied the allegations therein contained as to his ill-treatment of his wife, and a number of witnesses deposed that he had treated her affectionately.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Melius de Villiers), appeared for petitioner; Sir Henry Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers), for the respondent, Morris Segale.

Mr. Searle read affidavits of Mrs. Segale's father and others to the effect that the respondent had grossly under-stated the value of Mrs. Segale's property in Johannesburg, that she had been ill-treated by the respondent, and that this ill-treatment had in a large measure brought about her present mental condition, that the respondent was anxious to obtain the property and realise upon it, and that he then intended to go to America. It was further alleged that the respondent only paid £7 towards his wife's maintenance, and not £15 a month as he had stated, and that she was kept at the asylum very scantily clad. Counsel, in support of the present application, pointed out that the respondent had only been a refugee in this colony, that he had lived in Johannesburg, and that his interests were entirely in Johannesburg. Segale did not give the Court a proper statement at the time the order was made with regard to the increase derived from the estate. He stated that the wife's estate in Johannesburg produced £40 a month. It now appeared pretty clear that the estate was a very valuable one, the respondent said £5,000, while they in the present application said it was worth £10,000 to £12,000, and that it was producing a rental of £90 per month at the present time. That showed that Segale did not put the matter before the Court properly. Counsel submitted that under the circumstances the Court should have still less hesitation in altering the order. He suggested that the proper course would be to appoint the Chief Rabbi of the Jewish community as the curator of the wife's property, and to relegate the matter of a curator of her property to the Transvaal Court, where the property was at the present time the subject of litigation.

Sir H. Juta said that the application seemed to be made not upon the allegations contained in the affidavits, but upon quite other grounds as to jurisdiction. He submitted that all the allegations of ill-treatment were ill-founded, and had not been justified, and that the conduct of the respondent had all through been with the object of doing justice to the wife's estate. The statement that the respondent wished to go to America was denied in toto. Counsel could see nothing which had been adduced that day which should cause the Court to take a different course to that which they took when the matter was originally before the Court. What foundation was there for these allegations? Only the unsupported testimony of one person. Counsel questioned the locus standi of the father-in-law to come into Court and ask that the previous order should be set aside, and that the costs should fall on the respondent.

Mr. Searle argued that it was very important that there should be an inquiry into the relations of the present curator with his wife's property. He contended that the Court would never have made the appointment if it had known the facts now before it.

De Villiers, C.J.: I am not prepared to say that there was any intention to deceive the Court on the occasion when this lady was declared to be of unsound mind, but I do say this, that if all the facts which are now known to me had been brought before the Court on that occasion, the order would not have been given. The petition then said that the wife owned certain property, and that it would be necessary in the interest of the said Segale to have the sanity or other condition of her mind ascertained. It is not here said that this property is situated in the Transvaal. It is stated that when the case came before the Court, the Court was informed that all the property was in the Transvaal. It is quite possible that that was stated, but I don't think it was brought to the notice of the Court that the plaintiff was domiciled in the Transvaal, and not in this colony, and certainly if that fact had been known, the Court would not have appointed him as curator both of her person and property. It is extremely important, and in fact absolutely necessary, that the person who was so appointed curator should be within the jurisdiction of the Court who so appointed him, and in the present case it is now clear that the respondent is not domiciled in this colony, and that his domicile is in the Transvaal. It is stated that he has bought some business which will give him interests in this colony, but the affidavit does not go so far as to show that he intends now to reside permanently in this colony. Then again, I was wholly unaware of the fact that an application had been made to the High Court by the present respondent to have certain property which was registered in his wife's name transferred into his own name, and that that application was then refused, because of the reason stated by Mr. Justice Solomon. It is said that that also had been mentioned incidentally, but that the matter was not brought prominently to the notice of the Court. It was an undefended case, and the Court, without knowledge of what had preceded between the parties, did not inquire minutely into all these circumstances. It now appears that the father of this lady and her brother are strongly opposed to the respondent being curator. It is said that they have no locus standi. In one sense, no doubt, they have no locus standi, but still the father and the brother have such an interest in the welfare of their relative, that they would be quite justified in bringing a matter of this kind to the notice of the Court, and the Court then, in its capacity as upper curator, if I may say so, of every unit in this colony, is bound to do everything it can to protect the interests of the lunatic; and the facts since brought to the notice of the Court are, at all events, sufficient to make me stay my hand, and to hold that the appointment already made should be cancelled, mainly for the reason that the respondent is not domiciled in this colony, and is unable to perform his duties, either as curator of the person or as curator of the property of the defendant. It is suggested that the Rev. Mr. Bender——

Mr. Searle (interposing): We suggested Mr. Hoffenberg, but we should not object to Mr. Bender.

Sir H. Juta said his client would have no objection to Mr. Bender.

De Villiers, C. J. (continuing) said: It is suggested that Mr. Bender should be appointed curator of the person. If he refuses to act, then that may be mentioned later. Then I think that this Court should also appoint a curator of the property, because moneys will have to be paid for and on behalf of this lady, and there must be some one to administer the moneys coming to her in this colony, and I think a fit and proper person would be Mr. Cheetham. It is for him, then, to apply to the High Court for such powers as he thinks ought to be granted. It may be that the High Court there will recognise this appointment, and give him the powers. It may be the High Court will say, "We will appoint our curator," but these are matters with which we have nothing to do. The Court has declared this lady of unsound mind, and it has to make provision for the care of her person and her property. The Court will therefore revoke the appointment of the respondent, and appoint the Rev. Mr. Bender as curator of her person, and Mr. Cheetham as curator of her property. With regard to the costs of this application, I do not think there has been any intention of concealment on the part of the respondent. I have no doubt that both the applicant and the respondent are only acting in the interests of the unfortunate lady, and her estate is an ample one, and I am of opinion that the proper course would be that the costs of this application should be borne by the estate.

Sir H. Juta: I take it that one part of your lordship's former order is not revoked, viz., that the money should be devoted to the maintenance of the wife and the maintenance and education of the children?

De Villiers, C. J.: Oh, yes, that part of the order is not touched.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Van der Byl and Van der Horst; Respondent's Attorneys: Friedlander and Du Toit.]

WOOLLEY V. MARNINS AND OTHERS.

Mr. Benjamin applied for an order calling upon the defendants to join in the partition of certain lands held by the plaintiff in common with the defendants. Counsel said he asked for judgment against both the defendants, but for costs only against one, the other defendant be understood having been formally joined to the suit.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are you aware that one of the defendants is dead, and has been dead for many years.]

No.

[De Villiers, C.J. said the Sheriff's return stated he had been unable to trace one of the defendants, and that he was now informed that he died sixteen years ago.]

Mr. Benjamin said he had not seen a copy of the return, and he therefore asked that the case should stand over, so that they might see whether an executor had been appointed.

Order accordingly.

SANDERS V. STEIN.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment for £32 12s. 6d., account owing for certain work and labour done and materials supplied, with interest and costs, and he also asked for costs of the preparation of a declaration. He said that in this case the summons was issued on the 28th January, and an appearance was entered by the defendant on the 4th February through his attorneys, Messrs. Friedlander and Du Toit. Thereafter a letter was written by the defendant's attorneys tendering to pay £20. Then, after that, instructions were given to counsel to prepare a declaration on the 27th February. That was returned on the 28th, and then, on the same day, a letter was received from the defendant's attorneys notifying the plaintiff's attorneys that they intended to withdraw appearance. Appearance was not, however, withdrawn until the 10th inst.

De Villiers, C. J., said that the matter of the costs of the declaration was one for the Taxing Officer, who informed him that in this particular instance verbal notice was given before the declaration was drawn.

An order was granted for the amount asked, viz., £32 12s. 6d.

FIRTH v TOWN COUNCIL OF CAPE TOWN. { 1903 Mar. 12th.

Valuation—Section 93 of Act 26 of 1893—Subdivision.

The property of the applicant, on which there were a restaurant and a store, was valued for £3,000. After such valuation, he made additions to the store, whereupon the Town Council, at an interim valuation, increased the valuation not only of the store but also of the restaurant on the alleged ground that there had been a subdivision of the property.

Held, that there was no such subdivision in terms of the 93rd Section of Act 26 of 1893 and that the Council had no right at such interim valuation to revalue the restaurant in respect of which there had been no improvement or change of tenancy.

This was an application on notice calling on the Town Council to show cause why the decision of the Valuation Court with reference to the value placed upon certain property belonging to the applicant should not be reviewed and the valuation fixed by the Court set aside or reduced.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., appeared for the applicant; Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner), for the Town Council.

In his affidavit, the applicant, George Septimus Firth, deposed that in 1902 he bought from the S.A. Mutual Life Assurance Company certain property at the corner of Waterkant-street and Fish-lane, Cape Town, which then consisted of a restaurant in Waterkant-street and a store and yard in Fish-lane. The restaurant was then let on a lease for three years, at a rent of £16 a month. Applicant decided to rebuild the store, and made arrangements with the tenant of the restaurant, under which the latter gave up a portion of the restaurant and of the yard, in consideration of which the applicant reduced the rent by £4 10s. a month. He then proceeded to erect a new store. At the time of the purchase the Municipal valuation was £3,000. The Municipality of Cape Town recently made an interim valuation, and after deponent had appeared to object at the Court, the valuation of the restaurant, which had been reduced in area, was fixed at £3,500, and of the store, £3,000. The deponent referred to the valuation placed on other properties in the neighbourhood, and said a certain property in a similar position was valued at the rate of 19s. per superficial foot, whereas his property was valued at the rate of £3 13s. per superficial foot. He considered an equitable valuation, taking the property as a whole, would be £5,000; if taking separately £2,000 for the restaurant and £3,000 for the store. The divisional valuation, made six months ago, was £2,000. Mr. Henry Jones, valuer, made an affidavit in which he placed the value of the property at £2,500.

De Villiers, C. J.: How much did he pay for the property?

Sir Henry Juta: £6,000.

For the respondent Council, an affidavit made by Mr. J. R. Finch, the Town Clerk, was read. He said that there having been a sub-division of the property, a re-valuation was made. The new valuation was made by Messrs. Moller and Fock. At the time of the Divisional Council valuation, the new store was not built. Mr. Moller deposed that since 1901 there had been a great increase in the value of property in the City. He annexed a list showing the valuation of premises in that locality in 1901, and the amounts for which the same had since been sold. He considered that the value of £3,500 placed on the restaurant and £3,000 on the store was in each case fair and reasonable.

In an answering affidavit Mr. Firth said he did not admit that there had been any sub-division of the property.

Sir Henry Juta contended that the Town Council had no right to make an interim valuation of the property.

After argument, the Court reduced the valuation to £5,000, with costs.

De Villiers, C.J.: The owner of property within the municipality is bound to pay his rates according to the valuation, and he is therefore entitled to insist upon no alteration in the valuation being made without the sanction of the Act. In order to discover at what times there may be alteration in the valuation the Court has to refer to the 93rd section of Act 26 of 1893. Among the grounds on which an interim valuation may be made is the erection or improvement of existing buildings. In the present case there was a building improved, and in respect to that the Council was perfectly justified in increasing the valuation. Mr. Finch, in his affidavit, stated that the reason why there was an addition to the valuation, not only on the part on which the buildings were improved but also on the part of the ground in respect of which there was no addition or improvement at all, was because the property was deemed to be sub-divided. That was the ground on which the Council proceeded. Their counsel now states it was for another reason, that it was by reason of the fourth portion of the section. He (De Villiers, C. J.) found it difficult to understand what the words of that petition meant, but the Council were surely bound by what they themselves said, that the re-valuation of the property was by reason of a sub-division, and if there was no sub-division they would not be entitled to take advantage of the other portion of the section. He did not take this portion to be applicable to the case at all, but even if it were applicable, in his opinion the Council were bound by the reason which they stated, namely, that they re-valued it by reason of the property having been sub-divided. Now, in my opinion, the property was not sub-divided at all. Different portions of the property were devoted to different uses, but the meaning of sub-division, in my opinion, is a partition of the property. Well, if that is the correct reading of this section, then it is clear that all the Council were justified in doing was to have a fresh valuation of the new buildings erected, and not in any way to deal with the restaurant, to which there were no additions. The valuators had not, however, stated the exact valuation that they placed upon the improvement, but he thought that the proposal of the applicant was a fair one: that the reduction should be from £6,500 to £5,000. That would make an increase of £2,000 on the previous valuation. The applicant had expended £1,400 on the improvement, £2,000 I consider to be a fair amount to take in the absence of a special valuation by the Town Council of these improvements. In my opinion it would be a totally erroneous construction of the clause to hold that, merely because there had been an addition to one portion of the property, and a change of tenancy in respect to that portion, the Council would be entitled to revalue other portions in respect of which there was no change of tenancy and no improvement. The application, therefore, for reduction would be granted from £6,500 to £5,000, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

PRESWICH v. KOENIG AND CO. { 1903. Mar. 13th.

Landlord and tenant—Extension of lease—Ejectment.

This was an action brought by Hilda Preswich, married woman, Cape Town, against Koenig and Co., merchants, Long-street, Cape Town, for an ejectment order in regard to certain premises in Jerry-street and for £500 damages.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff was married out of community of property, that she had the sole control of her property, and that she was the owner of certain premises in Jerry-street, of which the defendants were formerly tenants, under a lease which expired on the 8th October, 1902, and that, after the expiration of the lease, the defendants continued on a monthly tenancy. A proper notice was given to the defendants to quit the premises on the 1st December. The plaintiff had sold the property to certain purchasers, to whom she had to give possession on the 1st December, but the defendants refused to quit. The plaintiff claimed an ejectment order and damages to the amount of £500.

The defendants, in their plea, admitted the formal parts of the declaration, except that the plaintiff had sole control of the property. They said that in or about the month of July the plaintiff's husband, as her duly authorised agent, offered to renew the lease for a further period of two years, reckoned from the 9th October, upon the same terms and conditions; that that offer was made at the office of the defendants to one William Smith, a clerk in the employ of the defendants, and acting in their behalf, and thereafter the defendants' acceptance was communicated to the plaintiff's duly authorised agent. The defendants denied that they were ordinary tenants, or that the plaintiff was entitled to give them a month's notice to quit.

In reconvention, the defendants claimed that they were entitled to remain in possession of the premises.

Plaintiff's replication admitted that her husband had made an offer to renew the lease, but said that he was not duly authorised to make the offer so made on her behalf, and that such offer was not accepted by the defendants, and the alleged acceptance by the defendants was not communicated to her or her husband or any agent of the plaintiff.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Russel) for plaintiff; Mr. Searle, K.C (with him Mr. Alexander) for defendants.

Sir H. Juta said that the plaintiff, if her husband had made the offer, would endorse it, so that the issue would be narrowed down to whether there was any renewal of the lease. There was no written document in the matter.

Hilda Preswich, the plaintiff, said she was married to her husband without community of property. She was the registered owner of certain premises, No. 9, Jerry-street. The premises were leased to the defendants for twelve months in October, 1901. She showed Mr. Koenig over the property. The rental was £9 a month. While Koenig was the tenant her husband collected the rent on her behalf. Out of the money she paid the interest on a bond, and also the rates, and she used the balance for her own personal purposes. No negotiations took place between Koenig and herself with regard to a renewal of the lease. In October last she received an offer for the premises, and she eventually sold the property for £2,800 to Messrs. McLeod and McFarlane. She believed this took place on the 15th October. Possession was to be given on the 1st December. She sent notice to the defendants to leave the store on or before the 1st December. Messrs. McLeod and McFarlane had given her notice that they held her responsible for any damage sustained by them in not obtaining possession of the premises.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: She lost the letter sent to her by Mr. Koenig after notice had been given to the defendants. The premises were really two houses. Witness had lived in one house, and the other house was let as a store. Her husband was not present when Mr. Koenig came up to see her when the lease was arranged. Under the lease all the receipts were made out in her husband's name, and after that the receipts were made out in her own name. After the notice was given the rent was paid to the South African Association to the end of January. The South African Association were the agents of Messrs. McLeod and McFarlane.

Joseph Preswich, monumental mason (husband of the plaintiff), said his wife let the premises to Mr. Koenig. Witness collected the rents. He saw the defendants about the renewal of the lease about the beginning of the August. Mr. Koenig had previously complained that he had too much expense for haulage and coolie hire, and said he wanted a winch, which would cost about £20, and would have to be paid for by the plaintiff. Witness called at the office, and asked for Mr. Smith, Mr. Koenig's manager. He asked him if Mr. Koenig would renew the lease if he put up the winch. Mr. Smith said he did not know, but he would write to Mr. Koenig and ask him. Witness did not think they would put up the winch and not have raised the rental. In the beginning of September he asked Mr. Smith if he had heard anything, and the latter replied that he had heard nothing. About a fortnight later he met Mr. Koenig, who asked him when he was going to put up the winch. Witness asked him if he were going to renew the lease. Koenig said he had no time to discuss the matter now, and he then left witness. Witness heard nothing more, and afterwards his wife sold the property. He denied that he had thanked Mr. Koenig for having taken the store for two years. He had received no message from Koenig's representative, Mr. Smith. Witness denied that he had ever concluded a lease with Mr. Koenig. He did not undertake to provide Mr. Koenig with another store. The property was sold between October 15 and 20.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He transacted all business in connection with the lease, such as receiving rents and doing repairs, and so on. He gave the receipts in his own name, and received the cheques in his own name. He himself sold the property, but it was on behalf of his wife. He admitted making an offer to renew the lease. That offer might have been made about the middle of July. At that time Mr. Koenig was absent from town. They never mentioned about renewing the lease for two years or any particular period. He had told Mr. Smith that he had thought of going to Europe with his family if he had suffioient means. He never offered Mr. Smith £5 if he could fix up the matter with Mr. Koenig. Mr. Smith did not stop him in Riebeek-street and tell him that Mr. Koenig had decided to take the place, and witness did not say, "All right." He had met Mr. Smith in Strand-street, and the latter then said he thought Mr. Koenig was going to take the place. He expected that if the defendants had accepted another lease they would have sent a letter of confirmation, and, as witness did not receive such a letter, he concluded that the lease had not been renewed, otherwise they would not have sold the premises.

Hector McLeod, of McLeod and McFarlane, said his firm had purchased the property in question, and they bought it in October. According to the terms of purchase, they were to take possession of the property on December 1. Witness saw Smith, who told him there was a rental lease between Koenig and himself. Witness offered to allow them to remain during December if witness could store some machinery there, and they paid the rent for that month. It was only on condition that they would go out at the end of the year that witness gave permission for them to remain for the month. Witness did not recognise their right to remain. Witness had imported considerable machinery to put in the store. Owing to not having the store, and being consequently unable to put up the machinery, witness had been unable to carry on the engineering business, and had been compelled to give out a good deal of work. The damages were continuing. Witness could not say the exact amount of damages which had been suffered, but it might be £800. No other store had been engaged; they could get no place.

Cross-examined: The S.A. Association were witness's agents in the matter, and were left to deal with Koenig in the matter. Smith told witness he would communicate with Koenig and let him know the result. However, witness received no communication from him. The firm did not know the association were receiving the rent; as soon as they found that out they stopped it.

Sir H. Juta closed his case.

Mr. Searle put in certain correspondence, and called

William Herbert Smith, chief clerk to Mr. Koenig, who said he held Mr. Koenig's special power of attorney. Witness knew of there being an agreement of lease for a year of these premises. Witness generally paid the rent. He always dealt with Mr. Preswich in regard to the property. Until the dispute in connection with the sale, he did not know Mrs. Preswich in the matter. At about the middle of July, Mr. Preswich called at the office, and asked witness whether Mr. Koenig would take the store on the same conditions for a period of two years, as he and his wife contemplated taking a holiday on the Continent the following year. Witness told him Mr. Koenig was away, but that he would communicate with him. Preswich appeared anxious in the matter, and said he wanted to leave the property with a good firm. He said he would make witness a present of £5 if he got Koenig to consent. Mr. Koenig returned on or about the 5th August. Witness spoke to him on the subject, and afterwards saw Mr. Preswich, and told him that Mr. Koenig was agreeable to take the store on the terms Mr. Preswich had offered him, viz., the same as in the existing lease, with the exception of the period named by plaintiff. At the end of October witness heard something, and in the early part of November he saw the notice to vacate the premises from Mrs. Preswich. Witness then went and saw Mr. and Mrs. Preswich, and reminded the former of the verbal lease. Mrs. Preswich took up the position that her husband had no authority in the matter.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: After seeing Preswich in July, witness did not write to Koenig about the matter. When Koenig came back, witness did not write to tell Preswich that Koenig was agreeable to renew the lease. He waited until he met Preswich casually in the street.

Mr. Searle intimated that the remaining evidence was that of the defendant, which had been taken on commission.

Maasdorp, J., said that he had read this evidence, and that it would therefore be unnecessary for Mr. Searle to read it to the Court.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts of the case,

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case sues the defendant for an order of ejectment from certain premises situated in Jerry-street, and also for damages said to have been sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant continuing to hold possession of the property, after he had received notice to quit. It would appear that an agreement of lease had been entered into between the parties in October, 1901, and that the lease was to be for twelve months, to expire on October 8, 1902. If no further agreement had been entered into by the parties, then the plaintiff would have been entitled to give the defendant one month's notice to quit, and would have been entitled to the possession of the property on the expiration of that notice. The question, therefore, arises, whether any further agreement was entered into by which this lease was extended. The defendant sets up as his defence that in August, 1902, he and the plaintiff had concluded a lease for a period of two years, to run from the expiration of the then current lease. The question the Court has now to decide is whether the lease alleged by him to have been then entered into was actually made by the parties. The defendant in this case seems to have conducted his business upon very careful business principles. On reference to his letter books, which have been produced, he seems to have gone in for extensive correspondenc on all sorts of transactions, and in this very month of August, when this lease is alleged to have been concluded, a large number of business letters have been posted up in his books. Considering the way the defendant carried on his business, one would have expected that in a matter of such importance as the lease, the arrangement would have been reduced to writing. In regard to the first lease in 1901, it seems that after the contract had been concluded between the parties the defendant was very careful to reduce the transaction to writing, and to send his written acceptance to the plaintiff. That was a very prudent way of doing business, and one would have expected him under ordinary circumstances to have carried out the same practice when he alleged the new contract was agreed upon. However, no document is produced which would constitute proof of any extension of the lease, and the whole case, therefore, depends upon the parole evidence which is produced in Court to-day. Now, I do not absolutely come to the conclusion because there is no document in this case, that it would necessarily follow that this lease was not entered into, but I consider in the absence of documentary evidence, that the burden of proving that such an agreement was entered into certainly lies upon the defendant. Mr. Preswich, the plaintiff's husband, says that in August he began negotiations with reference to the renewal of the lease, because he was quite willing that the defendant should remain in the property, and in his own mind he had decided to leave him in possession for another twelve months at the same rent. He communicated that intention, not in so many words, but generally, by telling Mr. Smith he was prepared to enter into a renewal of the lease. That, he says, was in August. Smith said he would communicate with Koenig. Preswich says that he saw Smith again, and the latter informed him that Mr. Koenig had not made up his mind on the subject; and that, afterwards, in September he met Koenig in the street, and Koenig seemed to be in too great a hurry to enter into any negotiations, much less to enter into any contract on that occasion. There the question was left so far as Mr. Preswich's evidence is concerned. He gives an admission that negotiations had been commenced, but says they had not been concluded. Now we come to the evidence of Smith, and the proof of this contract depends entirely on the evidence of Smith, because it is he who is said to have concluded the contract on behalf of the defendant with Preswich. Mr. Smith tells the Court that he casually met Mr. Preswich in the street, and at that casual meeting he informed him that Mr. Koenig was willing to accept his terms and to continue the lease upon the terms which had been mentioned. Now it would seem that the contract was not to expire until the 8th October, and this interview took place in August, and, as Mr. Smith said, there was really no hurry about the matter being concluded, and I can quite understand that there would be no object on the part of the defendant to conclude this matter finally until the other lease was much nearer its conclusion. But Smith says that, having met Mr. Koenig before this interview in August, Mr. Koenig had instructed him to accept the terms offered by Mr. Preswich. Smith does not thereupon proceed to Mr. Preswich and conclude this contract. He evidently takes no steps to meet Mr. Preswich, but he meets him casually in the street at a time when he was not on his way to see him, and informed him that Mr. Koenig was prepared to accept the terms. I am quite convinced that if instructions had been given to Smith to communicate with Preswich these instructions must necessarily have been in writing. One would expect that if Mr. Koenig spoke to Mr. Smith in his own office and told him to make a communication on a business matter of some importance to Mr. Preswich, he would tell him to put it in writing, or that he would put it himself in writing, and send Mr. Smith not as a casual messenger to deliver a message, but that he might be expected to instruct Mr. Smith to meet Mr. Preswich, take the document, put it in his hands, and so conclude the contract. Under all the circumstances I cannot accept the evidence of Mr. Smith as proof that a contract was concluded by the parties at that interview when he met Mr. Preswich in the street. It is quite probable that the matter was discussed, and I would even go so far as to say that Mr. Smith might have been under the impression that he had gone much nearer to concluding a contract than he had done. On the other hand, it was certainly clear to Mr. Preswich that they did come to anything like concluding the terms of their agreement. Taking the parole evidence of the parties, I think that that interview proves nothing further than that negotiations were being carried on by Mr. Smith and Mr. Preswich, and that no contract was then concluded between Mr. Smith and Mr. Preswich, and that then none exists, because everything depends on what took place in the street. To corroborate the statement of Mr. Smith, we have the evidence of Mr. Koenig that subsequently, having called at his office, Mr. Preswich mentioned the matter, and said that he was glad this contract was concluded. This is denied by Mr. Preswich, but we have this observation made by Mr. Koenig: "I had tried to get the lease cheaper." I am quite sure that this is exactly what he did try to do, and that was probably the cause of the delay during these negotiations, that he was constantly hoping and wishing to get the matter done cheaper, and he had a full opportunity up to the 8th October of getting it done cheaper, and I do not think, having that wish, that he would conclude the bargain in August at a higher rate than he was willing to give, but that he knew that he might keep it open and use pressure on Mr. Preswich until November. Under all the circumstances, I think the matter was kept open, and purposely kept open, by Mr. Koenig, that he was keeping the plaintiff hanging on, and that perhaps he might ultimately have thought he had brought him near enough to constitute a contract. I am of opinion that he did not bring him so far as absolutely to enter into a contract. I think the conduct also of Mr. Preswich absolutely disproves that. Immediately after the expiration of this contract on the 8th October he sets about selling the property, and this proves to my mind that he knew he was running no risk in respect of any agreement or lease that he had entered into, that he was free to sell the property, and that he set about selling it, and that immediately afterwards he gave notice to the defendant that he had disposed of this property. The want of documentary evidence in this case tells very strongly against the defendant's case, and, besides that, the evidence of the witnesses satisfies me that no final contract was ever entered into by the parties for the extension of the lease for two years. As to the question of damages, Sir Henry Juta has said that under the circumstances proved in this case he does not see how he can claim any damages. Under the circumstances the plaintiff will be entitled to an order of ejectment. The only question is as to when that order shall take effect. [After hearing counsel on this point his lordship added:] Defendants will be ordered to give up possession by the end of this month. Defendant will pay costs. Judgment will be given for the defendant on the claim in reconvention.

Mortgage Bond — Registrar of Deeds—Liabilities of joint estate.

C. (married in community of property) had during the lifetime of his deceased spouse raised £600 on mortgage in order to enable him to carry through certain transactions in landed property. C. and his wife had executed a joint will whereby the issue of their marriage were instituted heirs to the entire joint estate subject to a life usufruct to the survivor. After the death of his wife C. endeavoured to pass the said mortgage bond. This the Registrar refused to do without an order of Court. The Court granted the order as prayed.

This was a motion for an order authorizing the Registrar of Deeds to register a certain mortgage bond.

The petition of George Paul Claassen, G.P.Son, was as follows:—

1. Your petitioner is the surviving spouse of and the executor testamentary in the estate of the late Martha M. Claassen, born Terblans, to whom he was married in community of property, and died on August 16, 1902.

2. During the lifetime of petitioner's said spouse, viz., on May 2, 1901, the petitioner bought from A. Stusser and Co., the following landed property, viz.: (a) 1-24th part, or share of, and in a certain piece of perpetual quitrent land, situate in the division of Oudtshoorn, being lot J.L. of the remaining extent of lot B of the farm "Goedeverwachting." (b) Certain 1-24th, or share of, and in a certain piece of perpetual quitrent land, situate as above, being lot J.D., as above.

3. On the same day the petitioner also purchased from Stephanus L. Fourie, married in community of property to Johanna H. I. C. Claassen, 1-24th part, or share of, and in the said lots J.H., and J.D., for the sum of £1,000.

4. On the same day the petitioner sold to the said A. Stusser and Co., certain 3-16th parts, or shares, in each of the said lots J.L. and J.D., for £1,000.

5. At the time of the said purchases and sale there existed on the property sold by the petitioner to the said A. Stusser and Co., a first mortgage for £550 in favour of Ellen Walker, married out of community of property to Alexander Walker.

6. At the same time aforesaid in order to pay off the aforesaid mortgage so as to give transfer to the said A. Stusser and Co., of the property sold to them, the petitioner arranged with them that they should lend him £600 on first mortgage of the property purchased by him, viz., the property described in paragraphs 2 and 3 hereof.

7. The said sum was duly advanced to the petitioner by the said A. Stusser and Co., petitioner accordingly on June 12, 1901, executed the power of attorney to pass a bond in their favour. In the said "power" to pass the bond 1-24th and 1-12th of the lots J.H. and J.D., mentioned in paragraphs 2 and 3 hereof are combined and quoted as ½ part, or share of, and in each of the said lots.

8. The petitioner accordingly paid off the aforesaid mortgage bond of £550, which was due to the said Ellen Walker, and the same has been cancelled.

9. The said bond was paid off out of the £600, advanced by the said A. Stusser and Co., and the balance of £50 of the said advance was applied by petitioner towards payment of the arrear interest on the bond for £550 costs of cancellation thereof, transfer duty on the properties purchased by him, and other expenses incidental to the taking of transfer.

10. On June 20, 1901, that is subsequent to the above transactions, and to the signing of the abovementioned power of attorney to pass bond, the petitioner executed a joint will with his now deceased spouse, Martha M. Claassen (born Terblans), whereby all the landed property of their joint estate, which comprises the properties mentioned in paragraphs 2 and 3 hereof, is bequeathed to their sons, of whom there are five, subject to a life usufruct in favour of the survivor of them.

11. Before the transfers of the above described properties, and the mortgage bond aforesaid, could be put through, the petitioner's said spouse died, and their joint will was filed with the Master of the Supreme Court.

12. According to the account of the liquidation and distribution of the moveable property belonging to the joint estate of the petitioner and his said deceased spouse, filed on December 16, 1902, the balance of the proceeds of such movables available for distribution amounted to £61 0s. 7d., whereof one-half, or £30 10s. 4d., is the property of the four daughters of your petitioner and his said spouse, the other moiety, or £30 10s. 3d., is the property of the petitioner, and he has no other means wherewith to repay to the said A. Stusser and Co., the said sum of £600 advanced by them to him.

13. Subsequent to the death of the petitioner's said spouse he endeavoured to effect the transfers and mortgage aforesaid in terms of the agreements concluded previous to her death, but the Registrar, while allowing the transfers of the properties to be passed, refuses to allow the mortgage bond aforesaid to be passed by the petitioner in favour of the said A. Stusser and Co., unless authorized thereto by an order of Your Honourable Court; on the ground that on the death of the petitioner's said spouse the property now sought to be mortgaged vested in their joint estate, and is bequeathed under their joint will to their sons aforesaid.

14. The abovementioned purchases, sale and loan on mortgage were all arranged simultaneously and formed one single transaction, and as the Registrar refuses to register the said bond for £600 the petitioner is compelled to make this application.

Wherefore the petitioner prays for an order authorizing the Registrar of Deeds, at Cape Town, to register a mortgage bond for £600 to be passed by the petitioner in favour of the said A. Stusser and Co., whereby the property described in paragraphs 2 and 3 hereof will be hypothecated.

The Master's report was as follows:—"So far as I have been able to ascertain the facts are correctly stated in the petition, and the power of attorney to pass bond is annexed in support thereof. The £600 for which authority is now asked to pass a bond on the property bequeathed to the sons is a liability of the joint estate, and I think the application of the petitioner should be granted.

On the motion of Mr. Alexander the Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Walker and Jacobsohn.]

Ex parte FATAAR.

Mr. Alexander moved to make absolute a rule nisi authorising the Master to pay out certain money. Counsel said the respondent had now returned to her husband, and the parties seemed now to have composed their differences. He therefore only asked for the costs of the motion.

An order on respondent to pay costs was granted.

Ex parte ROSSOUW

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the appointment of a curator ad litem to petitioner's husband, who had been removed to Robben Island as a leper, and who was further alleged to be of unsound mind.

Granted, Mr. De Waal being appointed curator.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

Ex parte WILSON. { 1903. Mar. 17th.

Mr. Benjamin, on behalf of the petitioner, Harriet Ann Wilson (born Rodgers), applied, as a matter of urgency, for an interdict to restrain the respondent, John Edwin Wilson, from disposing of certain property. The petitioner's affidavit stated that they were married in community of property at Claremont, in the Cape Division. Owing to his treatmen she had had to leave her husband and go and live with her brother. She wished for a separation. Her husband possessed certain property in Second Avenue, Kenilworth, and petitioner was informed and had reason to believe that he was disposing of the property.

Rule granted calling upon the respondent to show cause on the 14th April why an interdict should not be granted as prayed, the rule to operate as an interdict in the meantime.

Postea (April 15). The Court refused to make the rule absolute, but ordered the respondent to pay to the applicant £50 to enable her to institute an action if so advised.

Re THE ESTATE OF SHARP AND HILL

Mr. Gardiner said that as a matter of some urgency he wished to apply for the appointment of a provisional trustee in the insolvent estate of John Healy Sharp and Walter Burnett Hill, trading under the style of Sharp and Hill. Many small debts were due to the estate, and it was highly desirable in the interests of all concerned that the perishable assets should be disposed of, and the debts collected as speedily as possible. The petitioners, who represented claims against the estate to the amount of £606 out of a total of £1,240, prayed that a provisional trustee should be appointed, and suggested the name of Mr. E. R. Syfret.

An order was granted, with power to sell perishable goods and collect debts, Mr. Syfret being appointed provisional trustee.

HIDDINGH V. EXECUTORS ESTATE HERTZOG.

Will — Allegation of fraud — Pleading.

This was an application on notice calling upon the respondents to show cause why they should not be ordered to give full particulars of the alleged fraud by which a will was said to have been obtained by one Heyer from the late William Frederic Hertzog. The affidavit of the applicant's attorney stated that it was alleged that the late Mr Hertzog was wrongfully and unlawfully induced to sign the said will. He was advised by counsel that it was absolutely impossible with such particulars to know what evidence to call to deal with a charge of fraud. The declaration alleged that Hertzog executed a will in the presence of two attesting witnesses. The applicant maintained that this will was the valid will of the late Mr. Hertzog. The respondents in their first plea denied that it was a valid will, and they had an alternative plea in which they said that the late William Frederic Hertzog did not knowingly sign the said will, but that he was wrongfully, unlawfully, and by fraud of the said Heyer induced to sign the said document, and that the said Mr. Hertzog signed the document without comprehending the nature and terms thereof.

The affidavit of Mr. Van Zyl, of the firm of Van Zyl and Buissinne, attorneys for the respondents, stated that one of the witnesses to the said will was the said Albert Edward Heyer, who was charged at the last Criminal Sessions with the crime of concealing and stealing the will of the said Mr. Hertzog, and who was found guilty of the said crime.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for applicant): In the plea there is an allegation that this will was obtained by fraud; the nature of the fraud, however, is not disclosed, and it is therefore impossible to say what evidence we should call.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What more do you want?]

We want to know the nature of the fraud.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems to me that they say that the testator signed this will not knowing its contents.]

The plea rather suggests that this will was not signed voluntarily, but, if fraud is alleged, we are entitled to know the nature of the fraud, otherwise at the trial some surprise or other may be sprung upon us.

Mr. Upington (for defendants). The words of the plea are perfectly clear. We say that Hertzog signed this document, not knowing what it was. We are not bound to disclose our defence. If our plea is bad, it is for the other side to object and have the vague and embarrassing portions struck out. Rule 330g., Pattison v. McLaughlan (Buch., 1876, p. 82.)

Sir H. Juta (in reply). The plea may be good enough, but we are entitled to ask for particulars, and they have been asked for, and ordered in previous cases. We are not asking for their evidence. If we had said that the plea was embarrassing it would have amounted to much the same thing.

De Villiers, C.J.: If it were impossible to do justice between the parties without fuller particulars than are now indicated in the plea, I should think the Court would have the power to order the plea to be expunged unless such fuller particulars are added. To my mind, however, the plea objected to fairly states the grounds of the defence—"The said William Frederic Hertzog did not sign the document freely and voluntarily." The defendant has only to call his witnesses to prove that Hertzog did sign freely and voluntarily. Then the plea goes on, "but was wrongfully, unlawfully, and by fraud of the said Heyer induced to sign the said will, and the said Hertzog signed the said will without comprehending the nature and terms thereof." I confess I cannot see what more need be said. There is the illustration given that the man might have been drugged, but I do not gather from this plea that there is any suggestion of that kind. My opinion is that this plea is quite sufficient for the plaintiff's purposes, and that the application should be refused. As to the costs of the application, possibly when the case comes to trial and the Court sees what the nature of the case is, it may turn out that the plea should have been more fully stated, but as at present advised it seems to me quite sufficient to enable the plaintiff to prepare his case. The application will be refused, but the costs of the application will be costs in the cause.

GOUS AND ANOTHER V. LOCHNER AND ANOTHER.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs for a rule nisi restraining an auctioneer from parting with the proceeds of the sale of certain lands at Somerset Strand to be made absolute. Mr. Searle, K.C., was for the plaintiff, and the defendant was represented by Sir H. Juta.

The Chief Justice made an order declaring the rule absolute, costs of the application to be costs in the cause.

HARTMAN V. DART. { 1903. Mar. 17th.

Hire of premises—Use of signboard

This was an application for an order for the removal of a certain signboard, fixed by the defendant on certain premises rented from defendant.

The applicant's case was that in December last he entered into a lease with the defendant for the rental of a portion of the premises, 128, Longmarket-street, for a period of five years. The respondent had wrongfully and unlawfully, and without his (plaintiff's) consent, attached a signboard bearing his name and style of business to a partition to the rooms, leaving him (plaintiff) no room on which to place a signboard regarding his business, and thus causing him great inconvenience and annoyance and loss. Customers were apt to think that the premises had been vacated by plaintiff, and that they were in the occupation of the respondent.

The respondent's case was that he sub-let to the applicant a portion of the premises on the ground floor. He admitted that he had attached a signboard to the partition adjoining the room that he occupied, as well as the entrance to the room occupied by the applicant. He admitted that he had declined to remove the said notice board, but he denied that he had committed a trespass. The applicant never claimed any right to or control over the said partition when the said room was sub-let to him. Respondent contended that the partition was part of the premises over which the applicant had no control.

Mr. Gardiner (for applicant.) The letter constituting the contract of lease states that the property was let "as occupied by me." At that time the signboard was not up, and we are entitled to have the use of that partition. We have exhibited our wares on that partition, and I submit that we are legally entitled to the use of the whole partition.

Mr. Buchanan (for respondent). The applicant ask for what is practically a declaration of rights, and tries to give evidence on affidavit that he has been occupying these premises by hanging out mats and so forth.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But he hired the premises.]

Yes, but he did not occupy them. What the parties meant was that the premises were to be let as they were, and, if they were abandoned, they were to be abandoned as they were. Hart was willing not only to pay his rent, but to pay half of applicant's lease, so he did not get everything in his own favour. The words "portion of ground floor as at present occupied by you," do not give the applicant exclusive rights to the ground floor.

Mr. Gardiner was not called upon in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: It appears to me that the applicant is entitled to succeed in this case. The respondent admits that, as to the ground floor, he sublet to the applicant that part of the ground floor at that time occupied by the applicant. I am quite satisfied that the part of the ground floor at that time occupied by Hartman was the whole of that ground floor, with the exception of the small portico at the street entrance, but that as to the partition it was in the occupation of Hartman. Zipp, who occupied Dart's place, it is true, had his name where the signboard is now, but both Zipp and Dart stated that this was done with the consent of Hartman. That in itself is proof of the occupation by Hartman. I think that, in regard to that partition, Hartman has as much right to the use of it as he has to the other little partition from the street to the entrance of his shop. I can quite understand that anyone coming into the street and seeing the signboard with Dart's name on would come to the conclusion that it is Dart's shop on the other side. Clearly that must be the conclusion, and it seems to me quite inconsistent with the subletting by Dart to Hartman that Dart should now appropriate to himself the partition which forms part of the premises occupied by Hartman. Applicant is certainly entitled, in my opinion, to place his own name upon the signboard. It is said that application should not be made by motion, but, if the facts are not in dispute, the Court can dispose of the matter as well by motion as by action. But I would really suggest that it is not a matter worth fighting about. I would suggest that Hartman should now allow Dart to appropriate portion of the partition with a sign board pointing out where Dart's business is, and another indicating where Hartman's is. That could only be done with the consent of Hartman, but I doubt not he will consent to this course in order to avoid further litigation. However, as the case presents itself to me the applicant is entitled to succeed. The application will therefore be granted with costs, with leave to the respondent to bring his action to have the order discharged.

EXECUTORS OF ESTATE RHODES v. GAMBLE. { 1903. Mar. 17th.

Interdict—Evidence—Affidavits.

In an application for an interdict to restrain the lessee of a farm from keeping an excessive number of animals on such farm, there should be clear evidence that the number of animals is excessive, and for that purpose the area and capacity of the farm should be stated, and, if possible, the purposes for which it had been leased.

This was a motion on notice calling upon the respondent to show cause why he should not be interdicted from keeping an excessive number of animals on a certain farm situated on the Wynberg Flats, leased by the late C. J. Rhodes to the respondent; and also to show cause why he should not be restrained from cutting down trees on the farm. It was alleged that the respondent allowed about 500 sheep to run on the farm, contrary to an agreement made when the lease was entered into to the effect that respondent would not allow more than about 30 head of stock to run on the farm. It was stated on affidavit that respondent had since admitted this agreement. It was further alleged that the respondent had, in violation of the terms of the lease, cut down certain trees and sold the wood.

The respondent's brother made affidavit to the effect that respondent was away, and could not be advised of the present motion in time to make a replying affidavit. The deponent produced certain correspondence with the late C. J. Rhodes relating to the tenancy of the farm, and denied that the farm was used for any purpose for which it was not let. As for the trees, none has been cut down since July, 1902, excepting such as were decayed and such as were obstructions. Deponent alleged that the present proceedings were brought in order to compel respondent to vacate the farm so that it might be sold immediately in building lots.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for applicants). Gamble has cut down and sold large quantities of wood; and he had no right to do this.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no evidence as to the quantity of wood he might cut.]

No, but he had no right to cut wood for sale; nor had he any right to take other people's stock on the farm, and so deteriorate it. Gamble's brother (who at first claimed to be a sub-tenant of Gamble) was the first to over-stock the farm. We now ask for an interdict to restrain respondent from cutting timber and from over-stocking, pending an action to be brought.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You cannot restrain altogether from cutting timber, and the common law does not allow them to over-stock.]

That is so, and, of course, the interdict would be only declaratory of the common law. The farm cannot support more than 20 head of stock. As the respondent's affidavit does not deny the affidavit of Mr. Syfret it must be taken that they admit it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the nature of the farm?]

It is purely agricultural.

Mr. Buchanan (for respondent): We have no evidence as to the nature of the farm. As to the affidavits, the respondent is not to be taken to have admitted an allegation, because he does not specifically deny it. In order to obtain an interdict the applicants must show a clear right, and I submit they have not done so.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You have no right to run an excessive number of stock.]

There is no proof that we are doing so. Half of the farm is pastural. We deny that all these sheep were placed in one paddock.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What do you say about the trees?]

We deny having cut any since July, 1902. No complaints were made till January 14, 1903, and then the applicants seem to have become very anxious to get Gamble out of the farm. They had sold it, and, therefore, wished to get rid of their tenant.

Sir H. Juta (in reply).

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an application to restrain respondent from keeping an excessive number of animals on the farm Bamboesvlei, and from cutting wood and trees on the farm. I must say that the evidence in support of the application is extremely meagre. There is no statement in any affidavit as to what would be a proper number of animals having regard to the size and capacity of the farm, and the Court does not know what the farm was originally let for, whether for agricultural or pastoral purposes. To give an interdict restraining respondent from keeping an excessive number of animals in the farm would be wholly useless, because, unless a number were fixed, there would be no hold on the respondent. It would be impossible to say there had been a disobedience of the order of Court if the respondent continued to keep the present number. In fact the Court does not know how many there are at present. It is said that there are approximately 500, but there is no proof that 500 is an excessive number. Then, I do not consider, in the absence of evidence, that the mere keeping of sheep upon land intended for ploughing would injure the land. But, at the same time I must indicate this to the respondent, that in my opinion he should not be allowed to keep more than the farm, having regard to its size, and all the circumstances, was capable of containing. Then, in regard to cutting wood and trees, upon this point also the evidence is not clear. There is no evidence that the wood which was cut down was removed from the place, or that the wood was of such kind as the respondent was not justified in cutting. There is not sufficient evidence before the Court to justify the granting of an interdict. At the same time, as to the question of costs, I am not prepared to say that the application should be refused with costs. It is quite possible that when the case comes on for trial it may appear that more damage was done than clearly appeared at present. The question of costs will therefore abide the result of the action.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

ZFAS v. LEVITON. { 1903. Mar. 18th.

Mr. Benjamin applied for an order dissolving the partnership existing between Max Zfas and Jacob and Elias Leviton, and for the appointment of a liquidator.

Mr. Upington appeared on behalf of the respondents.

From the affidavits it appeared that the parties agreed upon a dissolution. Applicant, however, wanted Mr. Joseph Jacobson, of Burghersdorp, who had acted as his attorney, appointed liquidator, while respondents suggested Mr. Hardwick Andrews, deputy sheriff of Albert. Applicant alleged that Mr. Andrews had been consulted by respondents, but this was denied.

The case was ordered to stand over until to-morrow, in order that counsel might consult the attorneys as to the appointment of a liquidator.

Postea (March 20). The Court granted judgment in terms of a consent paper appointing F. R. Tennant, of Burghersdorp, as liquidator.

Ex parte WOODMAN AND ANOTHER. { 1903. Mar. 18th.

This was an application by one John Woodman on behalf of his minor children for leave to sell certain landed property situate at Wynberg to one Lydia L. Gomez. His married daughter Johanna C. Pinto joined in the petition. It appeared that certain landed property with a house thereon had been transferred to the second petitioner, which property was entirely surrounded by other private property, so that all access to a public road was cut off. The aforesaid Lydia C. Gomez (an adjoining proprietor) was willing, however, to grant to the said minors a passage across her ground on condition of her receiving transfer of 85 square roods and 24 square feet of land from the second petitioner.

The Master's report was favourable, and on the motion of Mr. Russell, the Court granted an order in terms of the report.

Ex parte THE PORT ELIZABETH TOWN COUNCIL.

Mr. Russell moved for an order cancelling the sale of certain property. The circumstances were that, in 1861, the property in question was sold to one C. Green for £38 odd, for which sum Green gave three promissory notes. Of these the amounts of two had been paid, but the third had not been, and there was still owing to the Town Council the sum of £9 in respect of the purchase, with interest thereon from April, 1861. The lots had never been transferred.

A rule was granted, calling upon C. Green and all parties concerned to show cause on the 14th April why the order prayed for should not be granted, the rule to be published once in two Port Elizabeth papers.

Ex parte WATSON AND ANOTHER. { 1903. Mar. 18th.

This was an application for leave to purchase a property in the name of Charles T. G. Watson, who had been declared to be of unsound mind, and was detained in the Valkenberg Asylum. The petitioners were Susan M. Watson (the wife of C. T. G. Watson) and Paul J. van Collar, curators bonis to the estate of C. T. G. Watson. The said curators had paid into the Master's hands a sum of about £13,000 on account of the estate, and now asked that the first named petitioner might be allowed to purchase a house within the Cape Peninsula as a place of residence for herself and her children for £2,500, to be deducted from the said £13,000. The reasons assigned for the application were: (1) that the first petitioner might have greater facilities for visiting her husband; (2) and for the education of her minor child.

The Master recommended that the prayer of the petition be granted, and that he should be authorised to pay such sum as might be required for the purchase of a house, costs of transfer, and of the present application: such sum not to exceed in all £2,500.

On the motion of Mr. Russell, the Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

[Applicants' Attorney: G. Trollip.]

Ex parte BLIGNAUT AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Close applied for an order authorising the Master to pay out certain money for the maintenance and education of a minor.

Granted.

Ex parte STRASSBERG.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to amend certain title deeds, in which the name of the petitioner had been incorrectly stated.

Granted.

Ex parte VAN HUYSSTEEN. { 1903. Mar. 18th.

This was an application on behalf of one Daniel Petrus Simeon van Huyssteen for an order authorising the transfer of certain landed property situate in the division of Knysna to one Aaron Toplis.

The facts stated in the petition sufficiently appear from the Master's report, which reads as follows:—

"The petitioner liquidated his wife's estate, but in terms of the joint will by them executed remained in possession of the landed property which devolved from his deceased's wife's father's estate. After petitioner had liquidated his wife's estate he purchased the share of another heir in the estate of his wife's parents. An application was then made to this Hon. Court (Motions 63-1897) to consolidate the shares in several properties so that each owner should come into possession of an appreciable share in one farm; which application was granted. At the same time that this exchange was going on petitioner sold ½ of Lot A of the property named Gansevlei, belonging to the joint estate, and ½ of his own share in Lot A acquired after his wife's death. He held similarly the estate half and himself the other half in the remaining extent, of equal value with Lot A. He now applies that the remaining half of his own half share in the remaining extent subsequently purchased be substituted for the half share of Lot A in the joint estate sold by him, both being of about the same value. He also offers to transfer now to the minors the shares in the farms 'Welkom' and 'Matthys Bosch,' standing in his name, which would be of greater value than the share in Lot A sold by him. It would distinctly be to the advantage of the children to grant the application on condition that transfer be passed to them at once."

On the motion of Mr. P. S. T. Jones, the Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

[Applicants' Attorneys: Fairbridge, Arderne and Lawton.]

Ex parte MICKLEM.

This was an application by one Nathaniel Micklem to have a rule nisi made absolute. From the original petition, it appeared that on June 27, 1900, one Thomas Micklem, of Stellenbosch, passed a bond in favour of the petitioner for £1,000. This bond, having been lost or mislaid, the petitioner prayed for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to issue a certified copy of the said bond. The rule nisi granted on February 28, calling upon all persons concerned to show cause on March 12, 1903, why an order should not be granted as prayed, was made absolute on the motion of Mr. Russell.

Ex parte LABUSCHAGNE.

Mr. P. S. T. Jones moved for the appointment of a curator bonis for the petitioner's father, F. J. Labuschagne, who was certified to be of impaired intellect.

The Court declared the respondent to be incapable of managing his own affairs, and appointed Johannes Nicholas Labuschagne curator.

KLEYNHANS V. KLEYNHANS.

This was an application upon notice of motion calling upon respondent to show cause why he should not be ordered to contribute the sum of £50 to enable applicant to institute an action for divorce on the ground of adultery, and why he should not be interdicted from disposing of property, pending the result of the action. Petitioner said she was married in community of property to respondent on the 7th August, 1883, and there were eight children of the marriage, of whom seven were still alive. She alleged that in July, 1892, and at other times, respondent committed adultery with a coloured woman employed in the house. The parties resided at Riversdale. Applicant had no money to carry on the action.

Respondent denied the allegations of adultery, and said that since the date of the alleged adultery petitioner had cohabited with him. He said that petitioner had led him an unhappy life, and that the application for divorce was vexatious and unfounded.

The Court made an order on respondent to pay £20, costs to stand over.

Ex parte GRESSE.

This was an application for leave to sell certain property. From the petition of Heilejo Z. E. Cresse, the applicant, it appeared that she was the surviving spouse and executrix testamentary of the late Lodewijk F. S. Gresse, and that a mutual will ,executed by the petitioner and her late husband provided that the surviving spouse should be sole heir of the first dying, provision was made for the distribution of certain portions of the landed estate on the death of the survivor, and certain other landed property was bequeathed to one C. Ford, the adopted son of the testators. The survivor, however, was to remain in the undisturbed possession of the whole of the joint estate until his or her death, before which time it was directed that no distribution should take place. Some 3,000 morgen of the testator's farm was specifically bequeathed to the said C. Ford, and as the said C. Ford has incurred heavy debts by improving the said property, which debts he is unable to repay, and for which the petitioner is surety and co-principal debtor, she is desirous of selling the whole farm (including Ford's portion), in order to pay off these debts. A favourable opportunity now offers of doing this, and Ford consents to the sale.

On the motion of Mr. P. S. Jones, the Court granted an order as prayed.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Fairbridge, Arderne, and Lawton:]

Ex parte ROSENBERG AND ANOTHER.

This was an application for leave to execute an ante-nuptial contract.

The petition of Max Rosenberg and his wife Lefray H. Rosenberg, showed that they were domiciled within this colony, and had, prior to their marriage agreed to be married by ante-nuptial contract. With a view to this being done, the first petitioner obtained from his attorney a printed form of an ante-nuptial contract. The second petitioner accompanied her father to England, where it had been arranged that the marriage should be solemnised. The first petitioner followed them shortly after, but forgot to take the aforesaid form of ante-nuptial contract with him. He consulted an English attorney, but, not being able to instruct him properly, a defective form of ante-nuptial contract was drawn up and signed. The petitioners now prayed for leave to execute an ante-nuptial contract in due form, embodying all the provisions which they had intended to embody.

On the motion of Mr. Benjamin, the Court granted an order as prayed, saving the rights of creditors which might have accrued prior to the registration of the contract.

Ex parte MATHEE.

This was an application for leave to sell certain erven situate at Humansdorp, the property of Aletta A. Matthee, a minor. The petitioner was one Louisa Margaret Mathee (born Dassonville), and married without community of property to one Elias Matthee. The petitioner had purchased the property in question in the early part of 1889, for her eldest daughter (the said Aletta A. Matthee), and the petitioner duly took transfer of the same in trust for her said minor daughter. Since the date of purchase, the said property had been lying waste, but several offers have recently been made to petitioner for the purchase of the same.

The Master recommended that the petition be granted on condition that the proceeds be paid into the Guardians' Fund until the minor attains her majority.

On the motion of Mr. Benjamin, the Court granted an order in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte MANNING AND ANOTHER.

This was an application for an order authorising the Master to pay out certain monies.

The petition of Benjamin Manning, of Mowbray, and James Dodd, of Stellenbosch, showed (1) That they were the executors testamentary of the estate of the late Phœbe Williams Lucas, widow of Joseph B. Lucas, the tutors testamentary to their minor children, A. P. Lucas, F. R. Lucas, and E. J. Lucas; (2) that the following monies stood to the credit of the said minors in the Guardians' Fund, viz., to A. P. Lucas, £432 4s. 1d., to F. R. Lucas, £405 7s. 8d., and to E. J. Lucas, £402 0s. 2d., on which interest at the rate of 4 per cent. is being paid for the maintenance of the said minors; (3) that this sum was wholly insufficient for that purpose; (4) that the claims of creditors against the said minors for maintenance, education, etc., amounted to £162 10s. 2d. (as per accounts annexed), which sum the petitioners were unable to pay out of the income derived from the said minors' portions; (5) that in order to maintain the said minors in a proper and efficient manner, the sum of £6 per month each, from January 1, 1904, would have to be drawn from the capital of each child's portion.

Wherefore the petitioners prayed for an order authorising the Master to pay out the said sum of £162 10s. 2d., and to pay the sum of £6 per month from January 1, 1904.

The Master recommended that the petition be granted.

On the motion of Mr. Russell, an order was granted accordingly.

[Applicants' Attorney: G. Trollip.]

Ex parte SCHEEPERS.

This was an application for leave to sell certain properties at Oudtshoorn, in which certain minors were interested, by public auction.

The petitioner was one Anna M. Scheepers (born Schoeman), surviving spouse and executrix testamentary of the estate of the late Gideon J. H. Scheepers, who married her in community of property. The petitioner and her late husband had executed a joint will, and two of the legatees under this will were minors at the date of the present application. In accordance with the provisions of the said will, the petitioner realised the immovable properties therein described by public auction, but the proceeds were insufficient to pay the debts of the joint estate, and petitioner raised £600 upon mortgage on the rest of the immovable properties, in addition to a then already existing mortgage of £1,100, which still left a deficiency of £36 19s. 3d. The said mortgages were still in existence, and the petitioner had enjoyed, and was continuing to enjoy, the usufruct of the said properties, and was paying the interest on the mortgage debt. The petitioner stated that she found that the income derived from the farming of the said land was insufficient to pay rates and taxes, on the property, interest on mortgage bonds, and to support herself and children. Many of the neighbouring proprietors possessed copious supplies of water, and would therefore be able to cultivate petitioner's land to much greater advantage than she could possibly do. The major legatees all consented to the sale.

Wherefore the petitioner prayed for an order authorising the sale of the properties in question.

The Master's report recommended that the application be granted on condition that the balance of the estate be invested, reserving the right of petitioner to draw the interest during her lifetime.

On the motion of Mr. Buchanan, an order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Tredgold, McIntyre, and Bissett.]

Ex parte KOK.

Minors—Age of childbearing—Distribution of Estate.

A testatrix had bequeathed certain immovable property "to the male children of her son G. begotten and to be begotten from his present marriage." The testatrix had died and G. had had 8 children born to him as issue of the said marriage. He was now 56 and his wife 52 years of age. No children had been born to them during the previous eleven years and a medical certificate showed that there was no probability of further issue. G. as executor of his late mother's estate now asked for an order authorizing the Registrar of Deeds to pass transfer to each of his male children of his portion of the bequest. The Court granted an order as prayed.

This was an application for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to register certain landed property. From the petition of the applicant (Gerhardus S. Kok, of Quacha, Hümansdorp), it appeared that the petitioner was the executor of his late mother, the widow of G. S. Kok, sen., to whom she had been married in community of property. That at the time of her death certain landed property (fully described in the petition) stood registered in her name, a portion of which (fully described) she bequeathed to "the male children of her son Gideon J Kok, begotten and to be begotten from his present marriage" subject to the payment to the female children of the said G. J. Kok, within 12 months of the death of the testator £100 jointly, and in equal shares. That the said G. J. Kok and his wife Hester J. Kok were still living, and were aged 56 and 52 years respectively, and that eight children have been born of their marriage, who have paid the £100 named in the will to the female heirs, and also transfer and succession duty due in respect of the property transferred to them. That in view of the fact that petitioner's wife was then 52 years of age: that no child had been born to them during the 11 years, and that the family doctor of the petitioner by certificate, annexed testifies that there is no probability of further issue: the petitioner prayed for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to transfer to his said children the landed property bequeathed to them by his late mother.

The Master reported that there appeared to be no objection to petitioner's application being granted.

On the motion of Mr. Benjamin the Court granted an order as prayed.

STORK V. STORK. { 1903. Mar 18th.

Edictal citation—Court of Chief Magistrate of Griqualand East.

The Court of the Chief Magistrate has no power or authority to direct service of process on a defendant by edictal citation.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Assistant Chief Magistrate of Griqualand East.

The appellant had applied in the Court of the Chief Magistrate for leave to sue his wife (who had gone to Natal) by edictal citation for divorce on the ground of her adultery. It was argued for the applicant (John D. Stork) in the Court below that on several previous occasions the Chief Magistrate had issued edictal citations. The Court, however, decided that the application should remain in abeyance until the Attorney-General's opinion on the point should be obtained.

Postea (December 5). Applicant's agent was informed by the Court that as the Attorney-General was of opinion that the Court of a Chief Magistrate had no power to summon by edict the application must be dismissed. J. D. Stork now appealed against this decision.

Mr. Upington (for appellant): See paragraphs 23 and 31 to 33 of Proclamation 110, of 1879. Re Estate Dugdale (5, E.D.C., 96), shows that the limitation of the second section of the Transkeian Annexation Act (38 of 1877) as to Acts of the Colonial Parliament not extending to the Transkei, does not exclude ordinances enacted before the establishment of the Colonial Parliament from extending to and being in force in the said territory. See also Reed v. Turner (1, Roscoe, 220). There it is decided that if a general jurisdiction in any certain matter is given to a Magistrate, that jurisdiction is not confined within territorial limits. If the Chief Magistrate has jurisdiction over all matrimonial causes he must have the power necessary for the exercise of that jurisdiction, and I submit that among these powers must be that of granting leave to sue by edictal citation.

The respondent was in default.

De Villiers, C.J.: The procedure by edictal citation is a survival of the practice of the Dutch times. When the Charter of Justice was brought into operation in this colony, rules of Court were framed, but these rules of Court were silent as to the process of edictal citation, which, has, however, continued in operation up to the present time. The first reference in the rules of Court to edictal citation that I am aware of is to be found in the 273rd Rule of Court, passed in 1874, but before the date the practise had, I understand, been adopted in the Eastern Districts Court and High Court of Griqualand, as well as in the Supreme Court. It is now proposed to extend the power of suing by edictal citation to the Chief Magistrates' Courts. In my opinion, this claim cannot be admitted. In order to ascertain the powers of the Chief Magistrates' Courts, we have to refer to the Acts by which these Courts are constituted. There is nothing in any of the sections which have been read by Mr. Upington which conferred any power on the Chief Magistrates to issue edictal citations. They have full power, no doubt, in regard to all questions of marriage and divorce, but the fact that they have such jurisidiction does not affect the question of procedure. In my opinion, the Chief Magistrate, in the absence of special legislative authority given by the Acts constituting these Courts, had no such power, and the Magistrate in the Court below therefore, in my opinion, properly refused to issue this process, and the appeal must be dismissed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

REX V. PARSONS. { 1903. Mar. 19th.

Liquor laws—Holder of licence—Agent—Barman.

The appellant, the holder of a liquor licence, was charged with a contravention of the liquor licence, and the evidence was to the effect that his barman had effected an illicit sale to a native, that the appellant knew natives were trying to get liquor, and that he did nothing to prevent the sale.

Held, that, although the appellant was not present at the sale, he was rightly convicted.

This was an appeal against a conviction by the R.M. of Mount Ayliff.

The appellant, Wm. Parsons, of the Mount Ayliff Hotel, had been convicted of the crime of contravening section 30 of the Proclamation 255 of 1900, in that he did "wrongfully and unlawfully sell, give, supply, or deliver a certain quantity of liquor, to wit, a glass of brandy, to Macadosie, a native, the said native not having produced a permit to obtain such intoxicating liquor as required by section 29." The appellant was sentenced to a fine of £50, or in default three months' imprisonment.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for the appellant): The summons was faulty. Under section 30, the offence was handing liquor to a native who had a permit, but which permit was not handed over to the dealer who was to transmit it to the Magistrate. The other section, 29, made it an offence to supply liquor to a native who had not got a permit. The summons was wrong in that it put a number of words into the summons which were not in the section. The proceedings again had been taken under the wrong section, and should have been instituted under section 29. There is no evidence that Parsons was managing this business. Under the Licensing Act, two persons cannot hold a licence, and therefore, if the licence was given to Matthews, Parsons could not have it too. Parsons was not responsible, and ought not to have been summoned.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown): See Rex v. Phillips (11 Shiel, 205). It is clear that the barman had authority to sell during the absence of the holder of the licence. The onus of proof in such a case is on the holder of the licence, and the argument of appellant's counsel falls to the ground. See Queen v. Murtha (3 H.C., 15 and 157). Presumably a man in charge of a bar acts with his principal's full instructions, and the principal is responsible.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): According to counsel for the Crown, one person may be responsible for the conduct of a licensed business at one time, and somebody else at another time. That would lead to endless confusion. If a licence is temporarily transferred, the fact that the original holder comes back does not re-invest him with responsibility. Again, on the day in question Parsons told Matthews not to open the bar, as "traps" who had been convicted of perjury were hanging about. I submit that the appellant's conviction was bad.

De Villiers, C.J.: The first objection to the decision of the Magistrate is that the accused has been charged with contravening the wrong section of the Proclamation, namely, the 30th instead of the 29th. The two sections are very closely allied, and in this very charge against the accused the offence is distinctly stated that he did sell, give, supply, or deliver, or cause to be sold, given, supplied, or delivered a certain quantity of intoxicating liquor, to wit, one glass of brandy, to Macadosie, a native, the said Macadosie not having produced a permit to obtain such intoxicating liquor as "required by section 29 of the Proclamation aforesaid." It appears to me, seeing that the substance of the offence is correctly stated, and the 29th section is mentioned in this charge, that the accused would not be in any way prejudiced by the additional reference to the 30th instead of the 29th section of the Proclamation. A further objection has been raised that words are in the summons which are not in the Proclamation "that he caused to be sold, given, supplied, or delivered." They may be superfluous words, but they do not in any way invalidate the summons. So much for the objections in point of form. As to the more substantial objections, I am not prepared to hold where a licensed person expressly prohibits his barman from selling illicitly and takes all the necessary steps to prevent it, that he would be liable in case his barman does not follow his instruction and sells the liquor. But that point does not arise now, because upon the evidence I am not at all satisfied that there was such a prohibition on the part of the appellant. Sir Henry Juta relies upon the 16th section of the Proclamation, which provides that "in case of the absence of the holder of the licence his business may be carried on by arrangement duly approved of in writing by the Resident Magistrate without any formal transfer of the licence, and thereupon such agent shall in the absence of such holder of the licence possess all the rights and be subject and liable to all the duties and obligations of the original holder of the licence." It appears that on the day when this liquor sale to a native took place the accused was not absent. He was at Mount Ayliff at the time, and had been there for some time, owing, as he says, to an accident to his foot. He was there on that date, and this transfer, this temporary transfer under the 16th section, is to be valid only during the absence of such holder of the licence. According to the accused himself he was not absent on that day; he says, "I was here on the 23rd December, I remember, Tuesday, the 23rd December, I particularly advised Mr. Matthews not to go to the bar on that date." So that he was not only present, but he was giving advice to Mr. Matthews. I should have thought, if he was afraid that Mr. Matthews would on that date sell liquor to natives, that instead of advising Matthews not to go on that day he would have prohibited him from going, so that it would have been impossible to say that there was any contravention of the law He says, "I do not know anything about the alleged liquor selling on the 23rd: two or three of the natives were worrying round to get liquor." Knowing that they were worrying about on that date he simply advised his barman not to go on that day. Then he says, "I have given him notice to leave," and he proceeds, "There are two keys to the bar, I keep one and Matthews keeps the other; I come to the bar and help myself to what I require in Matthews' presence." That does not look like a man who is absent entirely, and who leaves the management to the agent. There is no proof of accused having done everything that he could do to prevent the liquor selling on that date He knew there was a danger of its being done because he says natives were about worrying for liquor, but he leaves the matter entirely in the hands of this agent, and he seems to have told the barman that if he sells to natives he does it entirely on his own responsibility. I am pretty sure I saw that in the evidence.

Sir H. Juta: Matthews says he was not told that; I think the reference is in Matthews' evidence.

The Chief Justice (continuing): Yes, that is how it came to strike me. A question is put to Matthews in examination, and his answer is: "I do not remember Mr. Parsons telling me not to go to the bar on that day. Mr. Parsons did not tell me that if I sold liquor to natives it would be on my own responsibility." However, I leave that out of consideration, because it is possible that the question may not have been put that way, and therefore this answer of Matthews should not affect the case. Quite independently of that answer, and upon the rest of the evidence, I think that the Magistrate was justified in convicting the accused. The appeal must be dismissed.

HAVISIDE V. JORDAN. 1903. Mar. 19th. Apr. 14th.

Redhibitory action — Sale and purchase — Latent defect — Prescription—Pleading—Appeal—Final judgment.

Within seven days after the plaintiff had purchased two oxen from the defendant, they sickened of lungsickness and within three days afterwards they died. The expert evidence shewed that the disease, although latent, had been contracted before date of sale.

Held, that the Magistrate's Court properly decided that the plaintiff was entitled, by means of the redhibitory action to recover back the price he had paid.

The action was instituted more than six months after the date of sale, but no objection was taken on the ground of lapse of time. On appeal to the Chief Magistrate, however, the objection was taken and disallowed on the ground that it ought to have been taken in the lower Court.

Held, that the defence ought to have been raised before final judgment in the lower Court and that, not having been so raised, it could not be raised on appeal.

This was an appeal against a judgment given by the Chief Magistrate of Kokstad. Mr. Benjamin appeared for the appellant, and Mr. Buchanan was for the respondent.

In the Court of the R.M. the plaintiff sued the defendant, firstly, for the refund of £16. the purchase price of two oxen, and, secondly, for £16, the value of one ox, which died from lung sickness, being infected by the other animals. Judgment was given for the amount claimed on the first part of the claim and absolution from the instance was granted in the other part. The plaintiff's case was that he purchased two oxen from the defendant, the animals being guaranteed to be clean, and that ten days afterwards lung sickness manifested itself among the purchased oxen. The two animals died, and another ox, owned by the plaintiff, also died from lung sickness, caught, it was said, from the two animals bought from the plaintiff. The case came before the Resident Magistrate in the first instance, and was afterwards taken on appeal to the Court of the Chief Magistrate, Kokstad. The Chief Magistrate, in upholding the judgment, said he agreed with the Magistrate in the Court below in his finding. Lung sickness took some 20 days to develop; consequently the two oxen, which died within eight or ten days of the purchase from the defendant, must have been suffering from the disease when in the defendant's possession. It was clear that the respondent, according to Van Zyl's "Judicial Practice," should have instituted this action within six months of the death of the animals. Being a native, he would not know this. He would think that this case could be brought any time, in accordance with native law. In his (the C.M.'s) opinion the plea of prescription should have been brought forward in the Lower Court, and he held that prescription could not now be pleaded, and the appeal must be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Benjamin (for the appellant) contended that the Chief Magistrate was wrong in holding that the native was excused from bringing the action within six months by the fact that he might not have known the law. If it were the law that such action must be brought within six months, and he (counsel) submitted that it was, then the law was binding on the native, and he must be taken to know the law of the country. The Chief Magistrate also contended that because the plea of prescription had not been brought in the Court below, it could not be pleaded. Counsel submitted that there was no need to bring prescription forward in the Court below. The animals died in October, 1901, and the action was not brought until November, 1902. Judgment ought to have been given for the defendant, the appellant in the present action.

Mr. Buchanan (for the respondent) said that the attorney who took the appeal to the Chief Magistrate's Court relied upon the point that the action had not been brought within six months. He (Mr. Buchanan) contended that the exception ought to have been taken before the Magistrate in the Court below in the first instance, and that it could not afterwards be raised.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (April 14th).

De Villiers, C.J.: This case, which is an appeal from the Court of the Chief Magistrate of Griqualand East, raises some important questions in connection with the redhibitory action and with the procedure in cases where prescription is relied upon as a defence to such an action. The plaintiff in November, 1902, sued the defendant in the Magistrate's Court of Mount Fletcher for £16, being the price paid by the plaintiff for two oxen purchased by him from the defendant in October, 1901, which died from lung-sickness within ten days after purchase. The oxen were apparently well at the time of purchase, but the disease showed itself seven days afterwards, and the expert evidence was to the effect that the oxen must have been infected before the date of purchase. The Magistrate gave judgment for the plaintiff with costs, whereupon the defendant appealed to the Court of the Chief Magistrate. On the hearing of the appeal, the appellant did not dispute the correctness of the judgment upon the facts, but contended that, as the redhibitory action must be brought within six months after the date of sale, the obligation to repay the price was barred by prescription, and that, although prescription had not been pleaded in the lower Court, the appellant was entitled on appeal to claim the benefit of such bar. The Court held that prescription ought to have been pleaded in the lower Court, and dismissed the appeal, with costs.

In this court the question has again been raised whether—apart from the question of prescription — the Magistrate was right in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the price which he had paid for the oxen. In my opinion, however, the evidence is fairly conclusive that the oxen died from lung-sickness, which was latent at the date of the sale, but had been contracted before that date. The redhibitory action therefore lay, and if the plaintiff had brought his action within six months after the sale, he would certainly have been entitled to judgment. The action was, however, brought after six months, and if the defendant had raised the exception in the lower Court, he would, in the absence of any satisfactory explanation of the delay, have been entitled to judgment. There was no evidence in this case, as there was in the recent case of Christie v. Etheridge (12 C.T.R., 628), of such a justa causa as would, according to Voet (21, 1, 6), equally justify the delay. But the objection was not raised, and no opportunity was given to the plaintiff in the lower Court to explain the reason of the delay, and the question to be decided is whether it is competent for the appellant to raise it on appeal. The question whether a creditor's delay beyond the prescriptive period in enforcing his obligation operates as an extinction, ipso jure of the obligation, or merely confers on the debtor the right of excepting to its subsequent enforcement, has never been authoritatively decided in this Court. According to Grotius (Introd. 3, 46, 2), obligations were not, under the Roman law, extinguished by time, which afforded only a bar against their enforcement by action. He adds, however—I quote from Herbert's translation: "If we look further to our own old laws, we shall perceive that, as dominion is acquired by us through prescription, so also obligation is actually extinguished by the process of time, and as some laws expressly enact, is considered as released, so that no claim can be founded thereon; whence it follows that the Judge, when the lapse of time is proved to him, ought to declare the plaintiff as inadmissible." This doctrine is approved of by Voet (Comm. 44, 3, 10), but its correctness is doubted by Van der Keersel (Thes., 874). The last-named author cites Averranius (Int. Jur., 2, 12, 20.), who says that "an obligation is not extinguished by lapse of time, inasmuch as time is not one of the modes of putting an end to obligations." The question is fully discussed by Wesel (ad. Nov. Const. art 21, sections 25, 26, and 27), who cites the different authorities in favour of and against the view that, in order to obtain the benefit of prescription of an obligation, the defendant must raise the defence of prescription. Among the authorities cited by him are two cases decided in the High Court of Vriesland and reported by Sande (1, 7, 3 and 5, 6, 2). On reference, however, to Sande, I find that the decisions were mainly founded upon the express words of the statutes, which established the period of prescription in each case. Upon the first case, that of Hermans v. Tiacrda, the author makes the following remarks: "In the opinion of many writers, where the prescription appears on the record, although not specially alleged by the defendant, it must be given effect to by the Judge. But to others the more correct opinion appears to be that prescription requires the aid of an exception in order to extinguish an action, and that it must consequently be alleged in order to require the Judge to take notice of it. Unless it be a prescription arising from a statute, which extinguishes the action ipso jure, and denies it after the lapse of time. And this opinion the Court has followed in the present case, being thereto moved by the words of our statute that 'after the expiration of the aforesaid period such debts shall be deemed to have been duly released, and no action shall lie for the same.'" No case bearing on the point has been cited at the Bar from our own reports, and the only one I have been able to find is that of Reid v. Van der Walt (2, Searle 285). It was there held that an action of damages for slander is prescribed if not brought within a year after knowledge of the slander on the part of the plaintiff, and that it is incumbent on the defendant to plead and prove as matter of defence that the plaintiff was aware of the slander for upwards of a year after it was uttered, and yet failed to proceed. In the present case the Court has to deal with a prescription established not by a Dutch or Colonial statute, but by the edict of the Aedile, under the Roman law. Under that law, as I have already said, the obligation was not extinguished ipso jure by the lapse of six months after the date of sale. It was, moreover, competent for the plaintiff to institute his action after the lapse of six months upon good and sufficient cause shown, and this rule has been adopted by our law as well as by the Dutch law. Unless, however, the defendant raises the defence of prescription, the plaintiff cannot be expected to explain the reason of his delay. It is no injustice, therefore, to hold that before final judgment is given the defendant should call the attention of the Court to the fact that he relies upon the lapse of time as a defence. With its large powers of allowing the amendment of pleadings, the Court would always allow a defendant up to the last moment to raise a defence which would bar the action. But after final judgment the Court could not alter its judgment, and the only remaining question is whether a Court of Appeal can take cognisance of a defence which ought to have been raised in the Lower Court. According to Voet (49, 7, 2), exceptions not taken in a lower Court may be taken in an appellate Court in those cases where evidence not advanced in the lower Court would be admissible. He states that on an appeal to the Supreme Court from the Court of Holland no proof of freshly discovered facts would be admissible, although it would be admissible in certain cases in appeals from inferior courts to the Court of Holland, but no such distinction has ever been recognised in our practice. The defendant failed to raise the defence of prescription in the Magistrate's Court, and thus gave the plaintiff no opportunity of explaining the reason of the delay. It was too late for the defendant to take the objection on appeal to the Chief Magistrate's Court, and a fortiori it is too late to take the objection in this Court. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed with costs.

HIGHMAN AND MARKS v. GRAHAM AND SMITH. 1903. Mar. 19th.

Magistrate's jurisdiction—Counter claim—Liquidated demand—Compensation.

A counter-claim for the price of bricks which the defendant, as vendor, is ready and willing to deliver, is a liquidated demand which is capable of being opposed in compensation.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Stellenbosch upon certain dishonoured cheques, and also for a certain amount claimed for board and lodging, the latter part of the claim being abandoned during the course of the case. The dishonoured cheques apparently were not denied, but the defendants set up a counter-claim for between £600 and £700, and the point in the case really was whether that counter-claim was bona fide, and, secondly, whether it could be pleaded in compensation. The counter-claim was for £688 odd, and principally related to 250,000 bricks, which it was alleged that the plaintiff ordered from the defendant in October some three or four months before the action was brought in the Magistrate's Court. These bricks were never delivered, but the defendants, although they had not delivered the bricks, claimed the price which they said had been agreed upon. The point was whether that was a claim that could be treated as a liquidated demand, or whether it was a claim that could only be brought in the way of damages. The Magistrate, in his judgment, said that the claim in reconvention was in excess of the amount in respect of which the Magistrate had jurisdiction, and he could not enter into the claim in convention, and the case would be dismissed, with costs. Mr. Searle (for appellants) submitted that the defendants' claim could not be pleaded in reconvention. He contended that it was simply brought forward to oust the jurisdiction of the Magistrate, and that, if anything, it was a claim that ought to be dealt with by way of damages. The defendants admitted that they had not delivered the bricks, that they could only deliver them week by week, and counsel submitted that if there had been a breach of contract by the plaintiffs then there was the remedy of an action for damages open to the defendants.

Defendants in default.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Magistrate had to decide two points—firstly, was this a bona fide counter-claim, and, secondly, was it in the nature of a liquidated demand? As to its being a bona fide counter-claim, the Magistrate had witnesses before him, the defendants' witnesses were examined, and the Magistrate was satisfied after hearing them that it was bona fide. I am not disposed to dispute the Magistrate's decision on that point. As to the nature of the demand, it is in the form in which the counter-claim is put forward a liquidated demand, because it is a demand for the price of bricks sold by the defendants to the plaintiffs, for a fixed price according to the defendants' statement, which may be disproved, but that is his statement, there was a fixed price for the bricks, and the bricks were to be delivered in 20,000 at a time. Defendant states that he is ready and willing to deliver them in this amount of 20,000 at a time. He, no doubt, would have a further claim for damages in case the plaintiff does not take the bricks, but the fact that he has another remedy does not exclude defendant's remedy to sue for the price of the bricks upon tendering the bricks themselves. It may be that at the trial he may fail, but that is not the point. The point is, is that a bona fide claim that is made, and if it is a bona fide claim, and it is a liquidated demand, the Magistrate was right in holding that his jurisdiction was ousted? For these reasons, I hold that the appeal must be dismissed.

KOTZE v. PRINS. { 1903. Mar. 20th. Apr. 14th.

Vindicatio—Ownership—Sale by military authorities—War.

During the recent war some British soldiers removed a mule belonging to the defendant from his farm and, after the proclamation of peace, the Magistrate held a public sale of cattle including the mule in question which was sold to C. and by him sold and delivered to the plaintiff. The mule subsequently came into the possession of defendant whereupon the plaintiff brought an action against him for the restoration of the mule or payment of its price:

Held, that in the absence of any proof of authority given to the Magistrate to sell the mule the plaintiff was not entitled to succeed and judgment of absolution from the instance was entered accordingly.

This was an appeal against a decision of the R.M. of Van Rhyn's Dorp. An action had been brought by the respondent against the appellant in the R.M.'s Court at Van Rhyn's Dorp on February 2 last, to recover a certain mule, or the payment of its value, £20, and judgment was given for the plaintiff with costs. The principal facts were that on the 10th October, 1901, the mule, which was then running on the defendant's farm, was seized by a European in khaki, and a number of armed natives, and no receipt was given for the animal. Thereafter, on the 11th July, 1902, the mule appeared to have been purchased at a military sale by one Cillie, who subsequently, on the 29th September, exchanged the mule with the plaintiff for another mule. The defendant's plea denied specifically that the mule in question was the property of the plaintiff, and he pleaded the general issue. The magistrate, in the reasons for his judgment, overruled the exception taken as to the jurisdiction of the Court. He came to the conclusion that the mule in question was taken by the military for operations under martial law in October, 1901, and no receipt was given by the military men who took it. The evidence proved to his mind that the column to which these men who had taken the animals were attached was actually in pursuit of the enemy, and that it would hardly be likely to encumber itself with animals which were thought to be in danger of falling into the hands of the enemy, but they would be required for purposes of pursuit. As far as the civil law was concerned, it had nothing to do with this matter in October 1901, because martial law did away entirely with the civil law at that time. The military sale was supervised by the Acting Magistrate. The defendant did not recognise his animal amongst those which were put to auction. The animal was knocked down to Mr. Cillie, who met the plaintiff in this case, and arranged a transaction whereby the mule passed into the possession of the plaintiff. The plaintiff's evidence he considered was perfectly reliable. The defendant first made an offer to the plaintiff to obtain the animal. The evidence of the defendant he considered was all through most unsatisfactory, and his conduct in connection with the transaction most extraordinary. He (the Magistrate) came to the conclusion that the plaintiff was the rightful owner of the mule, and he therefore gave judgment in his favour with costs of suit.

Mr. Upington for the appellant; Mr. Benjamin for the respondent.

Mr. Upington: In this case is proved that in October, 1901, the mule in question was the property of the defendant, and he afterwards finds it in the possession of the plaintiff.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the respondent's case?]

Mr. Benjamin (for the respondent): That the ownership of the mule was in the military. Sec. 2 of Act 4 of 1902 legalises seizures of animals made by the military during the late war. If the military thus became owners of these animals, all persons who received such animals have also a good title. As to the right to acquire title by seizure under Martial Law see Taylor v. Nashville (Digest of American Cases, Vol. 1, p. 1,232). The mule was seized in pursuance of military operations, and was afterwards sold, together with other animals. The appellant may have a claim under the Compensation Acts (Nos. 16 of 1900 and 17 of 1902), but he cannot have a double claim.

Mr. Upington: For our law as to purchases from the fiscus see Voet (6, 1, 23), where Resp. J. Corum. Holl. (part 4, Consil. 128, quest. 2) is cited. A person who purchases from the fiscus is only warranted if the goods have been properly confiscated or escheated, or attached by legal process. The position taken up for the respondent is that goods which have been seized by men who are presumed to have been attached to a column they may lawfully be sold. One would assume that a receipt of some kind would be given whenever property was seized by order of any military man in authority. The plaintiff must show that he has a good title to that mule before he can get possession of it. It is not proved that the European who seized the mule was a member of a column, and there is evidence that these animals were not requisitioned. As to the American case of Taylor v. Nashville, we have to go on our own law, and it is perfectly clear. Things cannot be confiscated until all legal formalities have been observed, and unless this sale was carried out subject to such formalities, no legal validity is given to the acts of the military. Under Martial Law no goods can be requisitioned without a receipt being given.

Mr. Benjamin, in reply, contended that the military acquired a good title to the mule by seizure, and that this title was protected by Act 4 of 1902.

Cur. Adv. Vult.

Postea (April 14): The Court gave judgment.

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an appeal against a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Van Rhynsdorp, by which he ordered the defendant, now appellant, to restore to the plaintiff a certain mule, or to pay him its value, namely, £20. It is common cause that the mule was reared on the defendant's farm, and remained his property until it was removed from the farm by a European in military uniform and ten natives. The removal took place before the declaration of peace, but the defendant had not joined the enemy. No receipt was given to him for the mule, nor were any of the other forms required in the case of requisitions observed by the persons removing it. After the declaration of peace a public sale of cattle was held in Van Rhynsdorp by the Acting Resident Magistrate, assisted by Lieutenant Peek, of the Imperial Yeomanry. Among the cattle thus sold was the mule in question, which was bought by one Celliers, and he exchanged it for another mule with the plaintiff. The mule in question subsequently came into the possession of the defendant, and the plaintiff thereupon instituted the action for the restoration of the mule or the payment of its value. In support of the Magistrate's decision, reliance was mainly placed on an American case, in which it was held that the owner of land on which the troops of the United States had during war cut down certain trees, was not entitled to recover the timber from a person who had subsequently purchased it from the military authorities. Unfortunately, we have only a headnote of the case, without a full report, and it is, consequently, impossible to state the exact grounds of the decision. The case is cited under the heading "eminent domain," and it appears to me to be extremely probable that the decision was based upon the doctrine of "eminent domain," which is peculiar to the American law. According to Voet (6, 1, 23), a person who has purchased the goods of another from the fiscus is not liable to an action at the suit of the owner, but the authority cited by him (Dutch Cons. 4, 128, 2) does not support his view without an important qualification. Advising upon a case submitted to them, counsel there stated the law to be as follows: "Although it be true that a person who has purchased anything from the fiscus is free from liability to third arties, whatever remedy they might have against the fiscus, yet this is only true provided that the fiscus has sold it under a proper title and with the solemnities required by law, that is to say, when the goods have devolved on the fiscus by virtue of a confiscation, or as bona vacantia, and have been sold by public auction." The difficulty in the present case is to find by what right or title the Acting Magistrate purported to sell the mule. He by no means represented the public treasury, nor is there evidence that he had been authorised by the proper military authority to sell the mule, and he took no steps, by obtaining a decree of confiscation, or otherwise to deprive the owner of his ownership. If a court-martial or other military tribunal had adjudged a confiscation of the defendant's property this Court would have been bound to assume the validity of such judgment, seeing that the 5th section of Act No. 4, of 1902, promulgated on the 15th of September of that year, confirms all sentences pronounced before that date. The section refers to the Martial Law Regulations which were in force during the war, and it has been contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the sale to Celliers having taken place under these regulations, the property must be held to have passed to him. It is not, however, by any means clear that the sale was authorised by or took place under the regulations. The 22nd Article provides that "stock, etc., may be (1) requisitioned to supply the wants of the Army; (2) seized to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy; (3) captured from the enemy." The mule in question was not requisitioned from any one, nor was it captured from the enemy. Possibly it may have been seized to prevent its falling into the hands of the enemy, but it was sold at a time when there was no enemy into whose hands it could fall. In the case of cattle thus seized, the 22nd Article says: "The general principle underlying the transaction is that the stock, etc., remains the property of the owner. It may be sold by public auction after removal to districts in which sales can be safely permitted, the proceeds being credited to the owner." In the present case the proceeds were not credited to the owner, and it is impossible, therefore, to assume that the sale took place under the 22nd Article of the regulations. The sale, moreover, took place in a time of peace, when there could hardly be a question of removal to a district in which sales could be safely permitted. The fact that there was not a state of war at the time of the sale was entirely lost sight of in the Court below, and was not referred to in the arguments at the Bar, and yet it is a circumstance of importance for the decision of the present case. Without deciding that if the sale had taken place before the conclusion of hostilities, the ownership would have been transferred,

I am certainly of opinion that the evidence is insufficient to establish the transfer of ownership by means of a sale which took place after the conclusion of hostilities. It was not a sale in execution, or any other recognised mode of transferring property in time of peace against the will and without the consent of the owner. In the case of Woodhead v. Gunn (11 S.C., 10), this Court expressed approval of the decision of the Eastern Districts Court in Van der Merwe v. Webb (3 E.D.C., 97), where it was held that the owner of cattle is not deprived of his ownership by the sale of the cattle at a municipal market without his knowledge or consent. A sale held in time of peace by a Resident Magistrate, assisted by a subordinate military officer, appears to me to be of no greater efficacy to transfer the ownership of cattle without the owner's consent than a sale at a public municipal market. The owner retains his right of vindication against the purchaser, and where the property has reverted to the possession of the owner, the purchaser has no right to recover it from him. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed with costs in this Court, and judgment of absolution from the instance must be entered with costs in the Court below.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

REX v. CLAASEN. REX v. POTGIETER. 1903. Mar. 20th.

Insulting language—Public place.

De Villiers, C.J.: Two special justice cases have come under my notice as judge of the week. In the case of Rex v. Brend Daniel Claasen, heard at Herbertsdale, in the district of Mossel Bay, the defendant is charged with contravening section 10 of Ord. 27 of 1812, in that he "did wrongfully and unlawfully insult one Mrs. Leonard." Accused pleaded guilty. The evidence showed that it was in a mealy field that the insult took place. Mrs. Leonard says: "On Saturday, the 1st of March, I went in our mealy field, when I met the defendant, who was cursing and swearing and calling me names." There was the following note by the special justice: "The Court regretted by saying that on Sunday the people ought to be in church instead of keep drunkenness, and by so doing they are giving a bad example for another. Therefore, the Court found him guilty and fines with ten shillings, or five days' imprisonment. Fine was paid." Of course that is no reason for charging him under the Act; the offence must be committed in a public place, and the conviction therefore is quashed.

There is also another case in which two men, Josias Johannes Nicolaas de Kock and Martin David Potgieter, were charged with stealing certain donkeys. They were both found guilty, and as to De Kock, I am satisfied that the conviction is right. As to Potgieter "the evidence shows that he acted by directions of De Kock, and that he took the donkeys to a certain place at De Kock's request, and was found in possession. The evidence satisfies me that Potgieter was instructed to do what he did, and he was not aware that De Kock had stolen the donkeys. Therefore the conviction as to Potgieter will be quashed.

Ex parte VAN DER WALT.

This was an application for an order with regard to the sale of certain property in which minors were interested. The petitioner stated that he was a retired farmer, formerly of Colesberg, and now residing at Middelburg, and in 1883 he executed a will and codicil together with his late wife bequeathing certain farms to the survivor and the children of the marriage. The Colesberg Divisional Council's valuation of the land was £8,600, and petitioner had received from the Rhodes, Bailey, and Beit Syndicate, Ltd., an offer of £36,000 for the property, a price which petitioner and his children, who were legatees considered was far in excess of the real value. They were agreed that the offer should be accepted. The surviving sons were all of full age, but one of the petitioner's children died a few years ago, and, in the terms of the will and the codicil aforesaid, his one-third share devolved on his six children, three of whom were of age, and who consented to the sale by the other legatees. There were three other children who were still minors. The Master reported favourably, and asked for permission to alienate the small share in the land belonging to the minors, so that the sale so advantageous to all concerned might be concluded.

On the motion of Mr. Benjamin, an order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

MASANGWANA v. PRATT. { 1903. Mar. 20th. Apr. 14th.

Native custom – Dowry cattle—Seizure in execution.

One S. (a Pondo) had received certain cattle as a dowry for his sister. These he handed over for custody to M., his chief and half brother. P., acting as messenger of the Resident Magistrate's Court, had seized certain of these cattle (as was alleged) in execution of a judgment obtained against S. M. brought an action in the Magistrate's Court for the recovery of these cattle. The Magistrate gave judgment for the defendant on the ground that by Pondo custom the son of the chief wife is responsible for his younger brothers. On appeal the Court referred the matter to the Magistrate for a full report as to whether he found as a fact that the cattle had been paid to M. or to S. On its appearing from the Magistrate's report that M. gave up the cattle to the messenger voluntarily, the appeal was dismissed.

This was an appeal brought by one Masangwana (a native chief) against a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of Libode (Pondoland).

In the Court below the plaintiff (now appellant) had claimed from the defendant (now respondent) the restoration of a certain chestnut stallion, one black heifer and one bull calf; or their total value, the sum of £60, which stock the defendant did, about September 26, 1902, wrongfully and unlawfully seize and take possession of, and which are the property of the said plaintiff.

The Magistrate gave judgment for the defendant with costs.

The Magistrate's reasons for his judgment were as follows:

1. Masangwana is the elder half-brother of Siqakula by the chief wife.

2. The cattle in question are the original, or increase of cattle paid as dowry for Siqakula's own sister.

3. The cattle when paid as dowry remained at Masangwana's kraal because Siqakula had no cattle kraal.

4. The deputy-messenger, who is the son of a Pondo chief, went to the head of the family, Masangwana, and after taking some time, Masangwana handed the stock to the deputy-messenger, knowing that Siqakula had referred the deputy-messenger to his family chief and elder brother, Masangwana.

5. Pondo custom does not differ much in this respect from that of the other tribes. The son of the chief wife is responsible for his younger brothers; he stands in the light of a father of the family. In this case he was more so, as the stock was still under Masangwana's protection and care. Two of the cattle paid as dowry (which were well known) were paid out by Masangwana for the dowry of Siqakula's younger brother's wife to avoid their being seized.

On these grounds judgment was entered for the defendant with costs, and the stock declared executable.

Mr. Searle, K.C., for the appellant, Mr. Benjamin for the respondent.

Mr. Searle said it seemed to be admitted in this case that these cattle belonged to Masangwana. Apparently the principle applied in this case was that Masangwana was responsible for Siqakola's debts, and he (counsel) submitted in the first place that that was not a principle that could be applied in this case. The magistrate had not to decide according to native law, because it was a case between a European and a native.

[De Villiers, C.J.: No, it is a case between two natives.]

Mr. Searle: No, it is not an interpleader issue. It is an action against Pratt.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question of the ownership of the cattle is one of native law.]

Mr. Searle: That is so. Counsel went on to contend that the cattle attached were acquired by Masangwana as a dowry for his daughter, and that they should not have been seized. It was also admitted, he said, that these parties had separate kraals.

Mr. Benjamin, in support of the judgment, said that it seemed to be agreed that the plaintiff was the owner of the cattle, but he willingly handed them over to the deputy messenger because he no doubt had in his possession the cattle of Sequakula's. That act, he contended, was quite voluntary.

De Villiers, C.J., said he found it difficult in this case to do justice between the parties without having a fuller report from the magistrate as to the facts of the case, and the matter would be referred to the Resident Magistrate for a full report as to the facts, and more especially as to whether he disbelieved the plaintiff Masangwana on the question of whether the cattle had been given to him as a dowry for his daughter, or whether the cattle which had been paid to Sequakula's sister were at the time this took place under the control of the plaintiff. His lordship added that, upon receiving the magistrate's report, he might hear counsel further.

Postea (April 14):

De Villiers, C.J., said he had been in communication with the Resident Magistrate of Libode, Pondoland, and the effect of the latter's reply was that the cattle were given up voluntarily. The appeal would, therefore, be dismissed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Sir JOHN BUCHANAN.]

REVIEW.

REX. v. GERMAN. { 1903. Mar. 31st.

Act 40 of 1902, sec. 16.

Buchanan, J., said that the case of Sarah German, alias Sarah Jacobs, had come under review. The prisoner was charged with contravening section 16 of Act 40 of 1902, in that she was found in possession of a quantity of intoxicating liquor. There was also a second conviction, and the Magistrate fined the prisoner £15, or four months' imprisonment. The limit fixed under the Act was £10. The sentence would therefore be reduced to a fine of £10.

NATIONAL BANK v. ROSS { 1903. Mar. 31st.

Extradition — Supercession of Colonial Order of Sequestration and of civil imprisonment—Transmission of insolvent's Colonial assets to foreign trustee.

R.'s estate had been finally sequestrated by the Supreme Court as insolvent, and on failure to find security that he would attend the meetings of his creditors he had been committed to civil imprisonment. Thereafter proceedings had been instituted against him in the Transvaal, where his estate had also been sequestrated for fraudulent insolvency, and an order had been granted for his extradition thither. His only creditor in this Colony was the National Bank and his assets were in the Orange River Colony and in Basutoland. On the application of the chief local agent of the bank, and with the consent of the curator bonis to the in- solvent estate, the Court granted an order discharging the Colonial order for sequestration and the order for the civil imprisonment of the insolvent, and directing the curator bonis to hand over any assets in his hands to the trustee appointed in the Transvaal.

This was an application arising out of a writ of arrest granted against the respondent. The writ was confirmed on March 12, 1903, and the applicants now asked for an order to allow the removal of the respondent to the Transvaal, if need be, to withdraw the order for sequestration, and to authorize that whatever assets the curator bonis has be transmitted to the trustee appointed in the Transvaal for the benefit of the creditors. About the 9th instant, before the return day, his estate was provisionally sequestrated, the bank being the petitioning creditor, and on the return day, the 12th, the bank moved in the ordinary way for confirmation of the writ, and made an application to the Court for the detention of Ross, pending a meeting of creditors to be held in his insolvent estate, and upon that the Court made an order that Ross was to find security for £500 to attend the meeting of his creditors, or otherwise be detained in gaol, and also on the same day, by the consent of Ross, who was represented by counsel, the Court finally adjudicated Ross's estate to be insolvent. In the ordinary course the provisional order of sequestration would only have been returnable on the 14th April, but, by consent of Ross, the date of final adjudication was anticipated, and his estate was finally sequestrated. On the 26th of this month a final order for the sequestration of his estate was made in the Transvaal, and since then the creditors had initiated proceedings for fraudulent insolvency there, and an order had been granted for the extradition of Ross, but this could not be executed, because of the order of the Court of the Cape Colony civilly detaining him in gaol, and the bank now applied for the supercession of the order for his detention in gaol to allow him to be handed over to the police. Counsel read the notice of application, in which it was stated by Mr. W. C. Cruickshank, chief agent of the National Bank, that he had reason to believe that there were no creditors of Ross in this colony other than the bank, that his assets were in the Orange River Colony and in Basutcland, and that Ross was wanted in the Transvaal to answer a charge of fraudulent insolvency. The police had approached petitioner to ask him what position he took in the matter. Petitioner was of opinion that it would be more convenient if Ross were removed to the Transvaal, and he asked that the Court should consent to his removal to the Transvaal and to the withdrawal of the order of sequestration, and authorise whatever assets might be placed in the hands of the curator bonis to be transmitted to the trustee appointed in the Transvaal for the benefit of his creditors. A letter of approval of this course was produced from the curator bonis in Cape Town.

On the motion of Mr. Upington the Court directed that the order for final sequestration and the order for his detention in gaol, pending security for his attending the meetings in his insolvent estate, be hereby discharged.

Ex parte ROSE.

Builder's lien—Retention money—Security.

This was an application for an order calling upon the respondent A. R. Wojeichowski, to deliver up the keys of certain premises in Main-road, Sea Point. The respondent was the contractor for certain premises erected by the applicant situate in that road, and he refused to give up the keys on the ground that there was an outstanding account still due to him on the contract. A contract was entered into between the parties, whereby the respondent was to complete the work for £770. The building was near completion, and the necessary certificate of occupation had been given by the Sea Point Council. The respondent still neglected to finally finish the building, and he declined to deliver up the keys. There remained due to him a sum of £40, but under the contract the applicant was entitled to retain a certain sum pending the completion of the work. The respondent claimed that he was entitled to £370 19s from the applicant under the contract. Applicant had tendered to the respondent security up to the amount of his claim, pending the result of the action to be instituted by him, but he had declined to accept this security. Respondent urged that he was entitled to continue in possession of the premises until his claim was satisfied, and, as to any delay in the work, he contended that it was due to the unlawful interference of the applicant.

Mr. Upington moved.

Buchanan, J., remarked that the whole question between the parties seemed to be one as to security. The respondent had a lien on the premises prima facie, and the applicant seemed to have taken possession against his wish.

Mr. Upington said it was quite clear that the respondent had a lien on the premises until his charges were paid, and he seemed prepared to waive that lien provided he got security for the amount of his claim. What the applicant was prepared to do was to give security to the satisfaction of the Registrar.

The Court granted an order requiring the respondent to give up the keys upon the payment by the applicant of £400 to abide further proceedings, such proceedings to be instituted by the respondent within one month, leave being reserved to the respondent to move to have this order set aside.

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

STEVENS AND FLECK V. ANDRIES.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £450. due by reason of the non-payment of interest, and also for £1 15s. for premiums, stamps, etc., and he also asked that the property be declared executable.

Granted.

AUSTEN AND HODGES V. HODGES.

Mr. Gardiner moved for provisional sentence on certain promissory notes made by the defendant in favour of the plaintiffs.

Sir H. Juta, for the respondent, said that this matter had already been once postponed, so as to ascertain whether or not his client was indebted to the applicants, a point which depended on the result of a certain arbitration. Last time the case was before the Court the arbitration was unfinished. The arbitration had now been completed, and the whole matter could be settled as soon as the terms of the award became known, and he therefore applied for a postponement until the May term.

Mr. Gardiner said these repeated postponements were seriously prejudicing his clients' business, because they were allowing the promissory notes which were the subject of the proceedings to form part of their capital.

The matter was ordered to stand over until the May term, costs to be costs in the cause.

HAWKER V. PATTERSON.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers, on behalf of the plaintiff, moved for confirmation of a writ of arrest upon which defendant had been imprisoned for a debt of £60 5s., account for goods sold and delivered to him. The writ was issued under the 8th Rule of Court, as the Defendant was meditating departure from the Colony.

Defendant said he had been three weeks in prison. He admitted the debt.

Judgment was given for the amount claimed, with costs, and the writ confirmed.

STEVENSON V. HONWITZ.

Mr. Upington moved for provisional sentence for £72 on a promissory note, with interest, and also for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £71. balance due to the plaintiff from the defendant on account of money lent and advanced, and also for £50, money collected by the defendant on account of the plaintiff, which sum the defendant had not accounted for.

Order granted accordingly.

HAVENGA AND DICKSON V. REDELINGHUYS.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on promissory notes for the following amounts: £250, £310, £148 15s. 6d., £755 15s. 3d., and £553 11s. 6d.

Granted.

HEDDLE BROS. V. SPITTLE AND LLOYD.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence on a bill payable 180 days after sight, by order of the Bank of Africa, for £71 14s., made by Heddle Bros., the present plaintiffs, upon the defendants, and accepted by them. The bill had not been met, the bank declaring that the defendants had no account. Counsel added that there was also in the summons a claim under Rule 329d, but the time not having elapsed, he could not mention it now, and he should have to come to the Court later on.

Order granted.

SAUERLANDER AND KRUGER V. SCOTT.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied judgment for £241 7s. 8d., with interest and taxed costs.

The debtor made an offer of £5 a month and said that this was all he was in a position to pay. He had impoverished himself in this matter already, having paid £2,500.

Mr. Bisset said that he thought that the offer was very small.

The defendant said that there were other judgments on behalf of the same plaintiffs against him. He foolishly endorsed certain bills two years ago, and he had been paying ever since, and the real party had not paid threepence.

The Chief Justice: How do you mean?

Defendant: When he took a certain hotel, I endorsed his bills, and I have paid already £2,500 on his behalf, and now this judgment is brought against me. The original bill was £1,850. I am not the debtor at all. I signed the bills on behalf of one Parsons or Core, and he has absconded.

The Court granted a decree as asked for, to be suspended on payment of £5 a month from the 1st May, leave to be given to the plaintiffs to apply later for an increased order.

KLERCK V. ABDOL.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £200, together with interest, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest, and he also asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Granted.

ISRAELSON V. BLAKE.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond, due by reason of notice given by the defendant calling in the bond. He asked for judgment on the bond for £1,000, together with interest due from December last, and also that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Granted.

DEMPERS V. POGGENPOEL.

Mr. Rowson said that he was instructed by the plaintiff to apply for provisional sentence on a certain mortgage bond, but he understood that the summons had not yet been returned, and he therefore asked that the case should stand over until the 1st day of next term.

The Court assented.

LAWRIE V. ISAACS.

Mr. Close said he appeared for the plaintiff, but he understood that a final order for the adjudication of the estate had been made, and he therefore asked that the case should stand over.

Order accordingly.

DEMPERS AND VAN RYNEVELD V. PENTZ.

Debtor said he was a cartage contractor, and he could not possibly pay more than £2 a month.

A decreee was granted, with costs, operation to be suspended on the debtor paying £2 a month from the 1st May, leave being given to the plaintiff to apply for an increased order.

GELL V. AHMED.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £130, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of monthly instalments. Counsel also asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Granted.

ZIETSMAN V. SAYDIEN.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £250, less £25 paid on account.

Granted.

FREEMAN AND CO. V. WEINTROB.

Mr. De Waal asked that this matter should be postponed until the 1st May.

The Court assented.

SPENGLER V. ALVIENS.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £400, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, due by reason of the non-payment of interest. Counsel also asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable, and applied for provisional sentence for 16s., on account of insurance of the said property.

Granted.

BLAKE V. CORTIS. { 1903. April 14th.

Mortgage bond—Notice of payment—Provisional sentence.

The plaintiff sued the defendant for provisional sentence on a bond which was payable upon three months' notice given on either side. The summons alleged that such notice had been given to the plaintiff by the defendant, but the evidence showed that the plaintiff at once wrote refusing to accept such notice.

Held, that after such refusal the plaintiff could not rely upon the notice given by the defendant, and provisional sentence was accordingly refused.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £1,150, less £100 paid on account, due by virtue of notice of re payment having been given by the defendant to the plaintiff. Counsel also asked that the property specially mortgaged by the said bond be declared executable, and that costs be granted of the present application.

Mr. Upington, for the defendant, read an answering affidavit, which set forth that on the 13th December last, the defendant, through his attorney, gave notice to the plaintiff's agent that he would pay off the bond now sued upon, and that the plaintiff's agent refused to accept the notice. Deponent added that he had paid interest to the 31st December, 1902.

Mr. De Villiers read the replying affidavit of the plaintiff, which was to the effect that he admitted that he had received the said notice from the defendant, but he contended that the defendant had not complied with the conditions stipulated in the bond.

Mr. Upington submitted that the notice which was relied upon as forming the basis of the action was rejected by the plaintiff. Then a month afterwards the plaintiff turned round, and said he must give notice to pay off the capital and interest.

Mr. De Villiers said it was true that they refused to accept the notice, but their letter set forth that they could not accept the notice unless Mr. Cortis complied with the terms of the bond. They only refused conditionally. The defendant absolutely owed £200, which he ought to have paid on the 18th October. Then he said he would pay off the sum within three months.

The Chief Justice said the most extraordinary feature of the case was that the plaintiff, writing on the 15th December, required the defendant to pay £300 on the 18th October.

Mr. De Villiers: We refused the notice conditionally.

The Chief Justice: Conditionally on his doing an impossibility.

Mr. De Villiers: We asked for £850, for which three months' notice was to be given, and for £200, for which no notice was to be given.

De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant is sued for the sum of £1,150, less £100, on a bond which, according to the summons, has become due and payable in consequence of the notice of repayment having been given by the defendant to the plaintiff. That is all the summons relies upon—notice of repayment having been given by the said defendant to the said plaintiff. The summons says nothing whatever about £200 being due and payable at a previous time. It is true that the correspondence shows that, but the summons should have stated it as the ground of claim, which it does not. As to the notice of repayment referred to in the summons, there is no doubt that such a notice of repayment was given, but the plaintiff refused to accept it. He refused on the 31st December, or some time in December, 1902, unless £300 were paid in October, 1902, an utterly impossible condition. There is an absolute rejection by him of the notice, and it is wholly impossible for the plaintiff now to rely on the validity of the notice, which he himself had rejected. Provisional sentence will therefore be refused, with costs.

HEATLIE V. CHETTY.

Granted.

MOTT V WARIES.

Mr. Close moved for provisional sentence on a bond for £115, with interest and costs, the bond having become due by reason of the non-payment of interest, and he asked further that the property be declared executable.

Granted.

DR. T. WATER V. NORTJE.

Mr. De Waal moved for provisional sentence for £102, interest on a mortgage bond from May 21, 1901, to May 21, 1902.

Granted.

HERMANN V. ISAACS.

Insolvency — alleged excess of assets over liabilities.

Mr. Gardiner, for plaintiff, moved for the final adjudication of defendant's estate, a provisional order having been granted on March 21.

Mr. Murray Bisset, for defendant, opposed the application.

Mr. Benjamin intervened on behalf of one Vincent Hutt to support plaintiff's application.

Mr. Bisset read an affidavit by defendant, who stated that his assets exceeded his liabilities, and denied that he was insolvent. Owing to certain papers being in the hands of his agent (Mr. Steer), who refused to give them up, he was prevented from dealing with his landed properties, which, if sold, would show a surplus of over £2,000.

His creditors were secured by mortgage bonds.

Mr. Buchanan stated that Mr. Steer denied the truth of defendant's allegations as to the retention of papers.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is quite clear that defendant has committed acts of insolvency. The defendant makes certain serious accusations against Mr. Steer, and I think these allegations should, in some form or other, be closely scrutinised. The question is, whether time should be given defendant to bring his action against his agent. On the whole, I think it will be impossible for the defendant to stave off insolvency, and he is indebted to so many creditors that I am afraid further postponements will be of no avail. I think the best course is for the Court to order a sequestration of the defendant's estate and a close investigation into the allegations made against Mr. Steer. If there is a surplus after the payment of creditors, the defendant will get it. Seeing that the defendant has committed divers acts of insolvency, the Court must now grant the order asked for.

NORBYE V. BENSIMON. { 1903. April 14th.

Review — Irregularity — Resident Magistrate.

On an application for a review of proceedings in a Magistrate's Court it was alleged that the Magistrate had refused to hear the witnesses for the plaintiff. The Magistrate denied the allegation on oath, and there was nothing to show that an application had been made to him to enter on the record a refusal to hear the evidence.

Held, that in the absence of proof of irregularity on the face of the record, clear proof aliunde was required.

This was a motion for an order to review and set aside the proceedings in this case in the Court of the Resident Magistrate of Cape Town, on the ground of gross irregularity in the proceedings, owing to the Magistrate (Mr. Roussow, A.R.M.), refusing to allow evidence to be called on behalf of plaintiff.

The action in the court below was for the recovery of the sum of £14 5s. 6d., balance of an account. Plaintiff had done some paving work for defendant at Sea Point, and the disputed claim was for extra work alleged to have been done at the request of Bensimon. The point at issue was whether the original tender covered the extra work or not. A special plea of settlement was set up, and it was held by the Magistrate that the onus of proof was on the defendant. A cheque, endorsed to the effect that it was in full settlement of plaintiff's claim, was put in, and absolution was granted from the instance without plaintiff's witnesses being allowed to be called.

In his affidavit, the Assistant Resident Magistrate denied that he had refused to hear the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for applicant; Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers for respondent.

Sir H. Juta, K.C.: In this matter, according to an account put in, a balance of £14 5s. 6d. is left in appellant's favour. To a claim for this balance the respondent pleads a settlement; or, in the alternative, admits £1 to be due but puts in a counterclaim for the same amount. The Magistrate said that the special plea must be dealt with before the defendant could be heard. He should have called upon the plaintiff to go into the box and prove his case. The Magistrate took no evidence save on the special plea of settlement, and then proceeded to give absolution from the instance. In point of fact there was no evidence in support of this special plea. The plaintiff never accepted £71 in full settlement, because he was always asking, "When will you pay me the balance?" Even the Magistrate could not have held that this was a settlement, or he would have given judgment for the defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What was the special plea?]

That the matter had been settled, and we say that there is no evidence as to this.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You cannot object to the finding of absolution from the instance.]

But we do object; we had evidence on the merits, but the Magistrate would not allow us to lead it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But where is the irregularity? Is it because the Magistrate did not call the evidence of plaintiff as to the special plea?]

Yes; the plaintiff had evidence on the merits. If the Magistrate had given judgment for the defendant we could have appealed, but we cannot appeal against his finding of absolution from the instance.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why?]

We have nothing to appeal on. There is no evidence that the amount we claim is due to us. The evidence in our possession does not appear on the record, and we cannot ask to have the record amended, as these matters did not come out in the Court. I submit that the Magistrate was wrong in not taking evidence on the merits.

Mr. J. E. de Villiers (who was requested by the Court to confine himself to the question of costs): Even should the Court find that the Magistrate was guilty of any irregularity, we are still entitled to costs. The irregularity (if any) was due solely to the action of the attorneys. Defendant's attorney asked only for absolution frvom the instance, and the plaintiff tendered no evidence and made no protest against the finding of the Magistrate.

Sir H. Juta (in reply): If the onus probandi was on the defendants, that concludes the whole case; but if this cheque was given in full settlement of the account, that only makes the finding of absolution from the instance more incomprehensible than ever.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is very much to be regretted that a misunderstanding arose between the parties, and that the Magistrate did not allow the plaintiff's evidence, because there was no clear admission by the defendant's agent of the liability, and therefore evidence in support of the plea should not have been heard until the plaintiff's case was first of all established. The evidence for the defendant was heard, and then I have no doubt that plaintiff assumed that the Magistrate, on the merits of the case, was in his favour, and therefore did not take proper steps to produce his own evidence. The Magistrate absolutely denied that he refused to allow plaintiff to give evidence, and the record supports the Magistrate. There is nothing on the record to show that there was any application on the part of the plaintiff for an order that his witnesses should be examined, and that a refusal was given. If the record had shown that the Magistrate refused to hear the plaintiff's witnesses, I would have been prepared to set aside the proceedings, but the record is silent on the point, and the evidence leaves the matter, to say the least of it, very doubtful. Only the clearest evidence would justify the Court in holding that the irregularity had been proved in opposition to the positive denial on oath of the Magistrate and the other witnesses for the respondent. The application must be refused, with costs.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte BROWNELL. { 1893. April 14th.

This was an application for an order to restrain the respondent, applicant's husband, from receiving certain moneys which were invested in a local bank pending an action which she was instituting for the restitution of conjugal rights. The petitioner stated that she resided at Salt River, and that she was married to the respondent in community of property, and that there had been no issue of the marriage. Recently, unhappy differences had arisen between her and her husband which had rendered it impossible for them to live together, and the petitioner was about to institute an action for the restitution of conjugal rights. There was a sum of £200 or more standing to the credit of petitioner and her husband, which had been largely raised through the savings of the petitioner during the subsistence of the marriage. Petitioner had reasonable grounds to believe that the respondent intended to return to his home in the United States, and that he would proceed to withdraw the money standing in the bank in their joint names.

On the motion of Mr. Alexander, the Court granted a rule nisi calling upon the respondent to show cause on the 1st May why an interdict should not be granted against him.

APPEAL.

VICKERS v. MASON AND CO. { 1903. April 14th.

Review — Irregularity — Resident Magistrate.

In a civil case, tried in a Magistrate's Court, a document in the possession of the defendant to which great importance was attached was shown by his agent to a witness, who acknowledged having previously seen the document in the possession of the defendant. The document was not, however, put in as evidence, and after judgment of absolution from the instance had been given, the Magistrate obtained a certain document from the defendant as being the document which had been shown to the witness. The document thus obtained was inserted in the record as being part of the evidence On review, the Clerk of the Court and the witness denied on oath that the document thus inserted had ever been shown to the witness.

Held, that the irregularity was such as to entitle the plaintiff to have the proceedings set aside.

This was an application for review of certain proceedings of the Court of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Lady Grey, in the district of Aliwal North.

In the Court below the plaintiff had brought an action in which he claimed the sum of £38 as damages, reduced to £20, to bring the case within the jurisdiction of the Court, for alleged illegal possession, detention, and so forth of certain two oxen which were the property of the plaintiff. The judgment was absolution from the instance. The application for review was made on the ground of gross irregularity in the proceedings in that in the first place a certain receipt was annexed to the record which was not put in during the hearing of the case and upon which the Magistrate appeared to have based his judgment, and in the second place that the Magistrate gave absolution from the instance without calling upon the plaintiff's agent at all or giving him an opportunity of being heard, and generally that the proceedings were otherwise irregular. In support of the application, counsel read the affidavits of applicant and other witnesses called on his behalf at the trial.

The following were the Magistrate's reasons in giving judgment: In this case damages were claimed because of the alleged illegal detention of two oxen. I find that the plaintiff in no way proved that the possession had been other than bona fide, and that the evidence of plaintiff's witnesses, except Booi, the native witness, on whom I could not rely at all, went to support the defence as stated during the proceedings by the defendant's attorney, and shown in the receipt put in marked "B." The attorney for the plaintiff, when informed that he had not disposed of the receipt "B," or proved male fide possession, said it was impossible to disprove a bogus receipt, and he must close the case; with that he sat down. The defendant's attorney was then about to place his witness in the box when he was stopped by the Court, and absolution from the instance was granted. The attorney for the plaintiff is conscientiously under the impression that but for some interruption of the Court he would have, in closing his case, reserved the right of calling further evidence. I am quite convinced, however, that he closed his case absolutely. All through the case the contention of the plaintiff's attorney was that even if the possession was bona fide, defendants were liable to damages; further that the bona fides of the receipt should be proved by the defendant. The plaintiff's attorney now demurs to the admission of the exhibit "B." It was openly put in by defendant's attorney when Roberts mentioned the receipt seen by him, referred to, to the end of the case. At the time of its being put in, I read it out to the parties, and no further notice was taken of the admission of it as an exhibit, and I understood the acceptance of it by the witness and plaintiff's attorney. I did not at the time in Court mark it or note on the record the letter "B." This I did immediately the case was over, when putting the record together, and then found that the Clerk of the Court had allowed it to remain in the possession of the attorney for the defendants after the case was over. When demanded, it was restored to the record within a very few minutes after the case ended.

Mr. Upington for the appellant; Mr. Gardiner for the respondents.

Mr. Upington submitted that it was a very important point that the statements made by the witness Roberts and the Clerk of the Court were not specifically controverted, or controverted in any way by the Magistrate in his reasons.

Mr. Gardiner read several affidavits, in which it was asserted that reference was made in open Court to the receipt, which the Magistrate remarked appeared to be perfectly valid.

The Chief Justice: Who gave evidence as to the receipt?

Mr. Gardiner: It was put to the witness Roberts in cross-examination.

The Chief Justice: What did he say?

Mr. Gardiner: That it was the same receipt that was shown to him at Lemoenfontein.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: It appears to me that there has been very great irregularities in this case. Both parties seem to attach considerable importance to the receipt for the purpose of proving bona fides. It was important, therefore, for the defendant to have this receipt produced, but there was no production of it by the person in whose custody it was. No attempt was made to produce it, but when a witness for the plaintiff, called Roberts, was put into the box, it is said that a receipt was shown to him, and that this was the receipt shown to him as having been the one previously shown to him by one Mason, a partner in the firm. The receipt was not, however, recorded as evidence, but it seems that the Magistrate afterwards went to the office of the attorney for the defendants, and obtained the receipt from him, then amended the record, and marked it "B," and said, "That is the receipt." Then we have got the evidence of the Clerk of the Court. He makes an affidavit that, as Clerk of the Court, he was present during the hearing of the evidence of the witnesses. He says: "I saw no document of any description, including receipt marked 'B,' and attached to records in the case, handed to the said witness for inspection. The receipt 'B' was not attached to the record, but it was removed by the defendant's attorney to his office, when it was brought back by the presiding Magistrate some time after the rising of the Court. The letter 'B' on the record in Roberts's evidence was inserted by the presiding Magistrate only after the rising of the Court, and not during the hearing of the case." Moreover, we have the evidence of Roberts. He is the witness who was supposed to have identified this document. This is what he says: "I was a witness on the 7th March, 1903, in the Court of the Assistant Resident Magistrate of Lady Grey, in the case of Vickers v. Mason and Co., for damages. My evidence, as appearing on the records of the said case, alleges me to have said that Messrs. Mason and Co., at the time I claimed the oxen in question, showed me a receipt 'B' now attached to the said record. No document of any description, including the said receipt 'B,' was ever handed to me during the hearing of the case by the Bench, defendant's attorney, or anyone else, and any declaration to the contrary is absolutely false. The receipt shown to me by Mason and Co. at Lemoenfontein was an old one, and is not the one now attached to the record marked 'B.'" Now, I must confess I attach much more weight to the evidence of Roberts than to the evidence of other witnesses who said that the receipt was shown to him, but could not positively swear that this was the identical receipt. Roberts says that that receiptwas never shown to him, and the Magistrate has made no affidavit to contradict the statements on oath made by Roberts and the clerk. Under these circumstances, the Magistrate had no right to admit an important document of this kind. He had no right after the case was closed to go to the agent of one of the parties and obtain this document, which, for all we know, might have been quite another document from the one which had been shown to Roberts. The plaintiff could not well appeal against the judgment of absolution from the instance so long as the document formed part of the record, and if the record were corrected by merely removing the document from the record the defendant might be prejudiced on appeal. The better course, therefore, will be to set aside the proceedings, with costs against the defendant.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.].

GENERAL MOTIONS.

RUSSOUW v. RUSSOUW. { 1903. April 15th.

This was an application on behalf of one Martha B. J. Russouw for the appointment of a curator bonis to her husband, Paul J. Russouw, on the ground that he was of unsound mind.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the applicant; Mr. De Waal appeared in his capacity as curator ad litem.

Mr. De Villiers stated that the doctor was not in attendance to give evidence as to the state of mind of the respondent.

Mr. De Waal mentioned that he had been to Robben Island, and had had a conversation with the alleged lunatic. From his own observations he should not like the man to be declared of unsound mind. He seemed depressed and melancholy, but his answers were fairly coherent. He was confined on Robben Island as a leper. He said he felt unable to manage his affairs, and would like to have his wife appointed to look after his estate.

The Chief Justice said that the man had written a letter to the Court, in the course of which he said that he had all his senses, and felt capable of managing his estate. He also pointed out that no doctor had yet examined him.

The case was ordered to stand over for the attendance of the doctor until to-morrow (Thursday).

Postea (April 16):

Dr. Black, medical superintendent of Robben Island, said that the defendant had been on the island about five months as a leper. Witness noticed when he arrived that he was suffering from acute melancholia, with delusions. The man had very much improved of late. One of his delusions had been that his children were dead, and witness had to grant him leave so as to satisfy him of the contrary. He had thought it desirable to have another patient to specially watch the defendant, inasmuch as he did not consider that it was safe for him to be left alone. The defendant now spoke quite coherently, and was practically free from delusions. He thought the defendant might recover, but it would be some months yet. He believed the melancholia had some connection with the leprosy. He did not think that the defendant was likely to recover from his leprosy. He was in such a condition at present that he could not give directions as to the management of his affairs.

Mr. De Villiers, replying to the Chief Justice, said that the defendant's estate was worth about £1,200 or £1,300.

The Chief Justice was at a loss to know why the defendant was not dealt with under the terms of the Lunacy Act.

Dr. Black said he had no power to certify the man as a lunatic.

An order was made declaring the defendant of unsound mind and appointing his wife as curator of his property, and also directing that the interest from the property be applied to wards the maintenance of his wife and the maintenance and education of his children, and if such interest be insufficient for that purpose to supplement it by appropriating so much of the capital as may be found necessary.

Pledge—Sale—Condition.

A. borrowed from M. the sum of £20 and, in order to secure the loan, he let to M. a small erf for a period of two years at a rent equivalent to the interest on the loan, and further agreed that should he fail to repay the amount within that period the land should become the property of M., and the amount of the debt should be considered to be the purchase price thereof. A. failed to pay the debt within the two years, and M. remained in possession of the land for several years, paid the rates and taxes, and was treated by A. as the owner in every respect except that transfer was not passed. After the death of A. a rule was obtained by M., under the Land Titles Act of 1881, for the registration of the land in M.'s name. The rule was opposed by A.'s heir, who tendered the amount of the debt, but did not allege that the price agreed upon was in any way unjust or unreasonable at the time when the sale was to take effect. The Court, finding under the circumstances that the price must be considered to be fair and reasonable, made the rule absolute.

This was an application to make absolute a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act.

The application was opposed by one Sarah Schwandler.

The opposition only concerned two of the lots, in connection with which the application was made. In respect to these two, the petition stated that in or about the month of July, 1886, the petitioner advanced money to one Moss in terms of of certain transfer deeds. In terms of that agreement, upon the non-payment of the money advanced within the stipulated time, the two lots became his. He had paid all the rates and taxes due thereon. Moss died several years ago. The agreement was to the effect that petitioner should have full, free, and undisturbed possession of the lots for a period of two years; that the consideration as and for hire to be paid to Moss by petitioner should be the interest payable to Moss by petitioner, and that, if during the term of the agreement Moss should fail to pay Mabunya the money advanced, the lots should become the property of Mabunya absolutely and forever, and the sum of money advanced should be considered the entire and full purchase amount thereof.

The affidavit of Sarah Schwandler stated that she was the sister and heir to Moss, who died suddenly in December, 1890. Shortly before his death he borrowed £20 from petitioner, and handed over the title deeds of the two lots as security. On two or more occasions since her brother's death, she had tendered petitioner the £20, but he had refused it, and would not return the title deeds.

Mr. Close for the applicant; Mr. Buchanan for Mrs. Schwandler.

Mr. Close: It would seem that the attorney had a lien on the title deeds, and, of course, the applicant cannot get transfer without these. One of the conditions of this sale was that if the money was not paid on a certain date the sale should be cancelled. It is not denied that the applicant has been in possession of this land some seventeen years.

Mr. Buchanan: This case does not fall under the Derelict Lands Act. It is clear that a loan of £20 was made to the applicant, and that this land was given in pledge on condition that it should become the property of the lender of this money in the event of the loan not being repaid within two years.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is quite possible that that was a fair value for the property.]

It does not appear on affidavit that it was so, and there is, moreover, nothing to show that the parties contemplated a sale. What they did contemplate was a pledge, and a pledge cannot be sold without an order of Court. Wilson v. Shaw (1 Sheil, 299).

[De Villiers, C.J.: But here the agreement is, that if the money is not paid within two years, the land is to vest in the lender.]

But suppose that the land was worth £100, and the borrower was in such urgent necessity that he agreed to accept £20, surely the Court would not hold him to such an agreement?

Mr. Close was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: The intention of the parties is perfectly clear. By an agreement in October, 1886, Moss agrees that the applicant "shall have full, free, and undisturbed possession of this land for a term of two years. The consideration as and for hire to be given by the said Mabunga shall be the interest payable by the said Moss to the said Mabunya during the term of this agreement on the money lent by the said Mabunya to the said Moss." If the agreement had ended here then Mr. Buchanan's argument would have been conclusive; the agreement would not have been a pledge or a mortgage in the proper sense of either term, but the applicant would have had no greater rights in respect of the land than a pledgee has in respect of any article pledged to him. But then the parties deliberately entered into a further agreement: "Should Moss fail to pay the said Mabunya within the term of this agreement the sum of money due, then in such case the said land shall be and become the property of the said Mabunya absolutely and forever, and the sum of money payable by Moss to Mabunya shall be considered the entire and full purchase amount thereof." Moss failed to pay the debt within the two years, and Mabunya remained in possession of the erf for several years; he paid all the rates and taxes, and was treated by Moss as the owner in every respect, except that transfer was not passed. It is only after the death of Moss and after the applicant has obtained a rule for the registration of the land in his name that a tender is made by Moss's heiress to pay the debt. She does not allege that the price agreed upon was in any way unjust or unreasonable at the time when the sale was to take effect; on the contrary, I am inclined, under all the circumstances, to hold that the price was fair and reasonable, and was not agreed upon by way of penalty, as contended for on her behalf, but for the mutual benefit of both parties. An agreement that in case of non-payment of the debt the applicant should be entitled to buy the land for a reasonable price, to be estimated, say, by arbitrators, would have been valid. (See Dig. 18, 1, 81; Voet 20, 1, 21.) The actual agreement appears to me to have been equally valid. For these reasons I am of opinion that the petitioner is entitled to have the rule made absolute. The affidavits for the respondent do not carry the case much farther. She says that on divers occasions she has tendered the sum of £20 to the petitioner, but this tender seems to have been made many years after the right of the applicant to claim this as a sale had accrued. The rule must be made absolute, with costs of opposition.

CRAGG V. BOLTON. { 1903. April 15th.

Insolvent estate — Trustee — Accounts — Delay in filing liquidation and distribution account.

Where there is an undue delay on the part of the trustee of an insolvent estate in filing his final account of distribution, the insolvent is entitled to call upon him to file such account.

The fact that the trustee alleges that he has a claim against the wife of the insolvent is no justification for undue delay if the trustee has had ample time for enforcing such claim.

This was an application for an order compelling respondent to file a final liquidation account.

In his affidavit the applicant stated (1) that his estate was sequestrated as insolvent in or about the month of February, 1897, the exact date whereof he was uncertain. (2) That the principal outstandings due to him were book debts, the majority of his debtors living in the vicinity of East London. (3) His insolvent estate could have been liquidated long ere this, and he said that the same had not been finally liquidated owing to the negligence of the trustee, the above respondent. (4) That he was desirous of applying for his rehabilitation, and had instructed his attorneys, Messrs. Yates and Murray, of King William's Town, to call upon the respondent to file the final liquidation and distribution account, and although he (respondent) had promised to do so, he had failed to do the same.

Respondent's affidavit stated that he admitted clause 1 of the applicant's affidavit, but denied all the other allegations contained in the said affidavit. The principal assets in the estate consisted of (a) stock in trade; (b) a claim against Mrs. Cragg for about £400; (c) book debts. The stock-in-trade was old, and some of the book debts had been collected and an account rendered. There were at present no funds in hand belonging to the estate. He had endeavoured to collect the few remaining accounts, but owing to the fact that many of the book debtors did not reside in East London, and no addresses were available according to the applicant's books, nothing had been collected on that head. The applicant left the Colony shortly after his surrender, and did not in any way assist the trustee in liquidating his estate. He (respondent) could not file a statement of no assets, as the claim against Mrs. Cragg amounted to nearly £400, and he could not file an account until that claim had been settled, or, by leave of the principal creditor, abandoned. That claim arose owing to the insolvent having, as he (respondent) believed, improperly handed monies and goods to his wife to the detriment of the estate. Mrs. Cragg sold those assets, and left the country before an interdict which was obtained by him could be served upon her. Mrs. Cragg was at present at King William's Town. He had asked the chief creditor (Mr. Pascoe) to abandon the claim or guarantee the expenses of a suit against Mrs. Cragg, but he had not yet decided either course. The insolvent, in or about June last, made an offer of compromise, namely, £15 in settlement of the claim against his wife, which offer was submitted by him (respondent) to the principal creditor, who did not accept it. There had been no negligence on the part of the trustee, and he was convinced that it would be detrimental to the interests of the creditors to close the estate without pressing the claim against Mrs. Cragg.

In his answering affidavit, applicant stated that the principal assets in his estate consisted of stock and book debts, and he affirmed that the claim which the respondent stated the estate had against his wife was a fictitious one. A final order for the sequestration of his estate was granted in March, 1897, and at that time most, if not all, of the debtors lived in East London; and if the trustee had used due diligence in the liquidation of the estate the whole of the good debts could have been collected and the whereabouts of all the debtors ascertained. He left the Colony in October, 1897, and up to the time of his departure he rendered the respondent all the assistance that he could. His wife remained in East London and King William's Town until March, 1898, and during part of that time she possessed considerable landed property in East London, but no steps were taken by the trustee of his estate or by any of the creditors to bring an action against his wife for the recovery of the alleged debt of £400, and his wife had since returned to the Colony, and was now living with him in King William's Town, and still no action had been taken by the respondent against his wife in connection with the said debt. He denied that there were any further assets in his estate as stated by the respondent, and in a letter written to Messrs. Yates and Murray he (respondent) admitted himself that there were no further assets, but that the principal creditor was the person who objected to his certifying to that effect. He denied that, in or about the month of June last, he made an offer of compromise, offering £15 in settlement of the claim against his wife; but in or about the month of June last, he called upon the respondent at East London and asked him for a cheque for the sum of £35, which was due to his wife out of the said estate for rent. The respondent thereupon asked him if he claimed the whole of the £35, and he replied that he did so. Respondent thereupon asked him whether he would not accept a portion in settlement, as he considered the estate had a claim against his wife, the amount for which an account had already been rendered, and respondent suggested that he should accept £20 in full settlement of that claim. He (applicant) replied that if his acceptance of £20 would close the whole matter of his estate, and if his attorneys agreed for him to accept such amount, he would do so, but as his attorneys did not advise him to accept such amount, he had not done so. He most emphatically stated that the respondent had been guilty of negligence in the liquidation of his estate, and that the account of claim against his wife had been set forth as merely a fictitious one, and only set forward in order to delay his rehabilitation, as if such claim had been a bona-fide one the principal creditor would have instructed the trustee, and it would have been the trustee's duty to have instituted proceedings against his wife when she was possessed of landed property, whereas at present she had absolutely nothing.

Mr. Rainsford for applicant; Mr. Upington for respondent.

Mr. Rainsford: Under section 108 of the Insolvent Ordinance the trustee must file his account and plan of distribution within six months after the final sequestration, and this is so even if the funds are small. L. and S. A. Bank v. Stratford's Trustees (Buch., 1875, p. 123); Norden v. Brink (3 Menz., 270.)

[De Villiers, C.J.: The trustee has filed his account.]

Not such an account as will satisfy the terms of the Insolvent Ordinance.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How much money has the trustee in his hands?]

He says that he has no funds whatever.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then what account do you want?]

A plan showing in what way the estate has been distributed. The applicant cannot be rehabilitated till such an account and plan is filed. Ex parte Nannucci (4 Juta, 171). I submit that it is clearly the intention of the principal creditor to do everything in his power to hinder the applicant's rehabilitation.

Mr. Upington: The account mentioned in section 108 of the Insolvent Ordinance is the first account. See Re Matthews' Estate (3 H.C., 63). In this case the trustee has filed an account, and that account has been confirmed by the Court. The insolvent is, therefore, at liberty to apply for his rehabilitation at any time, but clearly the trustee cannot close his account as long as this claim against Mrs. Cragg is outstanding.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When was the estate finally sequestrated?]

In 1897.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Six years ago, and yet nothing final has been done!]

Mrs. Cragg left the country,

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why was not the matter settled before she left? And then she has been back some time.]

The trustee is in the hands of the principal creditors.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But he must use his own discretion.]

In all the cases cited for the applicant the trustee had filed no account: here he has filed an account, and I therefore submit that this is quite a novel application.

De Villiers, C.J.: I have seen the accounts from the records in the Master's Office, and it appears that the first account was filed in 1898, and that after that there was some difficulty experienced by the trustee in collecting the outstanding amounts. They did not amount to much, but the trustee stated that was an amount of £14 for goods sold by private sale, and an amount of £38 17s. 2d. in book debts, which he considered to be good and recoverable. The date of this is not given, but it could not have been long after 1898. Now, the estate was rendered insolvent in 1897. Subsequently to that date, the insolvent, the present applicant, has repeatedly requested the trustee to file his final account. Time was repeatedly given to him to do so, but notwithstanding that, up to the present time nothing has been done by the trustee. There has been no summons issued against Mrs. Cragg, against whom he alleges he has a claim. He says that there is a creditor—that one of the creditors objects to the account being filed unless Mrs. Cragg is first sued. In my opinion the trustee has had ample time to sue Mrs. Cragg—ample time before she left for England, and he has had ample time since her return. Up to the present not a single step has been taken to sue Mrs. Cragg for the recovery of the amount which she is alleged to owe to the insolvent's estate. I consider there has been undue delay on the part of the trustee, and that the applicant—being the insolvent interested in this estate, and being likely to have a difficulty in obtaining his rehabilitation unless there is a full and final account of the estate filed—is entitled to call on the trustee that he should forthwith file the account. The judgment will be as prayed, with costs, and the trustee is ordered to file his accounts within six weeks from this date.

Ex parte WILSON.

This was an application by one Harriet Ann Wilson (a) for an interdict restraining her husband from parting with certain property (b) for alimony, pending an action for divorce instituted by plaintiff against the respondent.

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the applicant, and Mr. Close for the respondent.

Mr. Benjamin moved in the first place to make absolute a rule nisi to restrain the respondent from parting with certain property, pending the action to be instituted for judicial separation, and in the second place for an order on the respondent to make a contribution to enable applicant to bring an action for judicial separation, and to pay her a certain sum of money, by way of alimony, sufficient to enable her to maintain herself pendind the said suit, and also to show cause why he should not be ordered to pay the costs of this application.

Counsel read the original order granted by the Supreme Court, in the matter of the present applicant's petition for an order restraining respondent from alienating or in any way disposing of the property in the joint estate, pending the result of an action for judicial separation, when the Court granted a rule nisi calling upon the respondent to show cause on the 14th April, 1903, why an order should not be granted as prayed.

In her affidavit the applicant set forth that (1) she was married in community of property to John Edwin Wilson, of Kenilworth, on 9th November, 1902; (2) that there was no issue of the said marriage; (3) that she intended to institute an action against her husband for judicial separation on the ground of her husband's peculiar and eccentric habits, in consequence of which she suffered great ill-treatment at his hands, so much so that her living with him was seriously endangering her life, but that she had no means wherewith to carry on her action, nor to maintain herself pending this suit; (4) that her husband was in possession of considerable immovable property at Second-avenue, Kenilworth, and other movable property, and she estimated his annual income to be about £240, in addition to which the respondent had about £150 in ready cash at the P.O. Savings Bank, Kenilworth.

The answering affidavit of the respondent stated: (1) That he had read the affidavit of applicant in the above matter. (2) Since his marriage with applicant, on 9th November, 1902, they had on the whole lived happily together, he denied that he had ever ill-treated her or used violent conduct toward her, nor had he ever endangered her life; on the contrary he had always been kind and considerate to her. (3) In September last he got to know applicant's mother; he had seen applicant before, but had never spoken to her; he spoke to applicant's mother about marrying applicant, and she wrote to the latter, who was then at Port Elizabeth; applicant thereafter came to Kenilworth, and shortly afterwards they became engaged and within a month thereafter they were married. (4) He was 50 years of age, and used to be a mariner, but for some years and until about twelve months ago he was a chimney sweeper; applicant was about 32 years of age. (5) At the time of his marriage with applicant he possessed nine houses and land and other movable property, as stated by the applicant. Applicant and her mother were well aware of this fact, as he had informed them both of his position before they were engaged and married. (6) About a month after their marriage applicant's mother persistently asked him to get his will drawn up, and subsequently applicant and he went to Mr. Wolfe and instructed him to draw up their will, by which they agreed that on his death all his property should go to her, with the exception of certain two houses, which were to go to his son. Applicant, however, left him before this will was signed. (7) Applicant brought no property whatever into the community. In the four months during which they lived together he gave her about £70, out of which she was to pay the household expenses. He considered that amount to be twice as much as people in their position and circumstances ought to spend. (8) Applicants mother lived with them in the house free of charge; her brother also lived in one of his (respondent's) cottages at a lower rent than the other tenants. (9) On 26th February last, after applicant and he had had some words about his treatment of a kitten he went to his agent, Mr. Wolfe, and instructed him to give applicant's mother and brother notice, which he did. (10) About noon on the following day (27th) applicant and her mother, after the latter had received notice to quit, left the house, and applicant had not returned to him, nor had she been to the house since. (11) He had always been, and still was ready and willing to receive applicant and take her back as his wife. (12) Applicant left him of her own accord, without lawful cause and against his wishes, and he declined to pay her any sum to enable her to institute proceedings for judicial separation, or to contribute anything towards her support. He intended applying to the hon. Court for restitution of conjugal rights or for a decree of divorce on the ground of applicant's unlawful desertion, and for an order declaring her to have forfeited her half share in the community of property.

The affidavits of Jane Barnett and George Bowes, neighbours of the parties to the cause, stated that, so far as they could see, respondent treated his wife very well indeed, and applicant and respondent were on the very best of terms with one another.

The answering affidavit of the applicant denied that they lived happily together, or that her husband never ill-treated her. About one month after their marriage respondent commenced using the most violent and obscene language towards her, and they quarrelled very frequently, the quarrels being due to his bad conduct and austere habits. She admitted paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 of the respondent's affidavit, excepting that she verily believed the respondent's age to be about 57 years of age instead of 50. She was not aware that her mother ever induced or persuaded respondent to have his will drawn up, but she admitted the rest of paragraph 6. She received the rent from the houses, and received in all the sum of £48 15s., out of which she paid for furniture and interest on the bond on the property and other necessaries the sum of £28 12s. 9d., leaving a balance of £20 12s. 5d. for actual household expenditure during a period of four months. On the night of 26th February last respondent caught hold of her round the throat and inflicted injury on her neck. She was in a perpetual state of terror owing to the fact that respondent frequently slept with a knife under his pillow at night. Respondent further had a revolver, with which he repeatedly threatened to shoot her. She considered her life was not safe with him, and, consequently, she was compelled to leave him. She refused to go back to respondent, as living with him was dangerous and intolerable. She denied that she left of her own accord; it was respondent's ill-treatment of her that drove her away. She was now informed and verily believed that respondent ill-treated his former wife, who left him with some members of her family, and resided for some years away from him, and that he had quarrelled with his children, his daughter deserting him, the cause of this being due to his intemperate and violent habits.

The affidavit by David Romans, brother-in-law of the applicant, stated that shortly after the marriage respondent became very abusive towards the applicant, and at times used the most obscene and violent language towards her. They did not live very happily together. One day in December applicant brought him a knife, which she informed him respondent kept under his pillow at night, and asked him to destroy same. On the 27th February the applicant came to him and showed him some marks on her neck, which she informed him, and which he verily believed, had been inflicted by the respondent. He considered that living with the respondent was dangerous and intolerable, as he had very austere habits. He remembered on one occasion that respondent visited his house, and while there fired off a revolver, the bullet passing through the kitchen door of his house; that was done because respondent thought his son had thrown some stones on the roof of his (Romans') house. To his knowledge respondent did not live happily with his former wife, and he quarrelled with various members of his family, and his daughter also left him.

The affidavit of Harriet Ann Wilson, mother of the applicant, stated that shortly after the marriage respondent became very abusive, and frequently used the most obscene language towards his wife. She remembered on the evening of the 26th February, 1903, respondent caught hold of his wife round the throat, and inflicted injuries on her neck. Respondent frequently slept with a knife under his pillow, and also had a revolver, with which he threatened to shoot his wife. She considered living with him was intolerable and dangerous. She denied ever having induced or persuaded respondent to have his will drawn up.

The further answering affidavit of the respondent stated that the affidavits of applicant and Romans and H. M. Rodgers were only served on his attorney at eleven o'clock on the morning of the 14th inst., and he had not had time to reply fully thereto. He admitted that he kept a revolver and a sailor's knife in his bedroom, but he emphatically denied that he ever threatened applicant therewith on any way. On one occasion, and one only, he slept with the knife under his pillow. That was one night when he heard some one about the house, and as he could not find the key of the drawer in which his revolver was locked, he took his knife out and left it under his pillow, whence it must have been taken by applicant, as he had not seen it since. On the evening of the 26th February, applicant wanted to leave the bedroom, so he rushed to the door and stopped her. She then rushed to the window, and he then said: "If you want to go out so badly, I will let you," and opened the door and she went out. He never ill-treated his former wife, and they lived together for thirty years. He admitted firing off a revolver to frighten off some people who were throwing stones on the roof of Romans' house.

Mr. Benjamin for the applicant; Mr. Close for respondent.

After argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: There has undoubtedly been some slight degree of violence shown by the respondent towards the applicant. I think it is a case in which the parties should come to terms and live together, but if they do not, then the action to be brought must be instituted forthwith, and brought to trial during the May term. As to alimony, I do not think alimony should be granted, but the sum of £50 must be paid by the respondent to the applicant's attorney to enable her to bring an action. The costs of both applications must be paid by the respondent. I repeat that in the interests of applicant herself, it would be well for her to consider the advisability of being reconciled, because it is not likely that she will succeed in her action unless the cruelty is shown to be of such a nature that it is impossible for her to live with him.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

ILLIQUID ROLL.

SMITH AND CO. v. DIXON. { 1903. April 16th.

This was an application under rule 329d, on the motion of Mr. Upington for judgment under rule 329d for £251 9s. 8d.

Order granted.

LYONS v. CUSHING.

This was an application to have a rule nisi granted by the Court made absolute, restraining the respondent or any one acting on his behalf from disposing of or alienating certain twenty shares in the Frank Cushing Syndicate, pending an action to be brought by the applicant against the respondent for the 20 shares to which he claimed to be entitled.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that in 1902 a syndicate was formed by the respondent, Paul Frank Cushing, whose interest was to extend to 40 shares and in consideration of services rendered by the applicant, the respondent agreed to give him a full half share of all his interest in the said syndicate and any further interest that he might acquire by way of options or be in any way whatsoever possessed of. The petitioner said that the respondent had left Cape Town, and that he had no knowledge of his present whereabouts, and that the respondent had granted power of attorney to one John St. Leger. He had presented the said agreement, but he had not received the shares that he was entitled to. The said shares, owing to the discovery of tin on the property of the said syndicate, had risen considerably in value.

The affidavit of John St. Leger stated that he was chairman of the syndicate, and he had perused the affidavit of the applicant. He held power of attorney from the respondent, Paul Frank Cushing. The latter was entitled to 40 shares from the syndicate. On the 30th January deponent purchased 17 of the said 40 shares for £400, and respondent duly executed a cession of the said shares in his favour. On the 12th February the respondent left this colony for America. On the 6th March it was resolved at a meeting of the syndicate that all certificates should be made out, audited, and scrip issued forthwith. The applicant was present at the meeting. Seven shares belonging to the respondent which had been sold were transferred to the purchasers by the directors. Applicant did not tell deponent or the board of directors that he held a cession until the 16th March, 1905, but he called upon witness on the 19th March and demanded that the shares to which he alleged he was entitled should be transferred to him The respondent was still absent from the Colony, and was not expected to return for about three months. Deponent had received a letter from him dated Southampton, in which he asked Mr. St. Leger not to let S. A. Lyons have any of his stock when he showed him a paper that he (respondent) had given him. "He told me," the writer proceeded, "if I did not give him half of my stock he would not vote for me to get any pay for my work; he got this stock by fraud, so if you give him my scrip I will go to Court and show why he should not have it, as he got it by false pretences.

In an answering affidavit, the petitioner said that in regard to what took place as to the purchase of shares he said John St. Leger said that he had 15 shares for sale, and that he offered them for sale, and that he (deponent) agreed to take half. He cautioned the said John St. Leger not to sell above 20 of the shares belonging to the respondent as he had an option upon half. Very shortly afterwards he found that the said John St. Leger was seeking to get a very large number of shares in the name of the respondent registered in the name of others. It was at the express wish of the respondent that he did not produce the document as the respondent said that it might prejudice him in his business.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the applicant; Mr. Benjamin for the respondent.

After hearing counsel in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: I am of opinion that this rule must be made absolute. The respondent had entered into an agreement under date 31st October, 1902, in which he undertook in consideration of services rendered and cash advances to give and grant to the applicant a full half share of all his interest in the Frank Cushing Syndicate, inclusive of his shares in the said syndicate, and any further interest that he might acquire by way of options or in any way whatsoever. It is common cause that Cushing was possessed of 40 shares, and, consequently Cushing had no right to transfer more than 20 shares, and in point of fact he had not actually transferred more than 20 shares. But it appears that he has sold 24 shares, and as to those remaining 4 shares I am of opinion that he should not be allowed to register those in the name of the purchaser. It appears that the purchaser of them is Mr. St. Leger himself, who has the general power of the respondent, and who has already purchased 17 shares from the respondent, which have been registered in his name. It is not proposed to touch those 17. They have been duly registered in Mr. St. Leger's name, and they will remain so registered. Three more shares have been registered in the name of other purchasers. They will remain so registered. As to the remaining 3, which are still in the name of the respondent, I am of opinion that applicant is entitled to an order that they shall not be registered in the name of any other person, pending the action to be brought by applicant against respondent. It is said there has been a letter by the respondent to Mr. St. Leger stating that this arrangement had been obtained by fraud. A vague allegation of that kind cannot be allowed to prevail as against the express statement made on oath by the applicant. He affirms this arrangement, which on the face of it appears to be bona fide, and until the a Court of Law has declared the transaction to be a fraudulent one the Court must assume it to be a honest one, and act upon it. The rule must be made absolute with costs.

LOXTON BROS. AND CO. V. DE KLERCK.

Mr. De Villiers said that that was the return day of a rule nisi granted on the 27th January, calling on the defendant to show cause on the 12th February why the surplus realised from the sale of certain property should not be declared executable in part satisfaction of judgments obtained by the plaintiffs against the defendant, together with costs of the application. On the 12th February the return day was extended to give an opportunity of serving notice by registered letter, he believed, upon the defendant, who appeared to have gone to German South-West Africa.

Order granted.

WERNER v. KUKARD. { 1903. April 16th.

Transfer of property sold—Contempt.

Where the vendor of certain property had been ordered to pass transfer, but stated that the title deeds were not in his possession, the Court ordered him to pass transfer by a certain date or to show cause on or before that date why he should not be committed for contempt of Court.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order authorising the transfer of certain property. He said that the applicant sought an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds at the British-German village of King William's Town to pass transfer of certain two pieces of freehold land or quitrent in the possession of the respondent. The application was in terms of a judgment, the applicant to pay the respondent the sum of £225, being the purchase price of the said property, subject to certain deductions.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You have already judgment to pass transfer.]

Yes, but the defendant refuses to pass transfer, or rather the defendant is willing, but he has not got the title deeds.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Where are they?]

They are in the hands of his wife, who is not living with him, and who declined to give them up.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He must get them from the wife.]

Mr. De Villiers: Of course, the notice of motion could have been served on the wife also.

De Villiers, C.J.: We have had previous cases in which defendants have refused to transfer property which they had lawfully sold, and the Court has authorised the Sheriff in such cases to pass the transfer. But in the present case it would appear that there is no absolute refusal by the respondent to pass transfer and that he alleges impossibility. If it had been clear that the respondent was in possession of the title deeds and refused to pass transfer, the Court might have appointed the Sheriff to pass transfer. But that is not clear, and, in fact, it is suggested that the wife has the deeds. Anyhow, there is an order as I understand that he is to pass transfer. The Court will now reiterate that order. He will be allowed until the last day of next term to pass transfer, and if he does not do so within that time, he must show cause in the Supreme Court why he should not be committed for contempt of Court. He will have ample time now to take all the necessary steps to get the title-deeds from his wife and to pass transfer. If this is not done by the last day of the next term, then he shall show cause why he should not be committed for contempt, the respondent to pay costs of the application.

REDELINGHUYS v. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. April 16th.

Arbitration—Award – Expropriation for railway purposes.

In deciding upon the amount of compensation to be paid to the owner of a farm for the expropriation for railway purposes of a portion of the homestead arbitrators are justified in estimating such portion at a much greater value than the rest of the farm.

This was a motion to have an award of arbitrators made a rule of Court.

The affidavit of the applicant showed that the main line of the Cape Government Railways Western System) passed over a farm in the district of Tulbagh belonging to the respondent. With a view of easing the gradient of the said railway line, the respondent, who was the General Manager of Railways, gave notice to the applicant that they proposed to expropriate certain of his land for railway purposes. This was done. The applicant then claimed compensation, on the ground that the land expropriated formed part of land which had been "improved by cultivation, irrigation, or otherwise." The respondent offered £275 in satisfaction of any claim that the applicant might have for damage. This was refused by the applicant as wholly insufficient, and in the end it was agreed to refer the matter to arbitration. The arbitrators appointed took evidence, and awarded the applicant £965 as compensation, along with costs. The terms of the award were communicated to the department's solicitor. Mr. Maasdorp, who, in reply, objected to the form of procedure, saying that he ought to have been present when the award was opened, and declining to attend at the offices of the applicant's attorney to inspect the award, and claiming that he had a right to inspect the award at his own office. He stated further that he intended to contest the validity of the award, because (1) the damages were not specified therein, and (2) if, as he presumed, prospective damages were awarded, on that point also. The applicant's attorneys replied that they were not prepared to give up the award, and that the award could not be held by both parties, and they submitted that the applicant, as the successful party, was entitled to hold it. They, however, would give facilities to the department's solicitor to inspect the award.

The affidavit of Mr. Maasdorp stated that originally the applicant claimed £1,250, of which £240 was set down for actual damage, and the rest was claimed for prospective damage. It was obvious from the figures given that the arbitrators included prospective damage, which the award stated was not a matter submitted to them. The department's representatives objected at the time to any evidence being given as to prospective damage, but the objection was overruled. The award was vague, and it should disclose how the damage was arrived at. As it now stood, it contained nothing that would prevent a further claim being made. The arbitrators had gone beyond the terms of the reference, inasmuch as they had not confined themselves to damage to land which had been "improved by cultivation, irrigation, or otherwise."

The answering affidavit of G. M. Walker stated that he was present at the arbitration proceedings, representing applicant. The tract expropriated cut through the applicant's homestead, which was situated on the hillside. At the inquiry evidence was lead to show that land prepared by the applicant for planting trees had been expropriated; that the applicant's private road leading to Tulbagh village had been destroyed for some distance; that his stone kraal had been wholly cut through, and that its material had been almost wholly removed and converted into concrete for railway culverts; that his dwelling-house would crack from top to bottom so soon as the train commenced running, and would be uninhabitable; that his outbuildings would also be damaged, and would have to be materially strengthened to stand the shock of passing trains; that his yard had been so narrowed that he would not be able henceforth to turn his wagon and team therein; and that the homestead generally had been materially injured and lessened in value. It did not appear in the official shorthand writer's record of evidence, but the applicant gave evidence on oath to show that the wall of his residence had already been cracked as the result of a dynamite charge exploded by the respondent's servants in the course of their operations. The crack, an extensive one, was pointed out by him. He (Mr. Walker) was not aware that the arbiters in making their award took into consideration any matter outside the scope of the reference committed to them.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., appeared for the applicants, and Mr. H. Jones for the respondent Government.

Sir Henry Juta, in argument, said there was the award, and it was difficult to see on what ground the award should not be made a rule of Court. The first objection made was on the ground that the damage was not specified. There was no need to specify the damage. The second ground appeared to him to be that the respondent surmised prospective damage was allowed. That was not in the award, and he did not know what respondent meant unless he meant damage to the house and outbuildings, which was certainly not prospective damage. The respondent seemed to go on the ground that the award was vague. The land being improved land, the applicant was naturally entitled to compensation, and if the Government built their railway so close to his house it would tumble down when trains were running that was not prospective damage.

Mr. Howell Jones, in argument, said the opposition to the award being made a rule of Court was based on the principle that the arbitrators exceeded their scope of jurisdiction in the deed of submission, and they went on wrong principles in assessing the amount of compensation. Evidence was given upon certain items, and those items did not amount to anything like the £965 which they awarded. It seemed to him perfectly clear that the Board went into the question of the reduction of the value of the farm, owing to the railway being brought across it, although the arbitrators did not say so. Evidence was allowed to be taken and recorded about the value of the house and the general inconvenience caused to the applicant. It seemed the Board went on the principle that they had to value the whole of the farm, and compare the value of the farm when having a railway across it with its value without a railway. He submitted that was a wrong principle. They ought to have valued the 2½ morgen taken by the Government. The present proceeding was really under an old Ordinance, No. 9, of 1858, and he submitted the Government had a perfect right to take that land for railway purposes if not improved. It appeared that the 2½ morgen were improved land, and that a certain amount of clearing had been done, on which about £20 was spent. The Government would clearly have been bound to compensate the owner for damage done in connection with his improvements, but though the Government was bound to give the applicant compensation for the strip of improved land they took, they were not bound to give him compensation for alleged damage done to his whole farm. That was not the intention of section 12 of Act 9 of 1858. It was perfectly clear that if the 2½ morgen which the Government took to run their railway over was not cultivated or had not been improved in any way, they would not have had to pay compensation, although the rest of the applicant's farm might have been very valuable, and his house shook ever so much by reason of the railway, and if his house was a most valuable house. Besides the 2½ morgen that had been expropriated and the £20 expended on clearing ground, there was a kraal which had been demolished, and there was a road which the Government had cut through, and some damage to applicant was caused through the road being no longer there, and the Government was perfectly prepared to pay for those things. He contended it was perfectly competent for the Court to remit the case to the arbitrators for a detailed statement in connection with this award, and he submitted that the case be remitted for the arbitrators to show how they awarded the damages, how much in respect of the 2½ morgen of land which had been actually taken, and whether they awarded anything in respect to actual damage done to the house. The award was vague. The deed of submission was for the arbitrators to value 2½ morgen of land expropriated. He applied that the case be remitted to the arbitrators to state the amount they placed on the piece of land expropriated, and if any amount was awarded for damage to the house to state it; and the arbitrators to be asked if they took into consideration prospective damages.

Sir H. Juta was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: The terms of the deed of submission are very wide, and they leave the question of compensation to be paid to the applicant entirely in the hands of the arbitrators and the umpire. The deed recites that it had been decided to expropriate part of this farm, measuing 2½ morgen, for the purpose of constructing a railway. That differences had arisen as to the amount of compensation to be paid to the said applicant by the Cape Government Railways, and that the parties had agreed by these presents in the most absolute and irrevocable manner to submit the amount of recompense and compensation to those arbitrators and to the umpire. Now the arbitrators and the umpire have met and, as far as I can judge, this verdict is a unanimous one. The arbitrator suggested by the Government agrees with the arbitrator suggested by the applicant and with the umpire in awarding the sum of £965 to the applicant, and this Court is now asked to say that they ought not to have done it, that they have taken prospective damages into consideration, and that their verdict is too vague. It does not appear that they have been taking prospective damages into consideration. All that appears is that "the subject matter of the written reference having been gone into by us and having heard the parties, witnesses and attorneys present, and considered the correspondence and documents, we hereby award as follows—to the claimant in respect of his claim the sum of £965 sterling and costs." It is admitted that 2½ morgen of the land were taken, and it is admitted that a portion at all events of the land so expropriated passes in the immediate proximity of the applicant's residence. To my mind the arbitrators are quite justified in attaching a high value to this land which goes through his kraal, and is in immediate proximity to his house, and it is not reasonable for the Court to suppose that prospective damages and other matters were taken into consideration. It is quite likely that they attached a high value to this land, improved in the way in which it has been, being part of the land of the applicant passing in the immediate proximity of his residence, crossing his kraal, and in other ways injuring his property. No doubt the amount does appear to be high, but that is not a question for this Court. It is for parties who appoint arbitrators to see that proper persons are selected. If the arbitrator selected by the Government has been weak and yielded to his co-arbitrators, then I suppose the Government in future will avoid appointing him as arbitrator. But has he yielded? He has agreed with the other arbitator, and this Court should not constitute itself a Court of Appeal to inquire into decisions of arbitrators. So long as they act honestly and impatially, and there is no proof in the present case that they have not acted honestly and impartially, and so long as they act within the scope of the powers conferred upon them, their award should not be interfered with, even though the Court should be of opinion that a smaller amount would have been sufficient compensation. It appears that the attorney for the respondent was not present when the award was delivered, but that was his fault, as he left before it was delivered. It must have been known that the award was to have been delivered at that time. There appears to me to be no reason for overriding this verdict, and the award must be made a rule of Court.

WALPOLE V. PALMER AND OTHERS.

Mr. Upington applied for an order for trial by jury in a pending action for libel.

Sir Henry Juta, representing the defendant, Palmer, said he was instructed to oppose the application on the ground that certain costs had not been paid. He admitted that the plaintiff had a right to demand trial by jury in an action of this nature. He would, however, point out that the Court had, in a previous application in connection with this matter, on certain exceptions taken to the declaration, given judgment in favour of the respondent in certain respects, with costs; those costs had not been paid, and on behalf of his client he was briefed to object to anything further being done till they were paid. He understood those costs had been paid since he was instructed in the matter and after counsel had appeared. He held that plaintiff was liable for the fresh costs incurred.

Mr. Upington suggested that the costs might be costs in the cause.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think the costs should be costs in the cause. The Court orders the case to be taken by trial by jury, and the costs to be costs in the cause.]

Sir Henry Juta pointed out that the Court had decided more than once that where judgment in previous proceedings had been given against the applicant, the applicant could not go on till he had paid the costs adjudged; that was a rule that had been acted on for many years. His client was entitled to come here and say the action for libel could not be gone on with till the costs were paid.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I have nothing to add to what I have said.]

Mr. Upington: I do not see what payment of costs has to do with the question whether this case should be tried by a jury or not. I would ask the Court to fix a day for trial by jury.

De Villiers, C.J.: Perhaps I may add this, that the question now is not whether the plaintiff shall be allowed to proceed; it is simply as to the mode of procedure for the future. In case he had not satisfied all the requirements, it would be quite competent for the defendant to object to the case being set down for trial by jury until the costs had been paid. But that is not the point now. I think the suggestion was made previously that it was a case in which the trial should take place by jury, and all I decide now is that in case the plaintiff proceeds further with his action that action should be tried by jury and not by the Court. That is all that I can say. As for the question of costs, that is a matter to be decided later. The date of trial will be fixed for Wednesday, 27th May.

KRAMER AND BIGLEY.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., moved that a rule nisi ganted by the Court, on February 26, restraining the bank from parting with a sum of £146 11s. 5d., standing to defendant's credit, be made absolute.

Rule made absolute.

DUNN V. CLARK.

Mr. Close applied for leave to sign judgment against plaintiff in a cause in which his client was the defendant, the period fixed by the Court within which plaintiff was to file process having elapsed, and the plaintiff being barred from proceeding further under rule of Court 105; also for a refund of £6 paid in to the High Sheriff.

Order granted as prayed.

MCKENZIE AND CO. V BAGLEY.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers applied for a rule nisi to be made absolute. A rule nisi was granted by Sir John Buchanan in Chambers on 2nd April, calling upon the manager of the Standard Bank, Cape Town, to show cause on the 14th April why an order should not be granted interdicting him from parting with a sum of money standing to the credit of the defendant, and declaring the said sum executable in satisfaction of a judgment of the Court obtained by plaintiff against the defendant on 26th February, 1903, for the sum of £154 13s. 11d., with interest a tempora morœ and costs of suit, the rule to operate as an interdict in the meantime. Counsel also applied that this sum be executable for the costs of the present application, and of the judgment given under rule 329 d.

Rule made absolute, with costs as prayed.

DAY V. DAY.

Mr. Buchanan applied for leave to sue by edictal citation. The petitioner (D. S. Day, of Victoria West) was married to the respondent at Bloemfontein on 14th June, 1898, in community of property. Application was made to sue the wife for restitution of conjugal rights, or for a divorce on the grounds of desertion, and forfeiture of the benefits under the community, also for notice of trial to be served together with the edictal citation.

The Chief Justice said he would like to have further information as to the domicile of the plaintiff before making any order.

Ex parte ARROWSMITH AND WIFE.

Mr. Buchanan applied for leave to register an antenuptial contract. James A. Arrowsmith and Bertha M. Arrowsmith (born Day) were married on 5th June, 1895. Before that date a contract was signed by both petitioners, under which the wife (who was at that time under age) received substantial benefits in consideration of the marriage. Five days after the contract was handed to the Registrar of Deeds, Cape Town, who rejected the document on the ground of the petitioner being a minor, required the assistance of her father. The father was now in a lunatic asylum. Application was made for the ratifying of the signing by the second petitioner, assisted by her mother, and for the registration of the contract.

Application granted.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte POSTMA. { 1903. April 17th.

Mr. Buchanan moved, on behalf of the petitioner, in his capacity as secretary of the fund for the past ministers of the Dutch Reformed Church and their widows and orphans for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to issue certified copies of certain bonds which, it was supposed, had been destroyed by fire. The bonds related principally to property in the district of Albert and of Steynsburg, and had been in the custody of the Rev. Mr. Kotze, who was formerly the secretary of the fund. The amounts were: £175, £250, £125, £100, £400, and £175. It appeared that the Rev. Mr. Kotze was removed by the military authorities from Pietersburg, and that he had placed in a satchel the bonds in question, along with other papers, and had placed the satchel on a table in the parsonage. The authorities, however, refused permission to remove the documents, and Mr. Kotze left them behind. While he was in Kimberley, in March, 1901, the parsonage was destroyed by fire, and the petitioner believed that the documents in question perished at the same time Diligent inquiry had been made, but the bonds had not been traced. The only difficulty, said counsel, was in regard to a bond, which had undergone one or two cessions, which had not been registered, but in regard to this an attorney could speak as to executing the cessions.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is clear that some relief should be given in the present case. There is no doubt that Mr. Kotze was in possession of these bonds, that the military refused him permission to remove them, that the parsonage in which they were kept was destroyed by fire, and that, consequently, there is reason to believe that these bonds have been destroyed by the fire. That seems also to have been the opinion of the Colonial Secretary of the Orange River Colony, who says that a thorough search has been made, but no trace has been found of the missing documents. The parsonage was, he says, destroyed by fire in March, 1901, and it is clear that the documents were destroyed by fire at the same time. I think that there should be a rule granted so that the persons interested may be able to show cause. You may take a rule, calling on all concerned to show cause on the 1st May, the rule to be once published in "Ons Land," once in another Cape Town newspaper, and once in another Dutch newspaper, circulating in the district of Albert

STOTT V. SMITH.

Mr. Close moved for an order requiring the plaintiff to find security for the costs of an action. Mr. Close suggested that the amount should be fixed at £100.

Mr. Rainsford, for the plaintiff in the action thought that £40 would be sufficient.

An order was granted, the amount of security being fixed at £40, costs to be costs in the cause.

GOLDSTEIN V. GOLDSTEIN.

This was a motion for a rule nisi to be made absolute. The rule nisi had been granted restraining the Standard Bank from parting with any funds standing in the name of the late Bertha Goldstein, and also restraining her daughters from disposing of any moneys or property belonging to the estate of the said Bertha Goldstein pending the appointment of an executor according to law. The affidavit of Mr. Syfret, of Cape Town, attorney-at-law, set forth that he had received a cablegram from Mr. Edmonds, solicitor, London, asking him to stop payment of any moneys in the estate and to look out for the arrival of one, Emily Scott. He had caused inquiries to be made at 3, Orange-street, Cape Town, with regard to the alleged death of Bertha Goldstein, and he had obtained confirmation of the fact. The mail boat Norman, which he presumed was the boat referred to, was not due until the 14th inst. He had examined the records in the office of the Master of the Supreme Court, and he was unable to find that any death notice or any inventory had been filed in connection with the estate of the said Bertha Goldstein. He desired to take steps to prevent the disposition of the effects of the said Bertha Goldstein until an executor had been appointed according to law. The affidavit of John Toerien, master boot maker, 8, Orange-street, stated that on or about the 20th February, 1903, Bertha Goldstein hired two rooms in his house for herself and two daughters, whose names he subsequently learnt were Ida and May. When in conversation with the said Bertha Goldstein he learnt that she was possessed of considerable property, which included a large cash balance in the Standard Bank and also some shares. Whilst residing with him she opened a milliner's shop and registry office in Orange-street, and for this purpose disbursed considerable sums of money. She told him she was not compelled to do this, but, owing to constant disagreements between herself and her two daughters, she desired to have something to occupy her time. There were frequent altercations between mother and daughters, the said Bertha Goldstein openly stating that her daughters desired her death in order to succeed to her property, but in this they would be disappointed, for everything had been left to her second son. On or about the 9th March she was taken ill, and, during the few days she was ill, she on several occasions repeated the statement. On the 14th March she was seized with a fit and died, and thereafter the two daughters left his house. In consequence of arrears of rent, he detained certain articles, including gold bracelets, which had been worn by the deceased, but he afterwards received a letter from Messrs. Herold and Gie, requiring him to return the said articles to the two daughters, and with this he complied.

Mr. Buchanan for applicant; Mr. Upington for respondent.

Mr. Upington said that, before he read the answering affidavit, he would point out that they did not know who was the applicant. There was an affidavit from Mr. Syfret saying that he had received instructions from one Edmonds, a solicitor, but they really did not know who was appearing to make this application.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It does seem extraordinary.]

Mr. Buchanan: The cablegram is what is depended upon. It is from the solicitor in London who seems to be acting for Emily Scott, who is one of the daughters of the deceased. The cablegram when decoded reads "Willie Scott," but that is a mistake. She is a married daughter of the deceased.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Her son, she said, was her heir. Is he a party at all?]

Mr. Buchanan: We have no instructions from him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When will you have the particulars?]

Mr. Buchanan: Mrs. Scott has come out. She has had an interview with the attorney, Mr. Syfret, but she has not been seen since. She came out by the Norman.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think I should postpone this application.]

Mr. Buchanan: It seems to me a peculiar state of affairs. There has not been time really to hear from Mr. Edmonds, the solicitor. The cable was dated Thursday, the 2nd April.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How much is there in her name in the bank?]

Mr. Buchanan: Of that I have no information. I may point out that no inventory or death notice has been filed in this matter by the two daughters.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It appears to be a case that requires further investigation.]

Mr. Upington said he was instructed by his attorneys that Mrs. Scott had returned to England by the Dunvegan Castle, and that the two respondents had cabled Home for a copy of the will. Counsel proceeded to read the copy, and said that it was clear from that document that Mrs. Scott had only at the most a reversionary interest, and that she had no interest at all if Marion and Ida were living. He was bound to add that it was only a certified copy that he was reading from, sent in reply to a cable, and that it was dated the 25th March, 1897.

De Villiers, C.J.: I think the case must be postponed sine die, interdict to continue in operation, with leave to either party to move the Court. At present we have no information, but as soon as either party gets sufficient information, he may move the Court further.

Ex parte HOLDERNESS. { 1903. April 17th.

Attorney — Admission — Rhodesian examiner.

On the application of an attorney who after examination in Rhodesia had been admitted to practice there, the Court admitted him to practice as an attorney of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Buchanan moved on behalf of applicant for leave to be admitted as an attorney-at-law and notary public, or in the alternative, for the appointment of examiners to examine him as to his fitness to practise as an attorney-at-law and notary public.

Mr. Upington watched the case in the interests of the Law Society.

The affidavit of applicant showed that he had been articled to Mr. Patrick Charles John Coghlan at Kimberley, and, with the exception of a short period during which he had served with His Majesty's forces while he was at Kimberley, he had continually devoted himself to the study of the law. He had been admitted, after examination, in the High Court of Southern Rhodesia.

Mr. Upington said that the Law Society had no objection to this application, and he was instructed to suggest to the Court that the petition be granted, in the terms of the alternative prayer, i.e., that examiners be appointed.

Mr. Buchanan thought that the examination of the Court of Southern Rhodesia ought to suffice.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I have no doubt that he is quite competent, but this Court has had no opportunity of judging as to his competency. You may take your order, on condition that he be examined by the examiners of this Court. He is here, is he not?]

Mr. Buchanan: No, he is in Bulawayo.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose he is going to practise here?]

Mr. Buchanan said the applicant was at Kimberley for a number of years, and he might wish to come back to Kimberley to practise, and so be an attorney of the Supreme Court.

De Villiers, C.J.: I think, under the special circumstances, the Court will amend the order, because if I were to appoint an examination in Southern Rhodesia, I would probably appoint the same gentleman as have already examined him. It is no use having a second examination. The order will be granted as prayed.

Mr. Buchanan said he had omitted to ask where the oath was to be administered.

De Villiers, C.J.: The oath can be taken before the Registrar of the High Court of Southern Rhodesia.

Ex parte BADENHORST.

Attorney—Reinstatement.

Mr. Benjamin moved on behalf of petitioner for his reinstatement as an attorney and notary. Petitioner, he said, was suspended from practice on the 13th February, 1902, on being convicted of treason. He was sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment but now, before the full term had expired, he had been set at liberty under the amnesty granted by the Government.

Mr. Upington said that, as representing the Law Society, he did not oppose the application.

De Villiers, C.J., said that he consulted with his brother Buchanan before he left, and he had consulted with his brother Maasdorp, and they had come to the conclusion that under the circumstances, if no further objection were raised by the Law Society, readmission should be granted. The application would be granted.

Ex parte SCHOLTZ

Attorney—Reinstatement—Costs.

Mr. De Waal moved on behalf of the petitioner for leave to be reinstated as an attorney and notary.

Mr. Benjamin, as representing the Law Society, said that he had no objection to raise except that when the applicant was suspended his lordship awarded costs to the Law Society, and these costs had not yet been paid.

Application granted subject to petitioner first paying costs due to the society.

Ex parte DREYER AND OTHERS.

This was an application for leave to sell certain property known as Riverside, Main-street, Newlands. From the affidavits of the applicants it appeared that the three first named petitioners, who were unmarried, were the surviving beneficiaries under the will of their sister, Bessie Coburn, who had died in Ceylon. They were unable and had not the means of keeping in repair and order the property, and it was suffering from neglect, and would deteriorate in value. They asked to be allowed to dispose of the property by public auction, the proceeds to be invested under proper security. Otherwise there was a sum of £3,500 in the hands of the General Estate and Orphan Chamber, who were administering the estate of the said Bessie Coburn in the terms of the said will, the interest of which the three first named petitioners were entitled to, and they asked to be allowed from this sum £200 towards their maintenance and support, and keeping the house in a proper state of repair. Mr. Benjamin (for applicant) stated the matter had not been before the Master. Under the will, unborn issue might be interested, the children of the petitioners. The position of the Master was that inasmuch as there were no de facto minors interested it was not necessary for him to consider the matter.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the provision with regard to the money in the Orphan Chamber?]

Mr. Benjamin: The money in the Orphan Chamber is invested in the interests of the three sisters, and then, after their death, the heirs of Dreyer, who is dead.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I should have thought the best course would be to borrow £200 on mortgage on this property and place it in repair, and if it is too large for the petitioners they may let it, and let it very well, and they can occupy a smaller house.]

Postea, April 22.

The Court granted an order as prayed.

Ex parte MARINUS.

Mr. Benjamin moved for leave to join in the partition of certain property at Mowbray in which the petitioner had a life interest to the extent of one-eighth share, and to raise sufficient money on his share to repair his house and bear the costs of the application and subsequent action. Petitioner's children also had an interest in the property, and he could not join in the partition without an order of Court. An action had been commenced by one Wooley to compel a partition of the property in question.

Order granted in terms of prayer.

Ex parte CLOETE AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an order authorising the proposed sale of certain property in the district of Cradock, in which five minor children were interested. The Master reported favourably on the proposed sale, and said that a number of beneficiaries were interested in a farm of 33 morgen, and it would be better to sell the farm and retain the proceeds, the shares of the minors to be paid into the Guardians' Fund.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

SAUNDERS V. SAUNDERS { 1903. April 17th.

This was an application for leave to sue by edictal citation for the restitution of conjugal rights, or failing that, divorce, on the ground of malicious desertion, and also for the forfeiture of respondent's half-share of the community of property.

Mr. Benjamin, for the petitioner, said that she was born at Graham's Town, and she was married to the respondent in 1888. The parties afterwards resided at Kimberley, and the petitioner found it necessary to travel for the benefit of her health in 1897. While absent from home, she received a letter from her husband declining to support her or the three children of the marriage. She subsequently saw the respondent, and he again refused to support her, and since that interview she had heard nothing from him. The husband was presumed to be in London, England, and had not been heard of during the last four years.

An order was made calling upon the respondent to show cause by the 1st August, personal service to be effected if possible, failing which, citation to be published once in the "Daily Telegraph."

Ex parte JOUBERT AND OTHERS.

This was an application by the executors under the will of the late Daniel Johannes van Wyk for leave to sell certain property in the Riversdale district, which had been bequeathed, firstly, to the children of his first marriage, and secondly to the children of his second marriage, both his wives having predeceased the testator. The ground of the application was that, after rates and taxes had been paid, only a small sum remained from the estate to be divided among the ten participants, of whom four were minors, and the property was too small to allow of being split up. It was proposed to sell the property by public auction, and divide the proceeds among the heirs. The Master's report was favourable.

On the motion of Mr. Benjamin, an order was granted as prayed.

HICKMAN V. HICKMAN.

Mr. Upington moved, on behalf of petitioner, who resides at Kimberley, for leave to sue for divorce from his wife by edictal citation, on the ground of adultery. The parties were married at Queen's Town in 1891. There were two children of the marriage. They had lived at various places in the Cape and the Orange River Colonies. In 1896 respondent went to East London to her mother, but after an absence of eight months, she returned to petitioner, who was then living at Kroonstad. They afterwards went to Bloemfontein. In 1898 petitioner received a letter from the respondent's mother, saying that she had gone to Natal. Petitioner heard nothing from the respondent for a long time, and he sent to the respondent's mother for the children. Petitioner afterwards met the respondent at King William's Town carrying a child nine months old, which she said was her own, by a man named Griffiths, with whom she had cohabited in Natal. Respondent, since the above-named date, had had another child by a man named Evans. Both the illegitimate children were still alive.

An order was made calling on the defendant to show cause by the 31st May, personal service to be effected if possible, failing which, citation to be published twice in an East London newspaper.

GUARDIAN ASSURANCE CO. V. INSOLVENT ESTATE LIPPERT. 1903. April. 17.

Liquidation account—Amendment—High Sheriff—Dead bond.

Judgment for the sum of £500 due on certain two mortgage bonds had been granted to the G. A. Company as against one B. The property specially hypothecated having been also declared executable, had been sold in execution, and the High Sheriff had framed a distribution account. It appeared that there was a third uncancelled bond in the office of the Registrar of Deeds on the same property in favour of one L. for £500. The estate of L. had been finally sequestrated, but the trustees had not brought up this bond for £500 as an asset in his estate. The High Sheriff had, however, awarded a balance of the money which the property realized after the other two bonds had been paid off, together with interest for a year and a current year as an asset in L.'s estate in repect of the £500 bond. On the application of the G. A. Company the Court granted an order directing the High Sheriff to amend his account, and to award to the Company the entire balance of the moneys realized by the sale in execution of the said property. The case of Brink v. The High Sheriff (12 S.C.R., 414) distinguished———

This was an applicantion for the amendment of the first and final liquidation account and plan of distribution in connection with the proceeds of landed property, sold in execution of a judgment of the Supreme Court on 1st November, 1902, in the matter between the Guardian Assurance and Trust Co., of Port Elizabeth, and Charles Howard Bush.

Notice of motion had been served on the Acting High Sheriff and on Messrs. G. W. Steytler, H. Gibson, and W. A. Currey (trustees in the insolvent estate of W. A. Lippert, trading as W. A. Lippert and Co.), respondents in the present case, that the Supreme Court would be moved for an order upon respondents to show cause why the petition of the said applicants should not be granted.

The petition of the applicants set forth that recently the petitioners sued one, Charles Howard Bush, by edictal citation for the recovery of £500 due on certain two mortgage bonds for £250 each, being a first and second mortgage bond on the same property passed by Bush in favour of the petitioners, and that on 1st November last the Court granted provisional sentence for the amounts of the two bonds, with interest at 8 per cent. from 1st July, 1892. The landed property specially mortgaged in the said bonds was thereafter sold in execution, and realised £800. The Acting High Sheriff framed a distribution account of the said amount, in which he awarded the petitioners £500 as the capital of the said two bonds, and £94 2s. 8d. interest for a year and the current year, the actual amount of interest on the two bonds being over £380, leaving a balance of £152 6s. 8d. for distribution. There was a third bond for £500, open and uncancelled, on the said property, according to the debt registry in the office of the Registrar of Deeds, in favour of W. A. Lippert and Co., although no such bond had been produced to the Acting High Sheriff, and the balance of £152 6s. 8d had, in the distribution account, been awarded to the third bond. On 17th August, 1890, the estate of W. A. Lippert and Co. was finally adjudicated as insolvent by order of the Court, and Messrs. G. W. Steytler, H. Gibson, and W. A. Currey were appointed joint trustees of the insolvent estate, and framed several accounts and plans of distribution therein, and in none of those accounts was the bond for £500 in favour of the estate brought up as an asset therein, and there was a statement at the foot of one of the latter of the accounts that there were no more assets in the said insolvent estate available for distribution. The petitioners took exception to the account framed by the Acting High Sheriff in execution on the ground that the estate had been insolvent for more than a year and the current year, and that they were therefore entitled to preference for the whole of such period, but, even if not so entitled as preferent creditors, they were entitled to the whole of the balance of £152 6s. 8d. on the ground that no claim had been made by the only parties indicated by the debt registry as entitled to the same. The petitioners, therefore, prayed that the Acting High Sheriff be directed to amend the said account and plan of distribution of the proceeds of said property sold in execution, by awarding them, in addition to the sum already awarded, the said sum of £152 5s. 8d., or for further or other relief, with costs of the application.

Mr. Close for applicants.

Mr. Close said in the present case he presumed the Master had acted on the lines of a case Brink N.O. v. the High Sheriff (12 Sup. Ct. reports, p. 414). He in view of his lordship's remarks in giving judgment in that case (p. 418), did not know that it could be contended that there was very much difference in the preference allowed in such sale and the preference in an insolvent sale. In the present case no claim had been made on Lippert's bond, and he submitted that the Master should have taken no account of the registry beyond what he was required to do under the rules of Court (Rule 105, new edition, p. 56, and Rule 107). The Sheriff was not entitled to award to persons simply nominally entitled to a bond who did not claim, but to the strong, living claims made to him. Counsel quoted Section 2 of Ordinonce 3 of 1844, and said in the present case they had not a living debt, but a dead debt. Lippert and Co.'s trustees naturally could not bring up a bond that had been written off in their books. As a further point, the former bonds themselves were put in, and those bonds gave a preference against the assets from the property sold in execution. He therefore asked the Court to authorise the payment of the balance to the petitioners.

The High Sheriff, called, said the objection was raised to the award made to the estate of Lippert and Co., or the bond-holders of the balance of the purchase money on the property. But Lippert and Co. did not exist any more, and that bond still stood open in the Deeds Office. The bond might have been ceded by Lippert and Co., and might still be held by some absent person.

In reply to the Chief Justice, the High Sheriff said that notice had been given in the "Gazette."

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, surely if there is a cession of the bond, the holder can come forward and file his claim?]

Yes, my lord, unless he is absent from the Colony. The bond is still open in the Deeds Office.

[De Villiers, C.J.: has the Master to take notice of bonds which are not brought forward?]

Yes.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing there is a bond-holder and he does not appear, do you still award him the amount?]

Oh, yes, my lord. Of course, this is rather an exceptional case; as a rule, bond-holders come forward and claim.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have you ever had a case where the bond-holder has not come forward?]

I do not think so; I am not just now aware of one.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You say notice is given to the bond-holders?]

Yes, notice is given. It is quite probable there is no such bond in existence, and that it has not been written off in the Deeds Office.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems to me it it extremely unlikely, and that there is no such bond in existence. What is the date of the bond?]

26th June, 1883.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, that is twenty years ago. What is the form of notice given?]

It is published in the "Gazette" that a meeting of mortgagees and other creditors will be held on a certain date before the High Sheriff. It is published two or three times, as a rule a fortnight or three weeks, or sometimes a month, before. I must say that it appears to me that this bond is no longer in existence. At the same time, there it is open at the Deeds Office, and it is quite possible that some one else may hold the bond still.

De Villiers, C.J.: The case of Brink against the Sheriff differs from the present case. Where there are competing preferent creditors, then, in that competition, the holder of the bond—in the form, at all events, of the bond in Brink's case—is not entitled to more than preference for a year and the current year; and, therefore, if in the present case the bond was in the same form, and there had been any competition in the case at all, the Court would have upheld the rule there laid down. But, in point of fact, there is no competition whatever in the present case. Due notice has been given by the Sheriff as to the meetings of mortgagees, and none have appeared in competition with the applicant. Moreover, in this case, notice of the present application was given, not only to the Master, but to the trustees of the insolvent's second mortgagee. They have not appeared, and they have made no objection to the present application, and therefore, under these special circumstances, I think the Court is bound to assume that their bond is no longer in force, and that the motion to cancel the bond on the ground that it is absolutely dead must be allowed. Under these special circumstances the Court will grant the application. The costs will be paid out of the estate.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Tredgold, Mc Intyre and Bisset.]

Ex parte ROSENBAUM AND ANOTHER. 1903. April 17th.

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the petitioner, and applied for leave to register an ante-nuptial contract.

The petition of Aaron William Rosenbaum and Annie Rosenbaum set forth that the petitioners came to the Colony in July, 1896, and became domiciled in the Colony. On the 30th April, 1902, they left for England, and a month or two later in the same year entered into a marriage contract, whereby a certain life policy for £1,000, effected on the life of the first petitioner, and £1,000 invested in certain securities was settled on the second-named petitioner. Their marriage was subsequently solemnised, on 8th July, 1902, in London. It was always the intention of the petitioners to marry without community of property, and they were informed in London that, so far as the Cape Colony was concerned, it was not necessary to register here an ante-nuptial contract. Petitioners returned to the Colony in November, 1902, and found they had been misinformed as to the requirements of the law with regard to having no community of property in their marriage. They applied for the registration of the aforesaid ante-nuptial contract in the Deeds Office in this Colony, each party to have a right to dispose of their private property by will, codicil, or otherwise, and neither party to be liable for the other's debts, all legacies or bequests left to either to be the property of that party.

Counsel in support of the application pointed out that the parties clearly intended to marry without community of property.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Was the settlement made before marriage?]

Yes, but executed in England.

The application was granted.

INSOLVENT ESTATE MUSTERS V. VAN DER SPUY.

This was an application for the appointment of a Commission de bene esse.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., for the applicant, moved for the appointment of a commissioner to take the evidence of the defendant, who was at present in the Transvaal, and had arranged to leave for England shortly. Counsel's attorney had suggested the name of Mr. Gardiner and the attorneys on the other side endorsed and concurred with the suggestion.

The application was granted Mr Gardiner being appointed commissioner.

Ex parte VAN DRUTEN.

Mr. Buchanan appeared for the petitioner, and applied for leave to sell certain property at Griquatown, Division of Hay.

The petition showed that the petitioner was appointed, on 14th February, 1902, curator bonis to the property of Nicholas Egidion Druten, a lunatic detained during the Governor's pleasure in the Robben Island Asylum. N. E. Druten had a daughter living, aged three years, whose mother was dead, and who was at present being maintained by her aged grandfather. The estate owed money to different creditors, amounting to the sum of £120 or thereabouts. N. E. Druten's life was insured in the South African Mutual Insurance Society for £500, and the policy was being kept alive solely by money borrowed from friends. He was also possessed of movable property at Griqua Town worth about £30, and of immovable property valued at £100, which latter brought in a small revenue to the estate of about £2 10s. a month. Petitioner was desirous of selling that property in order to liquidate the estate and provide for the payment of the premiums on the life policy of N. E. van Druten; and should there be a sufficient balance after the payment of the aforesaid debts, the petitioner was desirous of capitalising the premiums on the policy, so as to prevent the same at any future time lapsing.

The application was granted, with costs to come out of the estate.

Ex parte SMITH.

Mr. Upington applied for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to amend the title deed of a certain piece of land at Sea Point.

Counsel stated that on 28th February, 1903, the Court granted the petitioner an order, declaring him to be entitled to the land in question under the Derelict Lands Act. Through an error in the sketch, it was wrongly described, and the Registrar of Deeds refused to allow the transfer to be passed until the order was amended.

The application was granted.

Ex parte STEVENSON.

This was an application for leave to execute a certain agreement, in the matter of the estate of the late James Samuel Reed, of Port Elizabeth, and of that of his predeceased wife, Elizabeth Reed (born Elliott).

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the petitioner (Thomas Stevenson, manager at Port Elizabeth of the South African Association for the Administration and Settlement of Estates, in his capacity as the executor dative of the estate of the late J. S. Reed), and read the petition, which set forth, inter alia, that the late J. S. Reed and his wife, E. Reed, executed a joint and mutual will on 3rd November, 1858, whereby the survivor was entitled to remain in possession of the whole of the joint estate till his or her decease. Between the date of the death of Elizabeth Reed, on 24th February, 1898, and the death of James Samuel Reed, on 25th May, 1902, the joint and mutual will was not lodged or filed by the latter, the executor named, or proceedings taken to have the will proved, but the said J. S. Reed until his death remained in possession of all the assets of the joint estate, the value of which amounted to £88,000, but besides loose memoranda and accounts, no record was kept on the estate by him. As it was found practically impossible to assign to the estate and to the various children the exact ownership in the various properties; and to adjust the accounts between the estate and the children, petitioner, after prolonged investigation and discussion with the heirs (excepting two minors), obtained their agreement to the terms of the document it was now prayed the Court to order to be executed by William Lloyd, the father and guardian of the minors, who agreed to its terms, in order that petitioner might duly a t upon it, and complete the liquidation and distribution of the estate.

The application was granted, with costs out of the estate.

LEVIN V. COCHRANE AND CHERRY. 1903. April 17th.

Mr. Upington appeared for the applicant.

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the respondent, the applicant in the original action.

Mr. Upington, in applying for a date to be fixed for trial by jury, asked that the costs be ordered to be costs in the cause.

The case was set down for trial by jury on Thursday, 14th May, costs to be costs in the cause.

Ex parte DOCKEL.

This was an application for leave to transfer certain property.

Mr. Close, for the petitioner, said that certain land at Salt River had been sold to one Alexander, and petitioner's name appeared on the transfer deed as Ludwig Dockel. He wished to have the deed amended by the substitution of his correct name, Ludwig Christian Dockel.

Application granted.

CLARK V. ESTATE BARRINGTON.

This was an application for leave to register a certain lease.

Mr. Benjamin appeared for the applicant.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., appeared for the executor in the estate.

Sir Henry Juta said that Barrington was dead, and the applicant wanted to have a certain lease registered, and the executor said that there was no agreement to register. He maintained that, as there was no agreement to register during the lifetime of Barrington, it could now be registered.

Mr. Benjamin said a lease was entered into between John Clark and Barrington on 8th May, 1900. A notarial confirmation of the lease would be quite sufficient to comply with the requirements of the Deeds Office. It was true that no agreement was entered into between the applicant and the deceased that the lease should be registered, but even without registration, it was binding on the estate of deceased. Registration was not necessary to render a lease valid as against the person making it or against his executors; it was only necessary as against third persons, and even then, only if those persons took the land without notice being given them that there was no such agreement. The present lease was quite binding on the estate. He applied for a notarial confirmation by the executors.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the Court makes an order in these terms, the executors will make no objection?]

Sir Henry Juta said they did not feel that it was in their power, having entered into the lease, to make any.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Now, what do you say about the costs of this application?]

Mr. Benjamin suggested there should be no order as to costs, each side to pay their own costs.

Sir Henry Juta held that the applicant should pay all costs. There was no law which could compel an executor to execute a notarial document.

De Villiers, C.J.: There seems to have been no agreement, Mr. Benjamin, at the time, that there was to have been registration. At the time of the execution of the lease it was not deemed necessary to register the same, though Barrington expressed no objection to registration. So that, I think, you will have to pay the costs of the respondent. If there had been anything binding on the estate he would not have been justified in opposing, but according to your own statement there was no agreement.

S.A. FISHERIES V. KAMP.

This was an application for the appointment of a Commission de bene esse.

Mr Upington appeared for the applicant.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., appeared for the respondent.

Mr Benjamin applied for the appointment of a Commissioner to take the evidence of certain witnesses in Natal, and for the fixing of a date for the trial of the cause by jury. He would suggest the name of Charles William Povall, advocate and attorney, at Durban. There was no opposition to the suggestion.

The application was granted, the case being set down for trial by jury on Thursday, 28th May.

HALLER AND SOGWAQWA V. SOGWAQWA.

Mr Upington applied for the appointment of a Commissioner to take evidence in Tembuland. The action was one to set aside a will, and it was necessary to take the evidence of the two witnesses to the signing of the will. The affidavit of petitioners showed that under rule 319 evidence must be led. The estate was a very small one, of the value of £300, and the expense of bringing those witnesses to Cape Town would be very great. He suggested the name of Mr. A. Gladwin, Resident Magistrate of Quotimvaba, St. Mark's. A special messenger would be required to take the will and death notice to Tembuland, whose expenses would be paid by the applicant. It was necessary to submit the original document, the allegation being that it was not signed in the presence of the testatrix and was merely signed after her death by the witnesses.

Replying to the Chief Justice, Mr Upington said the original will was filed with the Master of the Supreme Court.

Mr. Gladwin was appointed Commissioner to take evidence, and his lordship authorised the Master to send the will and the death notice by registered letter to Mr. Gladwin, Resident Magistrate of Quotimvaba, St. Mark's.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

COLLISON V. PEW, TRADING AS EDWARD PEW AND CO. { 1903. April 21st.

Mr. Gardiner, on behalf of the petitioning creditor, moved for the discharge of the provisional order of sequestration.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte THE EXECUTORS OF THE ESTATE SIMEY.

Mr. Benjamin moved, on behalf of the executors testamentary, for leave to sell certain property, forming part of the estate Zonnebloem, situate between Caledon and Hanover streets. Mr. Benjamin said the matter had not been referred to the Master, who took up the position that where there were no minors in actual being interested it was not necessary that his report should be sought.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is bequeathed to the issue?]

The proceeds of the estate, as set out in the first paragraph of the petition.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Not the property itself?]

I understand not from the petition. I have not a copy of the will.

[De Villiers, C. J.: You ought to see the will. It is most important to see the will. The case had better stand over until you get the will.]

At a later stage, Mr. Benjamin produced the will, and De Villiers, C.J., after examining the document, said that the petition stated something quite different to what appeared in the will. He saw nothing in the will about enjoying the income from the estate. It was not clear whether the two properties referred to in the will were placed on the same footing. It looked very much as if the property went absolutely to the three children. The petition seemed to show that both stood on the same footing, but the will did not say so, at least it was not clear. He thought the petition had better be amended, and that the whole of the will had better be set out, so that they could see whether it might not be fairly held that the first party referred to stood on a different footing, and that the petitioners might be allowed to sell the first and not the second. Surely in cases of this kind it was a most important matter that the will itself should be before the Court.

Mr. Benjamin said the petition had been inaccurately drafted.

The case was, therefore, ordered to stand over for amended particulars.

DU PREEZ V. REGISTRAR OF DEEDS.

Mr. Rainsford moved for an order calling upon the respondent to pass the transfer of certain property, which petitioner had purchased at public auction in the division of Mossel Bay. The Registrar of Deeds, in his report, said that the petitioner, having purchased property from the estate of which he was one of the executors, an order of Court for confirmation of the sale was essential. The property, it appeared, was sold by public auction after due notice had been given, and the purchase price apparently was a fair one. The necessary consent papers had been signed by the majority of the heirs.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte HOMMEL AND OTHERS.

Mr. Close moved for leave to draw a certain sum of money from the estate of Mattheus Hommel for the maintenance and education of certain minor children. The Master reported in favour of the application.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report.

Ex parte BROWN AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Close moved on behalf of petitioners, as executors testamentary in the estate of one Brown, for an order authorising the transfer of certain property which they had purchased from the estate.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte VAN DER MERWE.

Mr. Close moved on behalf of the executor for leave to raise a mortgage on the property in the estate, which was situate in the division of Ceres, and to apply the balance to the purchase of stock. The application was made in the interests of a minor.

Order granted in terms of the Master's report, costs out of the estate.

Ex parte BASSON.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for an order authorising the Master to accept notice of death of the petitioner's brother, Jasper Smit Faculyn Basson, and to convene a meeting for the election of an executor dative to represent the estate of the said Jasper S. F. Basson. The affidavit of the petitioner set forth that on Saturday, the 14th February, he went with his brother to Gordon's Bay for the purpose of fishing, and that the latter was accidentally drowned. He saw his brother in the water about 40 paces away. The deceased only rose to the surface once. Deponent concluded that he had been stunned by the force of the waves. Immediately after he had come to the surface he sank, and he was not seen again. Deponent was wet through, and he was wearing his clothes at the time, and it would have been absolutely futile for him to have gone to his brother's assistance. The body had not been recovered, although diligent search had been made. Deponent had offered a reward of £100 to any one who recovered the corpse. He was informed by the inhabitants of Gordon's Bay that it was not likely that the body would be washed ashore. There was no one present when the accident occurred except deponent and his brother. Petitioner had forwarded to the Master the death notice, and inventory of the estate of the deceased, at the same time requesting him to convene a meeting for the election of an executor dative to represent the estate of the said deceased. The Master, however, replied that he could not accept the proof of death now before him, and that it was necessary for the petitioner to approach the Court with a view to obtaining an order authorising the Master to take the necessary steps for the appointment of an executor dative. An affidavit from the hotel proprietor at Gordon's Bay also stated that several persons had been drowned there, and as far as his knowledge went, in no case had the body been recovered. Deceased was seventeen and a half years of age.

Order granted as prayed.

WOGENCHOWSKI V. ROSE.

Mr. Benjamin moved as a matter of some urgency for an order setting aside an agreement which had been entered into between the applicant, Augustino R. Wogenchowski, and the respondent, Manuel Rose, and to have the keys handed to him of a certain building which he had been erecting for the respondent at the corner of Main-road and Milton-street, Sea Point. Counsel stated that an application was heard in that Court recently in which the respondent sought to compel the present applicant to deliver up the keys of the property, and the Court made an order calling upon the then respondent, Wogenchowski, to hand over the keys on the payment by the applicant, Rose, of £400. That order was never carried out. The present applicant said that he agreed to accept £300 in settlement of his whole claim—£150 in cash, and the balance in promissory notes on good security. It was agreed between them that the surety should be Aristo Constantine Yaxoglon, proprietor of the Aristo Cigarette Company, 12, Castle-street. Applicant, in his affidavit, declared that Euthemois Yaxoglon had been falsely represented to him as the party agreed upon as good security, and that he had so represented himself. When the settlement was being concluded, he did not particularly notice that the surety bore the signature of Euthemois, but on examining the notes, to his astonishment he discovered that they had been signed by Euthemois. If he had detected the mistake at the time of the settlement, he should not have concluded the settlement, but would have cancelled the whole arrangement there and then; but he was not aware that such a fraud would be perpetrated upon him.

Mr. Upington, on behalf of the respondent, read the affidavit of Manuel Rose, which set forth that he agreed at the office of the applicant's attorney to pay £150 in cash, and to deliver to the applicant two promissory notes for £25 each, and one for £100 endorsed by Aristo Yaxoglon. He thereupon left to fetch the said Aristo Yaxoglon, but could only find his brother Euthemois, who was a partner in the firm with Aristo. He returned, and told the applicant's attorney and the applicant, and at their request he fetched Euthemois, who, in their presence, endorsed the promissory notes in his own name. He repudiated the suggestion that he used any fraudulent representation in regard to Euthemois.

Mr. Benjamin read a replying affidavit by the applicant, in which he declared that it was not made clear that the man who signed was the brother of Aristo. Deponent did not know the brothers by name, though he had bought cigarettes from them.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I confess on these affidavits I would not hold these people to have been guilty of fraud. Are these people likely to expose themselves to prosecution in that way, committing a palpable fraud which any time might be exposed?]

The affidavits, I admit, are rather strong in using the word "fraud." It may have been that there really was a mistake between the parties.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But they are partners. Surely the security of one is as good as the other?]

Apparently not; apparently the one, E. Yaxoglon, is a man of straw.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, they allege that they are partners, and, therefore, in the face of that allegation, how can it be held now that one has more property than the other?]

The applicant was under the impression that the partner Aristo, who made the affidavit when the case was previously before the Court, was to be the surety.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why did your client not examine the note before he took it. One of the men is named "E" and the other is "A." The signature does not look like an "A." Where are the notes?]

The notes have been unattached.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the use of coming forward without even attaching the notes that you rely on?]

The notes having been produced,

[De Villiers, C.J., said he thought this was a most extraordinary application. Here was a man, who took a promissory note signed by E. Yaxoglon, and yet the applicant came forward and said he thought it had been signed by Aristo. How could he suppose it was Aristo in face of that document?]

It does seem extraordinary that he should have been mistaken.

De Villiers, C.J.: I do not think that this application can for a moment be entertained. The man takes this note as it was signed by E. Yaxoglon, and then he comes forward and says he thought it was signed by A. Yaxoglon, and charges these people with fraud and substituting the wrong name. The application must be refused, with costs.

DAY v. DAY.

In this matter, which was an application for leave to sue for divorce by edictal citation, Mr. Buchanan said that when the case was last before the Court his lordship wanted further information as to whether Victoria West was the applicant's domicile. Counsel produced an affidavit from the attorney, sworn to in Cape Town, to the effect that he knew from his own knowledge that the petitioner at present resided in the district of Victoria West, and that he intended that that should be his domicile for the future.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would it not be better if the man himself stated his own intention, and not his attorney?]

Mr. Buchanan agreed that it would from one point of view, but the attorney knew that it was the applicant's intention to remain at Victoria West.

De Villiers, C.J.: I think it would be the best evidence of his intention if he made the affidavit and not his attorney. The case will, therefore, stand over again pending his own affidavit.

Ex parte MERWE.

Mr. Upington moved, on behalf of the petitioner, for leave to pass transfer of certain property of the petitioner without the consent and assistance of her husband, one Dan Merwe. Petitioner wished to close with an offer which she had received for the property. The parties were married in community of property, but the petitioner was deserted by her husband, and she had not heard from him for three years. She did not know his present whereabouts. The property was acquired subsequent to his desertion of her out of her own money.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, but if he returns he might claim his share of the property if they are married in community. Even if she acquired it after the desertion, she must first institute an action for the desertion and a division of the property.]

She asks for transfer of this property. She must have something to live upon. He is not supporting her in any way. Counsel read the affidavit of the petitioner, which set forth that her husband, after giving way to drunken habits, deserted her. She had contracted certain debts that she wished to pay. She was the owner of certain lots of ground forming part of the Rondebosch Extension Estate, in the Cape Division. She wished to sell the said property without the assistance of her husband, to whom she had been married in community.

De Villiers, C.J.: I cannot grant the order immediately. You must give the husband an opportunity of objecting to this application. The property is registered here, and I think notice of the rule should appear in a Cape Town newspaper. You may take a rule, calling upon Dan Merwe to show cause on the 1st May why the applicant should not be allowed to pass transfer without his assistance, rule to be published once in a Cape Town newspaper.

APPEALS.

REX v. RADASI. { 1903. April 21st.

Native Location—Act 37 of 1884.

One M. had been convicted of having established an unlicensed native location on his property. Thereafter one R. (a tenant of M.) was convicted for having aided and abetted the establishment of the said location.

Held, on appeal, that as it appears from Sec. 20 of Act 37 of 1884 that if the owner of property on which a native location is situated does not take out a licence it is the duty of the occupier to do so, the appellant had been rightly convicted.

This was an appeal from a decision of the A.R.M. of Uitvlugt.

From the record in the Court below, it appeared that the appellant had been convicted on a charge of contravening section 6 of the Native Location Act, which provided that the owner of any land not licensed for such location should be liable on breach of the section to a penalty not exceeding £25 for the first offence. The ground of appeal was that he was wrongly charged under section 6, inasmuch as the owner of the farm where the offence had, it was alleged, been committed, McKenzie, had been charged under the said section with the said offence, and subsequently convicted. The evidence was that two sheds and thirteen rooms had been put on the ground leased by the accused. The rooms were occupied by 71 native adults. The appellant had no written lease from McKenzie.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (for appellant) argued that seeing that McKenzie was the owner of this land, and was convicted of having a private location on his ground in respect of certain natives, one of whom was his client, this lessee or occupier could not be charged with having established a location on the ground. It did not matter who the natives were on the ground, if the owner of the land had one native male adult on the ground that was a location, and he must get a licence.

Mr. H. Jones (for the Crown) said he proposed to leave the matter almost entirely to the opinion of the Court. The Act provided that the persons who really established the location should take out a licence. If they did not, then the owner should see that they did take out a licence. He did not know really whether McKenzie could have been properly convicted, because he thought it should be proved that he had knowledge of the location, and that did not seem to have been done in the present case.

Sir H. Juta said he did not think there was anything in the Act which made knowledge necessary to the offence.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case it is admitted on behalf of the appellant that if McKenzie had not been convicted of a contravention of the Act, the present appellant would have been liable to conviction; but he contends that, inasmuch as McKenzie has been convicted, the present appellant cannot also be convicted. Now, there would have been much in this argument if the act committed by the present appellant were identically the same as in the case in which McKenzie has been found guilty. On reference, however, to the evidence given in the present case, I find that the appellant has actively participated in the establishment of a native location without a licence. The Inspector of Locations says: "On the 30th June I inspected the premises occupied by the accused. I found two sheds and thirteen rooms on the ground leased by the accused. These rooms were used by 71 natives." Here was active participation by the appellant in the establishment of a location without a licence. If I remember aright, that was not the charge against McKenzie—it was for allowing certain lessees, including the present appellant, to be on the premises, and in that manner to establish a native location. It is clear from the 20th section of the Act that if the owner does not take out a licence, then it becomes the duty of the occupier to take out a licence. This duty has not been performed by the occupier, the present appellant. There surely is a means of ascertaining whether a licence is taken out, and appellant ought to have ascertained whether a licence had been taken out, and he should not have allowed any sub-lessees to come upon the premises without himself taking out a licence. The sixth section provides that the owner of any land on which a private location is established, who shall neglect to take out a licence for such location, shall be liable to certain penalties. If this section had stood by itself, I should certainly have gone with Sir H. Juta, and held that the appellant who is not the owner, is not liable, and that there is no duty on him to take out a licence for the location. The twenty-sixth section, however, provides that, whenever the words "the owner of any land on which a location is established," or words in that sense, are set out in this Act, such words and the words "proprietor of the land shall be deemed to include the occupier or the representative in this colony of any bona fide owner or occupier of the land on which a private location is established. From that I infer that the Legislature intended that, failing a licence being taken out by the owner, it becomes the duty of the occupier to take out the licence, and if he neglects to perform that duty, he is liable to be prosecuted. In my opinion, the fact that the owner has been punished for not performing his duty does not release the occupier from prosecution for not performing his part. For these reasons, I think this appeal should be dismissed.

REX V. CARN AND ANOTHER. } 1903.
REX V. IKE DAVIS AND ANOTHER. } April 21st. „ 22nd.

Gambling House — Forfeiture — Joint offence.

These were appeals against convictions by the Resident Magistrate of Cape Town on the 12th March, 1903, for having contravened section 16 of Act 36 of 1902, styled the Betting Houses, Gaming Houses, and Brothels Suppression Act, under which appellants were sentenced to pay a fine of £150 each, or in default, to undergo six months' imprisonment, with hard labour. Carn and Another appealed on the following grounds: That the fine imposed was excessive, and out of all proportion to the gravity of the offences charged; that the conviction was not supported by the evidence given before the said Court, or that the evidence given was wholly insufficient to support the conviction, and furthermore that the conviction was contrary to law; that the Magistrate's finding in adjudging the books, cash, and other papers and effects seized under warrant on the premises of the accused at 86, St. George's-street, Cape Town, to be forfeited to the use of the Crown, was incorrect, and contrary to law, inasmuch as part thereof belonged to and was the lawful property of the accused Israel Carn, who was found not guilty on the afore said charge and acquitted, and furthermore, that the evidence adduced at the trial did not show that these books, cash, and other papers were connected with, appertained to, or had any bearing on betting transactions within the meaning of section 14 of Act 36 of 1902, between the dates as set forth in the indictment.

In the case of Rex v. Davis and Another, the appellants urged: That as the accused were jointly concerned in the commission of the offence with which they were charged, the evidence showing that they were in partnership, upon the conviction of one of them, the other of them should have been discharged, or at least one penalty only should have been imposed, and not a separate penalty on each of them; that the fine imposed was excessive, and out of all proportion to the gravity of the offence charged; that the conviction was not supported by the evidence given before the said Court, or that the evidence given was wholly insufficient to support the conviction, and furthermore, that the conviction is contrary to law; that the Magistrate's finding in adjudging the books, cash, and other papers and effects seized under warrant on the premises of the accused at 86, St. George's-street, Cape Town, to be forfeited to the use of the Crown, was incorrect, and contrary to law, inasmuch as the evidence adduced did not show that these books, cash, and other papers and effects were connected with, appertained to, or had any bearing on betting transactions within the meaning of section 14 of Act 36 of 1902, between the dates as set forth in the indictment.

Mr. McGregor for appellants; Mr. H. Jones for the Crown.

Mr. McGregor said that in the first case it appeared that one Lazarus Cohen pleaded guilty, and Israel Carn pleaded not guilty. The main point of the appeal in this case would be, firstly, that the evidence did not show that Cohen, although he pleaded guilty, had committed any offence in law; and secondly, if the Court were against him on that point, that the Magistrate, in making a confiscation order, went further than the law allowed him. Having read the Magistrate's record of the case, Mr. McGregor proceeded to say the fine was a very severe one—£150, the maximum being £200—but he was not aware that he was entitled to urge that as a ground of appeal. He mentioned the question of the record, purporting to be under the ordinary jurisdiction, resulting in a fine being imposed, which was in excess of the power of the Magistrate under the ordinary jurisdiction. In addition to that question, there was the one as to whether there was evidence on the record showing that Cohen was guilty of a crime in law that was a statutory offence. The name on the appellants' office window was "Carn," but he pleaded not guilty, and was acquitted; Cohen was punished. Mr. McGregor, having read the various sections under which owners or occupiers of premises used for the purpose of betting were rendered liable to prosecution, said there was a curious section—twenty-one—which was a kind of saving clause; it would seem to be a protection of betting at specified places and times. It showed how the Legislature did not prohibit betting, but indirectly protected it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It does not prohibit betting in specified places. It prohibits betting houses. The question is "Was this a betting house, and did the appellants keep it?" For what purpose was this house kept?]

The men are described in the indictment as commission agents, and this house would presumably be kept for their business as commission agents.

[De Villiers, C.J., quoted the evidence of one of the witnesses at the trial, who said: "I wrote out a ticket. I paid £1. In the ordinary course I would have received £7 if I had won." "That would be betting. Is not this house kept for betting?"]

That is not proved.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the board for? What are these slips for?]

These slips could have been used for betting on the racecourse at Kenilworth.]

[De Villiers, C.J.: Here the bets are made in the house?]

Oh, one bet; but they (the police) did not bring one single person to say bets were made in the ordinary course. Although the place was watched for a month, they only brought one man, sent by themselves. What is there to show that there was not legitimate ordinary business, or that these slips were intended to be used in connection with bets made at Kenilworth?

[De Villiers, C.J.: What were the betting boards for?]

That goes against the accused in this case undoubtedly, but we want something to show that these betting boards were being used in the ordinary course by people there. The betting boards may or may not have been used, but they (the police) did not prove it. "Why have we not more evidence that there is a business of carrying on betting?" There might be cause for suspicion, but those incidents do not constitute such facts in law, as would justify conviction. The Act under which these cases were brought was a new one. Therefore there ought to have been care and accuracy in the management of the prosecution. There ought to have been convincing evidence under this highly penal Act.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no judgment forfeiting these documents, is there?]

Yes, there apparently is. As far as I understand, Carn is the man who has been most interested in this confiscation, but owing to the curious procedure, Carn has no locus standi, because he is found not guilty.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What documents do you wish to be given up?]

The Magistrate (if I may be permitted to say so) was so rough and ready that it is hard to say which is Carn's and which is Cohen's.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is £8 8s. in cash. What is there to show that it had anything to do with betting?]

Nothing at all. Carn was not found guilty, but they took Carn's property too.

Mr. Jones said that according to the Act, all accounts, cheques, etc., found on the premises were adjudged to be forfeited. The section was very wide indeed. The evidence was that all the papers and effects seized related to betting.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is a promissory note for £135, but it says nothing about betting.]

A cheque is in the same category as accounts. I submit that if the applicant wished the money to be returned, he should make a formal application to the Court.

De Villiers, C.J., held that there should have been an appeal made to hand over the documents, on the ground that they had not been forfeited, and then the nature of the documents could be argued. He took it the property would be given up.

Mr. McGregor contended that the police were not entitled to retain anything which was not included in the search warrant, and submitted that there was no adjudication with reference to the articles which had been attached. In the case of the Davises, a cheque for £1,400, that was ear-marked for a share transaction, was taken. That was illustrative of the kind of confiscation which seemed to have been in operation in this case. There was not, he held, any proof that the books which had been seized related to betting in Cape Town. Mr. McGregor proceeded to argue that the charge against the Davises was for a single and not a double offence, that both appellants could not be fined for the same offence, and that, therefore, only one penalty could be inflicted.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing there was imprisonment and not a fine, and two persons were committed for three months, each would only have to do one and a half months?]

I don't say that.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That would be legitimate.]

Mr. McGregor said that if the appellants had employed a number of clerks, according to the Magistrate's interpretation of the law, he would have power to impose fines amounting to something like £2,000 or £3,000. To give a power so excessive as that, one required strong grounds in law.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is a punishment on each individual.]

Mr. McGregor asked, in the first case, for the conviction of Cohen to be set aside, on the ground that there was no offence in law, and that the forfeiture order was wrong. In the case of Davis Bros., he also asked for the convictions to be set aside, and if the Court was against him on that point, he asked that the penalty should be on the principle laid down by Lord Mansfield—that the offence was a single one, that only one man could be found guilty, and that one partner was but the agent of the other.

Mr. Jones admitted that the judgment did not cover the papers and effects seized, but submitted that the proper course was to apply to the Attorney-General for the restoration of the property. He did not know if the property was in the hands of the Magistrate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Supposing there has been an adjudication?]

If there had, it ought certainly to appear on the record. As he had previously remarked, the section dealing with the forfeiture of property was very wide. It said all accounts, money, bills, cheques, or other items found in such house or place might, after conviction, be forfeited. It seemed very difficult to get away from those words. If there had been no adjudication, there was no grounds to ask for a reversal of the Magistrate's decision. If there had been no adjudication, a proper application should be made for the return of the property.

De Villiers, C.J.: In the case of Carn and Cohen, the first objection raised is that the fine imposed is excessive, and out of all proportion to the gravity of the offence charged. No doubt it is true that the fine is a very severe one, but it is a fine which is authorised by the Act. The Act authorises a penalty of £200. The Magistrate imposed a fine £150. Whatever opinion this court may hold in regard to the policy of the Act and the gravity of the offence, I don't think the Court should interfere with the decision of the Magistrate where it is clearly in his jurisdiction. The next objection raised is that the proceedings purport to be in the ordinary jurisdiction. I don't think, however, that that slip, if slip it may be called, can in any way affect the validity of the proceedings. In one sense it is ordinary jurisdiction, and there is no special reference to the Magistrate by the Attorney-General. He has the jurisdiction, in Parliament given to him directly, and without any commission by the Attorney-General; and, secondly, I am of opinion that the mere fact it is headed on the charge sheet the words "ordinary jurisdiction" would not render the proceedings invalid. It would, perhaps, be more correct if "Act 36 of 1902" appeared instead of "ordinary jurisdiction." The parties cannot be prejudiced by this heading, nor does it seem of a nature in any way to render the proceedings invalid. I am speaking of objections common to these cases. A further objection is that there has been really no offence committed, inasmuch as it has not been proved that the appellants did not occupy, or keep, or use any house or place for the purpose of a betting house. Upon this point the evidence is very brief, but it appears to me perfectly clear. Detective Eaves, who is a witness in both cases, says: I know the accused. I have frequently seen them at their office at 86, St. George's-street. On the window was painted "Israel Carn, late Cohen and Carn, member of Tattersall's." Several times during the last two months I have passed the office and seen the accused in the office. There were a number of tickets behind the counter, and one of the betting boards now produced could be seen from the street. I have frequently seen men entering the office and leaving it with slips of paper in their hands. On the 3rd inst. I went to the office, and saw Cohen behind the counter, and Carn, with another man, in front of the office. I asked Carn the price of Matthew for the Grand National, and he replied, "7 to 1." I said I would have a "quid's worth." I was given the ticket produced. In the ordinary course I would have received £7 and my £1 back if the horse won. Detective Bassett corroborates. It is important, in my opinion, that there were these betting boards put up. Was not a statement made that there was something written on these boards?

Mr. Jones: Yes, showing the prices of the betting on the Grand National.

The Chief Justice (proceeding) read the sections bearing on the case, as follows:

14. No house or place shall be opened, kept, or used at any time for the purpose of betting, or of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of the owner or keeper thereof, or any person whomsoever, as or for the consideration for (a) any assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement express or implied, to pay or give consideration in money or valuable thing on any event or contingency, on or relating to any horse race or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise; (b) securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency.

15. Every house or place opened, kept, or used for any of the purposes mentioned in the preceding section shall be deemed and taken to be a betting house.

16. (1) Whosoever opens, keeps, or uses any house or place for any of the purposes mentioned in the 15th section of this Act, or knowingly and wilfully being the owner, tenant, occupier, or lodger, permits the same to be opened, kept, or used by any other person for any of such purposes, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding for the first offence a fine of £200 sterling, or in default of payment, of imprisonment with or without hard labour for not exceeding six months; for the second offence or any subsequent offence to a fine not exceeding £500 sterling, or imprisonment with or without hard labour for a period not exceeding twelve months, or to both such fine and imprisonment. (2) All coins, moneys, bills, cheques, notes, I.O.U.'s, good-fors, or other writings for the securing payment of money, and all lists, cards, or other documents relating to racing or betting found in such house or place, may on conviction of any offence under the provisions of this Act be adjudged to be forfeited to the use of His Majesty the King in his Colonial Government.

In my opinion (continued the Chief Justice), the evidence given before the Magistrate was sufficient to justify the verdict that appellants did keep a house or place for the purpose of betting. The contingency of a horse race is specially mentioned. The existence of the betting boards on the place, with the prices of the betting on the Grand National Handicap, clearly shows what the boards were intended for, and in addition there is the fact that this slip of paper was given to the witness in which the agent promised to pay him a certain amount in case a certain horse did win. The offence, therefore, in my opinion was committed, and the Magistrate correctly convicted the accused Cohen. He has acquitted the prisoner Carn, but that is no reason for this Court to find that Cohen was not guilty, more especially in face of the fact that Cohen pleaded guilty of the offence. It is suggested that other persons who had done betting with the appellants should also have been called. It would be difficult, I suppose, to induce any persons who had entered into transactions with the appellants to come forward to give their evidence. Under the circumstances I think the evidence which was actually given was sufficient to justify the verdict. Coming to the case of Ike and Mike Davis, there is this difference between this and the case of Cohen and Carn, that in the case of Cohen and Carn one only of the partners was affected. In the case of the Davises, both were convicted, and it is contended on behalf of the appellants, the two Davises, that the offence was of such a nature that only one of them could have been found guilty, and stress has been laid on some English decisions, more especially the decision of Lord Mansfield, in the hare netting case, that there should be only one punishment for a statutory offence. I can quite understand this judge on the matter of punishment where strict laws were made for the benefit of the landlords, and not the benefit of the public, that he might be moved by some considerations of this nature; but there can be no doubt that the Act with which this Court is now dealing is an Act passed to prevent offences which were considered offences against public morality and public decency and public justice. Whether the Legislature have not gone too far in these matters is a matter for the Legislature and not for the Court. The Court must construe the law as it finds it. No words can be clearer than those in the 16th section of the Act. The words "every one" are not used, but the words used are quite as explicit. "Whosoever does any of these things shall be liable to a penalty." It means, in my opinion, the same as "every one." If there had been twenty persons concerned everyone of them would have fallen under this section, and have been liable to the penalty. It is a separate penalty in each case, and the Magistrate having correctly found both the accused, Ike and Mike Davis, guilty, was justified, in my opinion, in imposing on each of them a penalty of £150. A further question has been raised as to whether the Magistrate should be ordered to restore to the appellants the money, notes, and other documents which are retained by them. Unfortunately, there is no order on the part of the Magistrate indicating these articles to be forfeited, and unless the record is alleged so as to show there is such an order, it is impossible for the Court to deal with it. I only express here my opinion that if it is not perfectly clear that such an order of forfeiture was made, and that such order was duly recorded, the Court should not hold that there has been any forfeiture at all, and the Magistrate should return to these people the documents which have been handed over. As to the question whether there has been a forfeiture, that is a matter on which at the present stage I had better express no opinion, but inasmuch as Carn has been acquitted it would seem unreasonable, at all events, that any papers or documents belonging to him should be retained by the Magistrate. The Court, therefore, dismisses the cases, but it is clearly understood in dismissing the appeal there is no decision given on the question of forfeiture or restoration of the articles claimed.

Mr. McGregor: That would include money?

[De Villiers, C.J.: Oh, yes, everything that he retains.]

Mr. McGregor: I take it, no one could add now to that record, if that be the record before your lordship?

[De Villiers, C.J.: This may be incorrect. If there is no record of forfeiture, then there has been no forfeiture.]

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

REVIEW.

REX v. MOSTERT AND DE KLERK. 1903. May 1st.

Pounds and Trespasses Act, 1892—Taking of animals from land of owner.

The 74th section of the above Act, making it unlawful to take animals from off the land of their owner, does not apply to the case of a person claiming to be the owner of an animal and taking it from off the farm of another person who also claims to be the owner by virtue of a purchase from a third person not the owner, and who had told the accused that he might take the animal on his own responsibility.

De Villiers, C.J., said the following case had come before him as Judge of the week for review. The accused were charged before the A.R.M. for Namaqualand at the Periodical Court, held at Garies, on the 9th April last, with contravening section 74 of Act 15 of 1892, by taking away a certain horse from off the land of the owner, Jan Davis, of Welkom. The accused were found guilty, and sentenced each to pay a fine of £7 10s., or one month's imprisonment with hard labour. This Act, which they are charged with having contravened, is the Pounds Act, which makes it unlawful to take away animals from off the land of their owner. The evidence, however, shows that the two accused had been sent by a person claiming to be the owner of the horse to the owner of a farm to which the horse had strayed, asking him to deliver the horse. It appears, however, that the owner of the farm had bought this horse and refused to deliver it. Then the accused said,

"We shall have to take it." The owner said, "Very well, if you take it you do it on your own responsibility." Clearly, the Pound Act was not intended to apply to a case of this kind. The accused had been sent to fetch the horse by a person claiming to be the owner, and the owner of the farm, who relied upon a purchase from a third person who was not the owner, told the accused that he might take the horse on his own responsibility. The conviction must be quashed.

KAISER V. GLASS. { 1903. May 1st.

Interdict—Removal of furniture.

Where respondent had been provisionally interdicted from removing certain furniture which she had obtained on the hire-purchase system from a house of which she had not paid the rent, but the vendor had removed his furniture before the rule was served, the Court made the rule absolute, but made no order as to costs.

This was an application to have a rule nisi granted by the Chief Justice on 27th April, 1903, be made absolute. The rule nisi called upon the defendants to show cause why they should not be restrained from removing certain household furniture and chattels from a house in Altona-road, Woodstock, pending an action for the recovery of rent.

The affidavit of petitioner set forth that he entered into an agreement with defendants (Ada Glass—assisted by her husband, Ernest N. Glass) whereby he undertook to lease certain premises in Altona-road, Woodstock, consisting of a shop and six rooms for six years from 14th January, 1903. on certain conditions, it being expressly stipulated that the rent of £22 per month be paid in advance, and if not so paid petitioner should have the right to cancel the lease. Defendant paid the first two months' rent, but neglected to pay the succeeding two months' rent, which was now long overdue. He had given notice of the cancellation of the lease, and called on the defendants to quit and deliver up possession and liquidate their debt. Nevertheless, they neglected, and refused to pay the rent or deliver up possession. The lessees had brought on to the premises certain furniture, which petitioner believed would be removed. He had no security for the payment of the rent due. Unless defendants were interdicted and restrained from removing those goods and effects, he would be seriously prejudiced, and have no means of recovering the rent. A temporary interdict had been granted by the Court, which he prayed to be made absolute.

[Mr. Close for the applicant. The Respondent in person.]

The Chief Justice (to the defendant): Do you appear to oppose the application?

Defendant: Which application?

The Chief Justice: The application to restrain you from removing your furniture till the debt is paid.

Defendant: I may say we got a letter saying he wanted the premises on Tuesday at noon. The goods were had on the hire system, and on our showing the letter to Bailey, he sent for the goods.

The Chief Justice: Have you a copy of the contract with Bailey?

Defendant, Yes, sir.

The Chief Justice: And Bailey removed the furniture after the order was made?

Defendant: No, sir, on Tuesday; we didn't get the order till Thursday.

The Chief Justice: And what furniture have you now?

Defendant: We are living in another house now, and are quite prepared to give up the key.

The Chief Justice: There is no furniture in the house?

Defendant: No, sir, nothing at all.

The Chief Justice: Can you not pay the rent?

Defendant: No, sir, I am sorry to say we can't. The £44 won't be due till the 15th of this month.

The Chief Justice: What is the purchase price of the furniture?

Defendant: The value of it? About £365 altogether.

The Chief Justice: And you paid £50 in advance?

Defendant: We paid more than that. £50, and four instalments of £12 10s.

The Chief Justice: And you state positively that this furniture was removed before the order was served on you?

Defendant: Yes, sir.

The Chief Justice: Well, Mr. Close, there is nothing for the interdict to operate upon.

Mr. Close said he had no evidence to put before the Court, but he would ask that the order be made formally. The defendants were in default, and the case was set down for trial next Thursday.

The Chief Justice: And what about costs?

Mr. Close submitted that petitioner should be allowed costs. He would like to know how the person who had the furniture removed got to know about the proceedings, and so had it removed.

The Chief Justice said that all that had been stated there was not on oath. There could be no harm in making the rule absolute, as there might be some furniture still there. But as to costs, he did not see how the defendants could be made to pay costs. If they had no furniture, they were not in default in any way. There was no attempt at removal on their part. The rule would be made absolute, with no order as to costs.

Mr. Close asked, in the event of its being found that there was furniture in the house, whether the Court would allow the matter of costs to be mentioned when the case came on.

The Chief Justice: According to this man, all the property belongs to Amos Bailey.

Ex parte ROTHMAN. { 1903. May 1st.

Articled Clerk — Service with Transvaal Attorney - Act 30 of 1892.

The Court recognized service of articles with a Transvaal attorney up to November, 1899, and thereafter from February 1st, 1901, with a Colonial attorney as continuous service.

This was an application for an order as to the service of certain articles of clerkship, and notice of the application had been given to the Law Society. The petitioner was of age. He had been articled to Edward Roodt, an attorney and notary of the Supreme Court of the Transvaal. He had served continuously from the commencement of his articles till November, 1899, when the period of service was interrupted owing to the Anglo-Boer war. Thereafter, on the 1st February, 1901, he entered the service of J. Coghlan, an attorney and notary of the Supreme Court, practising at Kimberley. Petitioner had served Coghlan continuously since that date, and was still in his employ. Petitioner had already passed the examination for proficiency in law and jurisprudence, being fourth on the list of candidates in 1902. He was anxious to finish his articles with Coghlan, and he asked for an order of the Court giving him the benefit of the time he had already served with Roodt, who would permit him to do so.

Sir Henry Juta, for the applicant, said the point was whether, as the rule required continuous service if such service was interrupted by war, the Court would not hold that the contract was suspended. Otherwise it might lead to great hardships. In the present case, it was nobody's fault.

[De Villiers, C. J.: There is this on the other hand: Mr. Roodt, while he was served by the applicant, was an attorney of the High Court of the Transvaal.]

That was provided for in the Act 30 of 1892, Sec. 2.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Does that Act refer to a case like the present?]

I anticipate your lordship's point is that the service was with an attorney of the Transvaal, not with one in this colony.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Yes.]

By the second section it was provided that it should be lawful for the Supreme Court to admit any person who could give proof that he had been admitted as an attorney, and that he had passed his examinations in law, and that for the three years immediately preceding the date of his application for admission.

[De Villiers, C. J.: I thought that there was a provision that this Act was not to come into operation until a reciprocal Act was passed in the Transvaal. Has such an Act been passed there?]

I cannot tell, your lordship. I was under the impression that there had been.

Sir H. Juta read further extracts from the Act, which showed that an attorney, in order to be admitted here, must prove that he had been admitted elsewhere, and that he had passed the examination in law; but according to the terms of section 4, sub-section (a), that applied only to Bachelor of Laws.

De Villiers, C. J., said it appeared there was no necessity for reciprocity, this being not the case of an attorney desiring to be admitted, but an articled clerk to have previous service counted towards the completion of his articles in this colony. Under the circumstances the order would be made.

[Applicant's Attorney: G. Trollip.]

NEALE V. NEALE.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved that this, an ex parte application, stand over till next Thursday.

Ex parte POTGIETER.

Mr. Close appeared for the petitioner in his capacity as one of the executors testamentary of the estate of the late Johan Andries Meyer and surviving spouse, Hester Anna Maria Meyer (born Du Bruyn).

The petitioner prayed for an order removing Hendrik Jeremias Meyer from his executorship, and directing the Master to issue supplementary letters of administration to the petitioner in his correct name of Hendrik Eduard Solomon Potgieter as sole executor, authorising him to administer the estate of the late Johan Andries Meyer in lieu of the original letters of administration issued on the 29th July, 1893, and thereby enabling him to pass transfer of the landed property to the several heirs.

The Court granted an order calling on Mr. Meyer to show cause by the 21st May why an order should not be granted as prayed.

Masonic Lodge—Change of Name—Amendment of Deed of Transfer.

This was an application for an order directing the Registrar of Deeds to amend the deed of transfer of certain landed property at Burghersdorp by substituting the name of the lodge "The Evening Star" for that of the "Rising Star," as the registered owner thereof.

The petition of Mathias Berry set forth that the petitioner was the Master of the Masonic Lodge, "The Evening Star," of Burghersdorp. On 3rd August 1870, a certain lot of ground in Lady Sarah-street was transferred to William Bisset Berry, W.M., James Mozenthal, S.W., and Henry Ridley, J.W., of the lodge "The Rising Star," of Burghersdorp, or to the Worshipful Master and Wardens of the said lodge for the time being. Owing to various unavoidable causes the lodge "The Rising Star" was closed up in 1888. In 1899 the same Master and Wardens who were in office when the lodge was closed, in conjunction with a few other Masons in Burghersdorp, started the lodge afresh, but, in order to obviate confusion with a Masonic lodge in Bloemfontein called "The Rising Star," it was decided to name the resuscitated lodge "The Evening Star," and the lodge "The Evening Star" was in reality the old lodge "The Rising Star," and its successor. It was desirable that the landed property in question, which was still registered in the name of the Master and Wardens of the lodge "The Rising Star," should be registered in the name of the lodge "The Evening Star."

Mr. Buchanan moved,

[De Villiers, C. J.: It is Berry who is applying; the trustees do not all apply.]

Mr. Buchanan: No, but in 1899 the same trustees resuscitated the lodge. They wished it to be transferred into the name of the present W.M. of "The Evening Star" and the wardens, or their successors in office. It would then come under the Trustees Act, and have perpetual succession in that way.

[De Villiers, C. J.: You ask for an amendment?]

We ask that the deed be amended by striking out "The Rising Star" and inserting "The Evening Star."

De Villiers, C. J.: I do not like defacing the deed in the Deeds Office by substituting one name for another. It seems a pity that the "rising" star should be reduced to the "evening" star, but take the order.

Ex parte THE MIDLAND AGENCY AND TRUST CO.

Mr. Alexander applied on behalf of the petitioners to raise money on mortgage. There was not sufficient cash available in the estate to complete the purchase price (£1,500) of certain property at Graaff-Reinet, bought by the late Charles Hy. Ingram. The application was for leave to mortgage all the properties in the estate of the late C. H. Ingram, in order to complete the purchase. The money was advanced by Mr. Te Water to purchase the property, but in the interval Chas. Hy. Ingram died. The estate had to be wound up within six months.

Order granted as prayed.

LAZAR V. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. Benjamin applied for a Commission to be appointed to take the evidence of the plaintiff in Johannesburg, and suggested that Advocate Solomon, living in Johannesburg, be appointed Commissioner.

Application granted.

Ex parte FOTHERINGHAM.

Mr. Rainsford applied for an order authorising the amendment of petitioner's name in the Debt Registry of the Colony.

Order granted.

DENNIS V. DENNIS.

This was an application on behalf of the wife for an interdict (pending an action for separation between husband and wife) restraining defendant from disposing of his property, more especially funds in the Bank of Africa at King William's Town, and for an order to pay the sum of £50, in order to enable plaintiff to bring her action, £8 as alimony, and costs in the case. The parties were married in King William's Town in December, 1896. The plaintiff was at the time a widow and the defendant a widower, and the plaintiff possessed movable property, consisting of household furniture. One child, which had since died, was the issue of the marriage. Defendant became addicted to drink, and had generally rendered the plaintiff's life unbearable. Defendant had £150 standing on fixed deposit in the Bank of Africa at King William's Town. The time expired in February last, but the money had not been withdrawn. The defendant earned £3 6s. a week as a blacksmith, and it was feared he would withdraw the money from the bank. The plaintiff was utterly without means, and was in need of funds to bring her action and to support herself.

Rule granted on the motion of Mr. Buchanan, to show cause by the 14th May why an order should not be granted as prayed, that the order be for £40 instead of £50, and that the claim for alimony be not included, the order to be served on the Bank of Africa.

VAN OUSELEN V. LANDMAN.

Contempt of Court.

On the application of Mr. Burton, this motion was allowed to stand over until the 14th inst. Mr. Burton said the parties resided at Humansdorp. There was a direct conflict of evidence, which might be capable of some explanation.

Ex parte LAMPRECHT.

This was an application for an order authorising the partition of certain land at Willowmore. The petition stated that the petitioner was the only guardian of three minors, each of whom was the registered owner of certain land at Willowmore. The petitioner resided in the Orange River Colony, and the said minor children resided with him. Owing to the petitioner living at such a distance from the property, it was impossible for him to look properly after the property or the petitioner's interests. The petitioner prayed that he might be authorised to partition the said property, and sell the shares and pay the proceeds into the guardian's fund until the children attained their majority, or to use the proceeds in the purchase of property in the Orange River Colony. The property consisted of 706 morgen, which had been valued at £1,950.

Order granted, on the motion of Mr. Benjamin.

Re ESTATE OF LATE D. J. SWANEPOEL.

Mr. Close, on behalf of the executors of the estate, applied for an order authorising the amendment of letters of administration by the Master of the Supreme Court, whereby the name of Dirk Jacobus Swanepoel be substituted for Dirk Johannes Swanepoel.

Granted.

Ex parte REYNOLDS VEHICLE AND HARNESS CO.

On the application of Mr. Benjamin, the petition for an order confirming the reduction of the capital of the company was ordered to stand over until next Thursday.

Ex parte VENTER.

Mr. Joubert applied for an order authorising the petitioner to remain in possession of certain estate. The petitioner was appointed executor dative in the estate, comprising movable property to the value of £1,930, and immovable property valued at £7,600. The petitioner applied to be allowed to remain in possession of the estate until his death (he being now about sixty years of age), in order that he might be allowed to carry on his farming operations on the same scale as hitherto, and thereby increase the value of the land and the inheritance of the children, provided he gave transfer of all immovable property to the children. There were two mortgages on the immovable estate, and in the event of realisation a considerable portion of the assets would be swallowed up. It might be in the interests of the petitioner to have this arrangement carried through, but it seemed to the applicant (Mr. Joubert) to be more in the interests of the children.

The Chief Justice: It seems decidedly in favour of the children.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp: The only difficulty might be supposing he got into debt.

Mr. Joubert said the land would be transferred. Petitioner was willing to sell the movable property and distribute the proceeds, and pay the costs of the estate out of the funds.

An order was made in terms of the petition, the movable property to be sold, and the proceeds distributed.

Ex parte GEYER.

On the application of Mr. de Waal, and in terms of the Master's Report, an order was made for the partition of certain landed property at Somerset East.

CAUSE LIST.

THOMAS v. BISHOP OF ST. JOHN'S. { 1903. May 1st.

This was an appeal from a decision of the R.M. of St. John's, Umzimkulu.

From the affidavits it appeared that a claim was made against the defendant for the rent of a certain erf at a mission station at St. John's, for school fees, and other payments. There was a further claim for the ejectment of the plaintiff from certain other erven which were specified. The defendant denied liability, and also put in a counter claim on the ground that he had been refused the right to cultivate certain arable lands, and he claimed in reconvention £60 on that head; but that was denied, and upon these pleadings the issue was joined.

Mr. Burton for the appellant; Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the respondent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is the question—a question of law?]

Mr. Burton said it was a little difficult to say on what ground the appeal was based. First of all, it was a question of evidence, and, secondly, of a question of the way in which the claim was framed. It seemed that at St. John's mission station there were certain persons holding erven as owners, and others held as tenants. The mission station provided a school for the people living at the station, and also provided for the water supply, for the fencing in of the arable lands, and generally undertook the management of the whole place. In August or September, 1895, a meeting was held at St. John's, at which it was agreed by the persons present representing the residents of the place that they should pay to the mission a rate of £2 a year to cover all those charges. The defendant was the owner of the erf upon which he resided. He declined to pay the £2 a year rate, but subsequently, upon the return of the Archdeacon, who have been away for some six weeks, he was called before a meeting of the committee representing the residents there, which seemed to have been in charge of the fixing of the rate, and, according to the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiff, to have admitted his liability for the rate and to have agreed to pay it, although he refused at first. The evidence of the plaintiff showed clearly that defendant refused to pay the rate, which was undertaken by the whole of the residents, because he was the owner of his erf. The Archdeacon, who was supported by the members of the committee, held that the defendant subsequently had admitted his liability, and agreed to pay the rate. Defendant denied that. It appeared afterwards he was the owner of his erf; 5s. a year represented the amount paid for his holding. The Magistrate in his judgment took off this five shillings from the rate, for which he held the defendant liable. The Magistrate held defendant liable to pay in regard to the school fees, the fencing of the arable land, etc., all of which the defendant admitted he was liable to pay. The Magistrate found defendant was liable to the extent of thirty-five shillings a year, and that was the judgment.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It seems a very fair charge.]

Mr. Burton: I don't want to prejudice my client, but I confess it seems on the whole to be a reasonable charge,

A claim is made apparently for rent; the whole case seems to be fought on that right up to the end. The Archdeacon maintains that the defendant is liable for the rent of this erf.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Magistrate seems to have held that the defendant has had full consideration for this charge.]

Mr. Burton said the most important claim brought by the Bishop was the claim for a judgment in favour of the Bishop for some four or five erven at the Mission Station. That question was decided in favour of the defendant. The question was whether the Magistrate's decision could make the defendant pay all the costs.

Sir Henry Juta: The application was refused with costs.

Mr. Burton admitted this was so. He did not really know whether he could press for any alteration of this judgment. The whole question came down to a matter of evidence. On one side there was the evidence of the Archdeacon and three members of the committee, and on the other was simply the evidence of the defendant, and the Magistrate said the evidence given by the Archdeacon was untrue, and he found that the evidence of the defendant was correct.

De Villiers, C.J. (without calling upon Sir Henry Juta to reply): I have read the evidence in this case last term, and the impression upon my mind was that the evidence clearly shows that the defendant consented to this arrangement, and that he acknowledged his liability, although he subsequently denied this. The evidence was certainly in favour of the plaintiff. There is ample consideration given to the defendant for this agreement. He got sanitary arrangements, the school was established, and other considerations were derived by the defendant from this arrangement. The Magistrate carefully avoided giving judgment against the defendant, and upon the claim in reconvention he decided in favour of the defendant in reconvention with costs. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs of appeal.

SUPREME COURT

REX v. DEENE. { 1904. May 11th.

The accused was convicted of a contravention of the 33rd section of the above Act by knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution. There was evidence that he was habitually in the company of certain prostitutes, but there was no evidence that he had no visible and honest means of subsistence; on the contrary, there was evidence that he had such means of subsistence.

Held, that the conviction should be set aside.

De Villiers, C.J., mentioned the case of Rex v. Deene, which had been submitted to him for review. His Lordship said: The accused, Abdol Deene, was charged before the A.R.M. of Cape Town with contravening section 33, subsection (a) of Act 36 of 1902 in that "he did wrongfully, unlawfully, and knowingly live wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution." The first and the chief witness against the prisoner was Annie Smith, who had that day been convicted of keeping a brothel at 149, Caledon-street. She said she had lived on the premises for three months. She knew the accused. He came to board in her house a week after she went to live there. He occupied a room there. The accused locked the door of his room, and took the key with him. She never went into the room. Accused kept some clothing in his room. She did not know whether the accused saw her or any of the other girls taking men into the house. Accused continued to live in the room until he was arrested by the police. Witness collected the money from the men in the house. She gave half of the money earned by the girls to them. She kept the other half for food, rent, etc. She paid the rent for the house to a woman known as Dora at the Sir Garnet Hotel. Accused paid her 10s. a week for the room. He had nothing to do with the men who entered the house. Witness was in the yard on the Saturday night when the police came there; the accused was in his room when the summons was served. Accused sometimes had continued in the house when he came home early. In the mornings he only had his coffee in the house before he went out. The Chief Justice continued: Well, other witnesses were called who had seen the accused in the house when they came there, but not a single witness stated that accused had received any part of the earnings. But then the 33rd section of the Act (sub-section 3) makes this provision, "Where a male person is proved to live with or to be habitually in the company of a prostitute, and has no visible and honest means of subsistence, he shall, unless he can satisfy the Court to the contrary, be deemed to be knowingly living on the earnings of prostitution." In the present case it has been proved that the accused was habitually in the company of prostitutes, but there is wholly insufficient proof that he had no visible or honest means of subsistence; on the contrary, there is evidence that he had honest means of subsistence. He was employed by the South African Breweries, and, amongst others, the witness Benjamin says that the accused is his foreman at the Woodstock Breweries. There are other witnesses to show that he had honest and visible means of subsistence. This sub-section, therefore, does not apply to the prisoner, and, inasmuch as there is no other evidence that the accused lived wholly or in part on the earnings of prostitution, I am of opinion that the Magistrate ought not to have convicted him. The sentence was 18 months' imprisonment and 15 lashes. The sentence will be quashed.

COLLISON v. COLLISON. { 1903. May 4th.

Divorce—Proof of adultery.

Where husband and wife live in the same house, the Court will require very strong corroborative evidence before finding that they have ceased to cohabit, and that a child born of the wife is illegitimate.

Held, that the facts (1) of a white woman having given a Kafir meals in her house against her husband's wish, (2) of her having left her husband's home, (3) of her having subsequent given birth to a child and registered it under a false name, is sufficient evidence of adultery.

This was an action for divorce instituted by Griffin Collison, of Hanover-street, Cape Town, against his wife on the ground of adultery. Mr. Wilkinson appeared for the petitioner. The respondent was not represented.

The evidence of the plaintiff showed that the parties were married on the 24th September, 1888, and from that time onwards they lived together until July, 1901. Differences arose between them on account of a Kafir being in the house. Cohabitation ceased in July, 1901, although the parties continued to live in the same house until November of the same year, when the respondent left the house. On the 25th June, 1902, the respondent gave birth to a child.

One of the daughters of the applicant said that the Kafir used to come to the house and be served with meals by her mother, but witness did not observe any familiarity between them.

A midwife testified to having gone to register a child of the respondent in the name of Jacobus Adams. Witness stated that the child was not black; it was similar to the other children of the parties.

De Villiers, C.J.: Where husband and wife live in the same house, and it is alleged by either party that he or she has not cohabited for a time, very strong corroborative evidence is required to justify the Court in holding that there is adultery, because the presumption is that if the husband and wife live together in the same house, they are still cohabiting. In the present case there is certainly very strong evidence that they did not sleep together, and the husband says positively that since the 1st July he never had cohabitation with her. These circumstances would not be sufficient to justify the Court in granting a decree of divorce unless there were very strong corroborative circumstances to show that there was adultery. In the present case, it appears to the Court that there are such corroborative circumstances—the fact that she had, against the wish of her husband, given meals to a native, and that she afterwards left the place against the wish of her husband. During her absence she gave birth to a child. She gave the midwife a false name, and the name of a man called Adams as being the father of the child. That seems to be an admission on her part that the plaintiff, whose name is Collison, is not the father. These circumstances together justify the Court in granting the divorce, the petitioner to have custody of the children.

GREEFF v. MCLEOD. { 1903. May 4th.

This was an action brought by Mrs. Greeff, of Laingsburg, against William James McLeod, formerly of Laingsburg, but now of Aberdeen, for the sum of £122 4s. 9d., being balance due on a promissory note for £186, principal and interest.

The defendant admitted plaintiff's claim, but counterclaimed £116 17s. 9d. on an account, and £52 0s. 6d., balance of principal and interest, due on a promissory note, and he claimed in reconvention for the sum of £32 18s. 3d.

The plaintiff's case was that she wished to make the Rev. Mr. Weitz a present of £200, and she gave her signed promissory note to defendant, who was then acting as her agent, to raise that amount upon the security of the note. Defendant did so, and had the amount paid to Mr. Weitz. The plaintiff by periodical payments reduced the amount of the promissory note to £52 0s. 6d.

The plaintiff alleged she paid defendant the amount of £200 by reducing a bond which she had against him of £600 to £400. Defendant denied ever having been paid in full the amount.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan), for plaintiff; Mr. C. W. de Villiers (with him Mr. Russell) for defendant.

Evidence was given by the defendant.

Sir H. Juta: I understand that the witness says that he owes bills for £250, and that these two (produced) are one for £150 and the other for £100. I would like it to be clear that he says that. One is a renewal of the other, as a matter of fact.

Witness: It is such a long time ago that I cannot be quite clear. I am not prepared to prove whether these are discounted, or renewals, or whatever they are.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to witness): You see you have had ample time to prepare for this case.]

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta, witness said he gave £200 to the Rev. Mr. Weitz for the promissory notes. He was suing upon the £100 promissory note, of which £50 had been paid off. He was not in a position to show how the amount was made up, except that it was shown in his books. He had not brought his books showing his transactions in 1901 and 1902; he had not thought it necessary. He claimed £52 0s. 6d. He had got back his £200. If his books were of any use he could only claim on his ledger accounts. He could not say what the promissory note of £150 was for.

By the Chief Justice: He did not know on what date his bond was reduced to the amount of £200.

Judgment was given for the plaintiff for £186, less £116 17s. 9d., due to the defendant, thus showing a balance of £69 2s. 3d. in favour of the plaintiff. Judgment was entered for £69 2s. 3d., with costs.

Mr. De Villiers submitted that the defendant had in part succeeded in establishing his claim, and that the question of costs should be reconsidered.

The Chief Justice, however, pointed out that the defendant had not tendered any money that might have been due to the plaintiff, and that the decision as to costs must stand.

[Plaintiff's Attorneys: Tredgold, McIntyre and Bissett. Defendant's Attorney: D. Tennant.]

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

BOLUS BROS. v. JACOBSON.

This was an action brought by Bolus Bros., stock and share brokers, who carry on business at Cape Town, against a Mr. Jacobson, of Oudtshoorn, for the recovery of £820 14s. 9d.

Mr. Benjamin represented plaintiffs, and defendant did not appear.

The action was for £820 14s. 9d., being loss occasioned to plaintiffs in respect of two Coronation shares, which plaintiffs purchased for defendant on his instructions, and which defendant repudiated. Plaintiffs resold the shares, and brought an action for the deficiency in price occasioned thereby, together with the costs and expenses attending such re-sale.

Gillham Bolus, one of the partners, stated that he was acquainted with the defendant. He had a conversation with him regarding share transactions. He remembered receiving a wire from defendant to buy Coronation shares. The shares were bought at £2,500 each, and defendant was notified of the sale. Subsequently, defendant wired that he understood the price of the shares to be £25. Witness stated that he quoted Coronation shares to defendant before purchasing as at £2,700. After the purchase the shares rose to £2,800, and fell again to £2,000. Plaintiffs sent in an account for the transactions, but defendant repudiated liability, alleging that plaintiffs were never instructed to purchase Coronation shares. Plaintiffs re-sold the shares—one at £2,135 and one at £2,120, there being thus a deficiency, including the expenses to which the plaintiffs had been put for brokerage, Exchange fees, and insurance, of £820 14s. 9d.

After having heard Mr. Benjamin in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: In this case the plaintiffs sued defendant for loss suffered by them on the re-sale of shares, which they allege had been bought by them for defendant on his instructions. Upon the re-sale the plaintiffs allege that they had a loss of £820 14s. 9d., and this amount they now claim from defendant, this amount including, besides fall in prices of the shares, also other expenses which plaintiffs were put to through the re-sale and through the re-cancellation of sale. The defence set up by defendant is that in instructing the plaintiffs to purchase for the prices quoted by them, he had made a mistake as to the meaning of certain figures used in the telegram, and that he was under the impression that the prices quoted were really 26 and 27, and not 2,600 and 2,700, and that he was led into that mistake to some extent by a conversation which he had had with the plaintiffs previously, in which he had been told by them that the price then quoted for Coronations was £25. Now, if one looks at the correspondence that took place between the parties, partly by telegram and partly by letter, I think it must follow that the explanation of defendant that he had entered into this transaction under a mistake cannot be accepted as true, because it appears that the first telegram that was put in was one in which he instructed the plaintiffs in the following terms: "Buy three Coronations if you think good prospects." When that telegram was sent the other telegram was not in existence yet, and, consequently, he could not have been misled by a telegram which was not in existence. Here he gives positive instructions to "buy Coronations" if the plaintiffs thought prospects good, and I must take it that he acted as a reasonable man, that he was instructing the plaintiffs to buy Coronations for some price which he must have seen quoted somewhere, and that he must at the time when he sent instructions for the purchase of the shares have had in his mind the price that he was willing to pay more or less, and Mr. Bolus tells us that these prices are quoted daily in the newspapers, and at that time were quoted from £2,600 to £2,700. The defendant's explanation that he was deceived by the figures in the telegram which was a reply to this cannot therefore be accepted as correct. The reply was: "Buyers, £2,600; sellers, £2,700. Cannot advise; opinions differ." Now as to the instructions which had already been given to the plaintiffs to purchase, they, acting upon the telegram they had received, paid over £2,000 to £2,200, and the transaction could not have been questioned by the defendant if the plaintiffs had believed bona fide the prospects were good. If, in their opinion, the prospects were good, and on receipt of that telegram they had without further question bought the shares for £2,000, the transaction would have been a good one, and in that case it would have been impossible for defendant to say anything had been done by the plaintiffs which had led him into that error. The question arises: this telegram of the 2nd or 3rd January having been sent by the plaintiffs to defendant, is there any probability that the defendant was misled by it? Mr. Bolus has told us that this is the form of these telegrams, and the figures there given representing pounds, are the forms which usually pass between brokers and persons dealing in shares, and any person dealing in shares could not have been deceived into believing that the figures 2,600 meant £26, as is alleged by the defendant in his plea. And there is the further consideration which would prevent one from coming to that conclusion, that in the same telegram we have the mention of several thousands Here, therefore, thousands were clearly brought to the mind of the defendant. The defendant, having already stated that 25 had been quoted before, is now met by the plaintiffs that here thousands are mentioned, and he therefore seeks to shelter himself under the plea that thousands meant to his mind thousands of shillings, and consequently he sets up the alternative defence, as it were, that if he were wrong in believing that the impression that the 2,600 meant £26, then he was under the impression that it meant 2,600 shillings. Well, these contentions are mutually destructive, and they cannot be both accepted as a defence, and I think it shows the hopeless position in which the defendant stands in this case. I think it is clearly proved that he gave instructions to the plaintiffs to buy the shares at the prices which were then quoted, that he was perfectly well aware that the prices then quoted were over £2,000, and that when he instructed the plaintiffs without reservation to buy, even without asking them what the prices were, he knew at what price he intended to buy, and he knew it was something over £2,000. His defence, therefore, entirely fails in the attempt made to show that he was under the impression that only £25 was the price which he had promised to pay them, or else 2,500 shillings. Under the circumstances, when the plaintiffs called upon him to complete the transaction, and he failed to do so, and repudiated the whole transaction, they were entitled to resell these shares at his risk, and to be recouped in all the losses they appear to have been put to through the fall in the price of the shares and with respect to any other expenses they were put to in re-sale after the cancellation of the sale to the defendant. Under the circumstances, judgment must be entered for the plaintiffs as prayed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Honourable Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

VISSER v. VAN ZYL. { 1903. May 5th. „ 15th.

Vindication—Ownership—Jus tertii.

The plaintiff was directed by his father, who was the owner of several horses, to fetch them on the plaintiff's farm. The plaintiff said the defendant might take them on his own responsibility, and he subsequently sued the defendant for the return of the horses or payment of their value.

Held, that the defendant was entitled to set up his father's ownership and direction as a defence to the action.

This was an action brought by Johannes Dirk Jacobus Visser, farmer, Klipbank, in the district of Malmesbury, against Hermanus van Zyl, farmer, Zeekoe Vlei, in the district of Van Rhyn's Dorp, to recover possession of two horses or their value, and £20 damages for alleged wrongful removal and detention. The declaration set forth that the defendant went to the plaintiff's farm and removed the two horses in dispute, and that he refused to restore them. The plea admitted the allegations in the formal paragraphs of the declaration, and said, with regard to the main allegation, that the two horses were the property of defendant's father, that they were running about on the veld, and that, acting on behalf of his father, he took possession of them. He admitted that he refused to restore the horses or pay the value. The replication was general.

Mr. Burton for plaintiff; Mr. Buchanan for defendant.

Mr. Burton said that the matter was one of considerable importance. The plaintiff in August, 1901, received from an officer of the British forces two horses, which he kept upon his farm. The horses were not in a very good condition, they were poor and scabby, and appeared not to have been looked after. Plaintiff attended to the horses, and improved their condition considerably. From that time he kept them until the 8th August, 1902, after the declaration of peace, and while martial law was still in force, when he was ordered by the officer to bring them into the Remount Camp. At first he demurred, but eventually he took them in. The horses were sold at Malmesbury, on the 8th August, 1902, at a military auction. Plaintiff purchased one of the horses, and the other was purchased by another man from whom, however, plaintiff subsequently bought it. He then took these two horses to his farm, and defendant thereupon came to him, and claimed the two horses in dispute as his. He insisted upon his claim, and eventually took the two horses with him, at the same time giving defendant a receipt for them.

Plaintiff remonstrated with him, and stated he bought the two horses at a military auction, and paid for them. The defendant was away from his farm as a rebel. It was while he was away from the farm these two horses were taken by the military. Counsel suggested that the evidence that he had in court should first be taken, and that the case should then be adjourned until they could procure the evidence of one of the military officers.

Mr. Buchanan informed the Court that the defendant had not had the slightest indication in the declaration of the line that the plaintiff was taking up, and the consequence was that the defence had not been prepared to meet such a case as had now been laid before the Court.

Johannes Dirk Jacobus Visser, the plaintiff, said that in November, 1901, he received on his farm two horses. The war was still going on, and martial law was in force in the district of Malmesbury. He received the horses from Gideon Lensing, who was a lieutenant in the British Army, to be looked after until the war was over. The horses were about two years old, and they were in good condition. They became scurvied six months afterwards. He took the horses and looked after them until August, 1902. He then got a letter from Field-Cornet Kotze directing that he was to bring the horses to Hopefield. He did not comply. He went to Hopefield, and told Kotze that he had the horses under his protection, and he then met Lieutenant Ruperte, the remount officer, who ordered him to bring the horses to Malmesbury. He did so about the 7th or 8th August. The horses were sold by Captain Sweetland, the remount officer. Witness bought one for £15, and the other was bought by a man named Hofmann for £7. He subsequently bought the other horse from Hofmann for £14, and took both animals back to the farm. The defendant came to his farm on October 9. Witness did not know him before. Van Zyl claimed the horses, and witness told them that he had bought them from the military, and that he should not part with them. The horses were brought to the stable, and Mr. Van Zyl said they were his horses, and he was determined to take them. Witness told him that he must not take them. Witness went away to another stable, and when he returned he found that the defendant had removed the two horses and sent them away. The man said they were his horses, that he was a rebel, and that he could take them wherever he found them. Mr. Van Zyl gave him a receipt for the horses.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why did you not prevent him from taking the horses,] Witness replied that he was an old man and Van Zyl was stronger than he. He did not want to have any fighting.

The defendant did not declare that the horses belonged to his father, but said they were his own horses. He saw Lieut. Lensing after the latter handed the horses to him on several occasions. Lieut. Lensing called after witness had bought one of the horses.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan, witness said Lensing did not sell the horses to him in 1901. He admitted that he told Van Zyl and Smith that he bought the horses from Lensing. The reason why he told the untruth was that Smith wanted to buy the animals. There was a mark on the horses when he got them, but he did not know in what part. He knew Mr. Greeff. Greeff told him in July, 1902, that he recognised the horses as belonging to Van Zyl. He admitted that he then said he could not help it, as he had bought the horses from Lensing in November, 1901. He was only making fun at the time. Greeff did not tell him that he ought to get his money back from Lensing. He afterwards went to Malmesbury with Lensing, who wanted to take the horses. Lensing claimed the horses as his own. After witness had heard from Greeff, who was originally the owner of the horses, he took them into Malmesbury. When the horses came back from Malmesbury in August, 1902, they had a "P" on their left side. Lensing said he had received £50 from the Remount Department for the two horses. At the sale he told the remount officer that Mr. Lensing might come and claim the horses. He did not know whether Lensing was the owner of the horses. Lensing was an intelligence officer. Witness gave up the horses to Captain Sweetland, who was a protection horse officer. He did not tell Greeff, after the sale, that he had had to pay for the horses twice—to Lensing once and the military a second time. On October 9, when Mr. Van Zyl came, he was accompanied by Mr. Greeff. The defendant asked him if he had two strange horses, but he did not allege that they belonged to his father. The horses were not in the veld. His coachman had been to water the horses, and was just bringing them back to the stable. The defendant pointed to two horses, and said that they belonged to him. Witness replied that he could not help it, as he had bought the horses. Van Zyl took a halter, and witness and his son went to another stable. The defendant caught the horses in the stable, and sent them away.

Re-examined by Mr. Burton, witness said a good number of farmers in the Malmesbury district had horses placed with them by the military for safe keeping.

[De Villiers, C.J.: (to Mr. Burton): Did I understand you to say that the horses were only requisitioned by the military in the first instance? Is that the mising link in the evidence?]

Mr. Burton said that that was the portion of the evidence that was missing, and which they hoped would be supplied by the officer whom he had mentioned.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In case of postponement there should be reasonable ground for believing that evidence on this point would be forthcoming.]

Re-examination continued: There were other farmers in the Malmesbury district in 1901 who had horses for protection.

The plaintiff's son also spoke to the visit to his father's farm by the defendant. The defendant, he said, did not say a single word in his presence about the horses belonging to his father.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Van Zyl did say that a certain mark was used by his father, and that the horses which he pointed out should bear that mark. The defendant wrote out the receipt produced.

Edward Ruperti, late Assistant Officer Commanding of Remounts and district member of the Protection Board, said that he was sent to Hopefield to sell all ownerless horses. There was an order issued by the military in July calling upon owners to claim within a certain time. He was present when the two horses were sold in the Remount Camp. They were selling horses every day. The men who protected the horses had the first offer of the horses. If they were not prepared to pay the price set upon them by the military, then the horses were put up to auction. Plaintiff bought one of the horses which had been under his protection, and Hoffmann bought the other.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He did not know Lensing at all. When horses were requisitioned a form was usually issued. That was not done everywhere. In the Colesberg district and Clanwilliam hundreds of horses were sent away on which no requisition notes were given. These were protection horses. He did not know whether the two horses in question were commandeered. The horses were "protected" on behalf of the owners, but in many cases they did not know who the owners were. Notice was given to owners to claim their horses within a certain time, failing which, the horses would be sold by auction. He did not know what the mark "P" on the horses meant. The military put on as their mark a broad arrow upside down.

Mr. Burton intimated that that was as far as he could carry the case at present, and it would remain to be seen, if a postponement was granted, how much further the officer's evidence would take the case.

Mr. Buchanan submitted that the plaintiff had not established his right to the horses.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that possession was a good title as against a wrongdoer. He thought they would be in a better position to judge as to the postponement after they had heard the evidence for the defence.

Evidence was then called for the defence.

Pieter Adrian Marthinus van Zyl, father of the defendant, stated that Captain Fryer was commandant of the district up to December, 1901. Witness had certain horses on his farm. The horses had been requisitioned from his farm. He had two young horses on his farm, with others. He got authority from Captain Fryer to keep these horses. He arranged with Captain Fryer to send the horses for protection to Malmesbury, but owing to the enemy being in the district, he was told to keep them. The two horses he had on his farm were the ones he had now. They were bred by him. On a certain day Mr. Lensing came to see him. Witness said the horses were in the kraal, and that Mr. Lensing told him it would be better if he took them for protection. He had three young horses, one mare, and one mule. Some forty men came to take the horses. He could not say whether they took them all away. He got no receipt for them. He heard where these horses were, and sent his son to fetch the horses. The horses were his own, and not his son's. He was summoned as a rebel, but they could not prove anything against him. He recognised the two horses brought back from plaintiff's farm as his own horses. His son was in the rebellion in November, 1901. When the column took the horses, they did not ask if they belonged to his son.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He got permission from Captain Fryer to keep the horses. His son was on the farm when he got this letter. When the horses were removed, his son had left the farm. His son left the farm on 25th November, 1901, and the animals were removed on the 28th November, 1901. Lensing said nothing to him about his son being in rebellion. Lensing took the horses to see if they were serviceable. None of them appeared to be so. The military did not take horses without a note. He filed a claim for the whole lot of horses, but he subsequently told his attorney to withdraw claims for these two horses. His son had five mares on the farm his own property. He was unmarried. He was certain the horses taken away were his and not the property of his son.

Hermanus van Zyl, the defendant, said he was not at his father's farm when the horses were taken. He was on commando. The horses in dispute belonged to his father. He denied that they had been presented to him. He did not claim the horses as his own. When he visited plaintiff's farm he told plaintiff his father had sent him for the two horses of his father's. He did not say the horses were his. He then went away. He told plaintiff again the horses were his father's, and that they had his father's mark. He denied ever saying he was a rebel, and that "he would claim horses wherever he went." He gave a receipt for them.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: His father had five mares of his own. Their ages were two, five, and six years. Two of the mares had two foals, and he sold them, and the other three had no foals. He had no animals, except the five mares. The five mares were not taken by the military. He said nothing about the horses belonging to him on getting them from plaintiff. He said they were his father's. They bore his father's mark. He had other stock besides the mares, a few cattle, etc., all with a mark on them. It was not true that he stated to plaintiff that the horses were his own. Greeff knew perfectly well the horses belonged to his father. He put his father's address on the back of the receipt given for the horses. He had also to give his own address. He was surprised when he got the summons instead of his father, as the horses belonged to him.

Re-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He went to plaintiff's farm on his father's business.

Peter Greeff stated that he resided at Moorreesburg. He was second cousin to the plaintiff. He knew plaintiff well. He also knew his mark on the horses. He knew the horses in dispute in 1901 as Mr. Van Zyl's, sen.'s, horses. He saw the horses again in July, 1902, at plaintiff's farm. He had a conversation with plaintiff about them. He told plaintiff he had got a letter from Mr. Van Zyl, sen., to see if there were a pair of horses there belonging to him. He had seen the horses there. He told plaintiff who owned the horses. Plaintiff said he bought them from Mr. Lensing. He told plaintiff he had a letter from the rightful owner of the horses, and advised him to send them back. Plaintiff said he would not. He bought the horses and paid for them, and defendant must get his money from Lensing. This was before the horses went to the Remount Camp. Witness offered to buy one of the horses from plaintiff. Plaintiff said he paid £50 for the horses. In July they had defendant's mark, and in August they had a different mark. He went with defendant's son to plaintiff's farm. The plaintiff was not there. Mr. Visser came to him in February this year, and asked him about the letter "P," which was on the back of the receipt, remarking that Hermanus could not be spelt with a "P," but witness explained that that was his father's name.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He joined the enemy on the 14th October, 1901. Defendant and he were in the same commando for a time. In July of last year he told Mr. P. A. van Zyl that the horses were running at Visser's After that witness asked Visser to sell him one of the horses. The reason he did so was because Mr. Van Zyl would not come and fetch them. The defendant sometimes referred to his "father's" horses and sometimes to "their" horses. Visser understood clearly that the horses belonged to defendant's father. Witness could not understand why Visser came back in February to ask the meaning of the letter "P" when it was explained to him at the time.

Jacobus Smith, of Hopefield, said he knew both the plaintiff and the defendant. He remembered that a man named Lensing came to his place with a lot of armed coloured people and two loose horses. Lensing wanted to exchange the horses, but witness refused. He afterwards went to Visser's farm, and the plaintiff explained that he bought the horses from Lensing.

Henry Fras Fryer said that he was commandant at Clanwilliam from January to 1st December, 1901. Captain Kincaid Smith, of the R.A., succeeded him. He knew Mr. Pieter van Zyl, the father of the defendant. He recognised a letter the defendant's father wrote, requesting witness to allow him to keep his horses on his farm. Excepting what Van Zyl told him he could not say if the horses were the same. He could not say whether they belonged to the son or the father, but witness offered to buy them from the father. He certainly treated the horses as his own.

Cross-examined: He made the offer to purchase the horses about August, 1901. Beyond the father's refusal he could not say whether the horses belonged to father or son. The regulations with regard to the removal of horses were not always carried out. Sometimes he had complaints that animals were taken away without requisition notes being handed over.

Re-examined: There was nothing in his books relative to the action before the Court.

By the Chief Justice: When peace was proclaimed he was in Cape Town.

The Chief Justice (to witness): Was the district clear at that time?

Mr. Burton said that he would not dispute the point that the district was clear in August.

The case was then adjourned until Friday, 15th inst.

The Chief Justice said it would be open to either side to produce further evidence as to the manner in which the military authorities took possession of the horses in dispute.

Postea (May 15).

Gideon Jacobus Lensing, called by Mr. Burton, said he was a farmer in the district of Richmond. During the late war he acted as intelligence officer with the column of Colonel Wyndham, who was operating in the district of Van Rhyn's Dorp. He recollected the taking of horses from the farm of Mr. Van Zyl, senior. The columns were then actively operating against the Boer forces; they had had an engagement a few days before about five miles west of Zeekoe Vlei, against, he believed, Commandant Smidt's commando. He did not know at that time that Mr. Van Zyl, junior, had gone into rebellion. He went to the farm by order of Colonel Wyndham, commanding officer of the 16th Lancers, to take the horses away, because young Mr. Van Zyl (the defendant) had joined the Boers as a rebel. The horses were brought to the kraal. Witness asked Mr. Van Zyl, senior, to point out to him the two young horses belonging to his son. The rest of the horses belonged to the defendant's father. Witness reported to Colonel Wyndham about all the horses, and the O.C. then sent him back to remove the two animals belonging to young Mr. Van Zyl. Witness handed them over to the Colonel, the column moved away; but about eight days afterwards the O.C. sent the two horses to witness's squadron along with a message that he must look after them and feed them. He had had the horses in his possession about eight days or so when Colonel Wyndham said he did not know what to do with them, and that if they were of any use to witness, he could take them as his own and keep them.

The Chief Justice: Where is Colonel Wyndham at present?

Mr. Burton: I think he is in England.

The Chief Justice: I should like to know what Colonel Wyndham has to say about it.

Witness (continuing) said he took the horses away with him in October or November, 1901, and he met Visser at his farm. The latter offered to keep the horses for him if he would let them work for him till the war was over. When he took the horses he told the elder Mr. Van Zyl that he was removing them, because his son had joined the rebels.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He did not know whether Colonel Wyndham had gone to England. He left Colonel Wyndham in April, 1902. Witness was an intelligence officer, not a remount officer; he was scouting; it was his duty not to commandeer, but to bring in horses by order. The column were acting as a convoy from Lambert's Bay. He had nothing to do with giving receipts for requisitions; that was the staff officer's duty. He did not value the horses. Mr. Van Zyl told him about a letter he had had from the commandant of the district about keeping his horses, but witness did not read it. Most of the horses on Van Zyl, sen.'s farm were marked "O." He took all the horses away.

By the Chief Justice: The two horses which he took and which he sold to Visser were those which Mr. Van Zyl pointed out as belonging to his son. The horses were given to witness by Colonel Wyndham, but they were afterwards taken again by the military and sold to Visser.

Further cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Colonel Wyndham did not commandeer the horses for military purposes. The two horses in question were not fit for military work, and witness proposed an exchange with another man. He did not sell the horses to Mr. Visser. Mr. Visser asked him to sell the horses to him after the war was over. He afterwards told him (Visser) he might let him have them after the war. He had not sold Visser the horses at any time. The horses were not removed as protection horses, but as booty. There were a few people killed and wounded in the engagement. He himself was wounded. He did not know whether the defendant was in the commando at the time. They were fighting. In his letter to Visser in April, 1902, he offered to let him have the horses for £25. He supposed the reason why the military took the horses again afterwards was because he had not given a receipt to Mr. Van Zyl. He came into Malmesbury, and he sent in a claim for the horses in September or October last after the military sale.

Mr. Burton, in argument, contended that the property in question should be considered as "booty."

De Villiers, G.J.: It is not necessary to hear Mr. Buchanan on behalf of the defendant. Mr. Burton has candidly admitted that if the horses belonged to the defendant's father then, with a certain reservation to which I shall presently refer, the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed. There is no question in the present case of the horses having been requisitioned, because it is admitted that none of the requisites of a requisition had been complied with. The defendant's father stated that the horses were taken to the plaintiff's farm for protection. They were subsequently sold to the plaintiff, but afterwards the defendant, by his father's direction, fetched the horses from the plaintiff's farm. There is no circumstance in the case which would justify the Court in deciding that the defendant's father, being the owner, had ever been deprived of his ownership, and defendant would, therefore, clearly be entitled to rely up his father's ownership, as a defence to the present action. The reservation which Mr. Burton had made is to this effect, that inasmuch as defendant's father had led Mr. Lensing to believe that the horses belonged to his son, the son is not entitled to take advantage of the ownership of the father. The plaintiff was not prejudiced in any way by the statement made by the defendant's father, but I am bound to add that, in my opinion, the defendant's father never stated to Lensing that the horses belonged to the defendant. This being the view of the Court, it is unnecessary to enter into the wider question raised by Mr. Burton in his argument. The plaintiff has not established his ownership to the horses, and the defendant has shown he was sent by his father to fetch the horses. In my opinion there must be absolution from the instance with costs.

Maasdorp, J.: In my view of the case, I come to the conclusion that it has been satisfactorily proved that the property in these horses was in the father, and not in the son. The evidence on that point is very strong, and I cannot come to any other conclusion. I am satisfied that when Lensing went to that farm he went with the object of ascertaining whether there was any property of the son, the defendant in this case, who had gone into rebellion, which might be taken possession of by the military authorities as booty, and on arriving at the farm, the question was raised between the defendant's father and Lensing. I am satisfied it was discussed, and that Lensing did inquire whether there was any property belonging to the son on the farm, and that the father told him that these two horses belonged to the son. That question was discussed, I feel sure: and if it was discussed, then it is admitted that the father misled Lensing by the statement he made when he said all the horses on the farm belonged to him, and as a matter of fact, there were five mares belonging to the son among the property. The father gave out that these two horses belonged to the son, in order to save the other property belonging to the son. Thus the defendant set up the defence that the property was not his. I cannot find that anything that has been done by the father in making this statement has induced the plaintiff in this case to alter his position in such a way as to debar the father from setting up the claim that the property belongs to his son.

Kotze, J., expressed his opinion that the two horses belonged to the father of the defendant, and that the defendant on the occasion in question acted for and on behalf of his father, and therefore, under these circumstances, he concurred.

Mr. Burton applied for defendant to be allowed his and his witnesses' expenses.

De Villiers, C.J., said that these would be allowed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

Ex parte JORDAAN. { 1903. May 6th.

Mr. De Waal stated that the petitioner's attorney had given notice to the trustee, the petitioner being an insolvent, that he would apply for his rehabilitation on the 6th day of May instead of the 7th. The notice was inadvertently set down for a day on which the Court did not sit to hear provisional cases, and petitioned applied that their lordships should direct the Registrar to accept the papers for the following day, May 7.

De Villiers, C.J., asked whether the trustee had received notice of the postponement.

Mr. De Waal replied that the trustee was the largest creditor.

Application granted.

LEVY V. ROSE. { 1903. May 6th.

Agreement to give lease and occupation - Time—Essence of contract.

The defendant agreed to give a five years' lease of certain premises to the plaintiff, who paid a quarter's rent in advance. At the time of the agreement the premises were not completed, and the defendant agreed to give occupation at a certain date. On the arrival of the date the premises were not completed, and the time was further extended to a fixed date which the Court found to be an essential part of the agreement. At the expiration of such extended time the defendant gave the plaintiff the keys, but after the plaintiff had taken possession an objection was raised by the municipal inspector to occupation without an occupation licence, and the defendant told the plaintiff to leave until such certificate could be obtained. The plaintiff vacated the premises, and refused to take occupation ten days afterwards when an occupation licence was forthcoming.

Held, that the defendant's failure to give possession at the time agreed upon released the plaintiff from the obligation of taking a five years' lease, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover back the rent which he had paid in advance.

This was an action brought by Solomon Levi, of Salt River, against Manuel Rose, of Long-street, Cape Town, for the cancellation of a lease, and the return of £36 paid in advance in consideration of rent for three months, and also for damages. The declaration set out that on or about January 3, 1903, the defendant agreed to let and the plaintiff agreed to hire a certain shop and rooms situate at the corner of Milton-road and Main-road, Sea Point, for a period of five years at a rental of £12 a month payable in advance, the said premises to be used by the plaintiff in his business as a boot and shoe dealer from the 31st January then ensuing, the defendant undertaking to complete and finish the said premises then in course of erection before the 31st January. The defendant failed to have the said premises completed and finished on the aforesaid date. Thereafter, the plaintiff accepted possession of the premises, saving all such claims as he might justly have for damages by reason of the breach of contract on the part of the defendant. On or about the 3rd March the plaintiff was ordered by the Sea Point Municipality to vacate the said premises immediately, as the premises had not been approved or a certificate of occupation granted as required by the bye-laws of the Municipality. Plaintiff paid on or about the 31st January £36, being three months' rent, he expended upon fixtures £5, and in addition to that he had suffered damages estimated at £100 in respect of loss of business profits, owing to his not being in possession of the premises, as well as time and trouble that he had been put to. He prayed for an order cancelling the agreement of lease, and judgment for £36, £5 and £100 respectively, and costs of suit. The defendant, in his plea, said that the lease was entered into on the understanding that Levy should have possession of the premises on the same being completed ready for occupation. The defendant denied that the 31st January or any other date was agreed upon for giving possession of the premises. Thereafter, the defendant used all reasonable expedition in the erection of the premises, and on the 1st February he, by his agent, one Lancaster, gave notice to the plaintiff's attorneys that the premises would be ready for occupation on or about the 31st March, and that he might put in his fixtures. On the 19th February the defendant forwarded to the plaintiff's attorney for signature a draft lease embodying the terms of the lease, and on the 28th February the plaintiff, unconditionally and without reservation, accepted possession of the premises, but he thereafter left the premises, as defendant had not obtained a certificate of occupation from the Municipality's engineer. Afterwards the defendant, having obtained a certificate, tendered re-possession of the premises to the plaintiff with the sum of £12 as and for any damages which he might have sustained in respect of the certificate not having been obtained, together with taxed costs. The defendant had since the said date always been ready and willing to carry out the said tender. Defendant denied the allegation that plaintiff had sustained any damage through any act of his for which was liable in law, and prayed that the claim might be dismissed, with costs. In reconvention, he said that the plaintiff unlawfully neglected and refused to sign the lease, and he claimed in default of performance £500 damages and costs.

Mr. Benjamin for the plaintiff; Mr. Close for the defendant.

[De Villiers, C.J., said that before the case was proceeded with, he wished to understand what the defence was. The plaintiff alleged that the Sea Point Municipality ordered him to vacate the premises; that he (the plaintiff) left the premises, as defendant had not obtained a certificate for occupation from the Municipal Engineer, but the defence did not admit or deny whether the plaintiff was ordered by the Municipality to leave.]

Mr. Close said their position was that the plaintiff left the premises in consequence of some remark made to him by the inspector of the Municipality, but he was not ordered to go, and he could not be ordered to go.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Because if he was ordered to go, and he left, I suppose that he was not bound afterwards to come back?]

We contend that there is no authority on the part of the Municipal Inspector to cause him to go.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then that is the main issue—whether he was properly ordered by the Municipal Engineer from the premises.]

The plaintiff, Solomon Levy, stated he was a boot and shoe maker, and in January this year he saw some premises in course of construction at Sea Point, and interviewed the defendant at 73, Long-street. The defendant agreed to let him have the shop for a consideration of three months' rent in advance. Plaintiff paid £36, and the defendant said the shop would be ready within four weeks. A five years' lease was agreed upon. Plaintiff requested defendant to put the time of completion in writing. Plaintiff could not read, and he put the receipt on a file. When three weeks elapsed, plaintiff saw the premises, and very little had been done. The defendant said he could not help that, and denied giving the plaintiff anything in writing. At the end of the fourth week little progress had been made, and plaintiff again interviewed the defendant. The defendant said he could not help the delay, and that plaintiff would have to wait. Plaintiff's attorney wrote a letter to defendant asking him to complete the premises within a week, to which he replied through his attorney that no time was specified, and that the plaintiff would get possession when the premises were ready. Plaintiff's attorney further wrote, when defndant denied having made any arrangement, pointing out that if there was no arrangement, it would be absurd to suppose that the defendant could have plaintiff's money and finish the premises just when he wished. On the 20th February plaintiff's attorney wrote to defendant's agent acknowledging receipt of copy of lease. On the 24th February defendant's agent wrote requesting return of copy of lease, and asking when the plaintiff would be ready to sign it. He got possession of the premises on the 28th February, and the defendant offered the shop or the money back. Plaintiff told defendant he would hold him responsible for the loss of time. Defendant said the shop was quite ready, and on the following Monday, March 2, he went to the premises, and commenced putting up fixtures. The following day he started his business, when the building inspector came in and said he had got no right to be there, and ordered him out at once. Plaintiff saw defendant, who asked him to wait a few minutes, in order that he might get a certificate. Subsequently he went to the shop, and the defendant asked him what he meant by going there, and told him to clear out. Defendant offered to return the cost of carting between Salt River and Sea Point, and plaintiff accepted a note from him. In reply to plaintiff's attorney, defendant's attorney wrote stating that the defendant emphatically denied that the plaintiff was turned out by him, and offering to obtain a certificate on the 16th March. On the 9th March defendant's attorney wrote stating that the certificate had been obtained, and offering £12 for any damages sustained, together with costs. The second day after plaintiff had been moved out, defendant saw him in his shop at Salt River, and they both went to plaintiff's attorney's office. Defendant sent him upstairs, telling him he would be with him in a minute, but he did not turn up that afternoon. Plaintiff claimed cancellation of lease, £36 rent paid, £5 gas fittings, and he based his claim for damages on a calculation that his profits would be £25 per month.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How do you know you would have made those profits?]

Sea Point is a very good place.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why didn't you take the premises when he offered you possession?]

He would not give it to me.

[By Maasdorp, J.: He took the other shop three days after he was moved.]

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: Witness had a bookkeeper, but he (plaintiff) looked after the receipts on the file. The bookkeeper read the receipt to plaintiff, and he was then aware that there was nothing on the paper about possession in three weeks. The defendant did not tell him that the buildings would be completed by contract in four months. If the inspector said that he merely told him about the certificate, and did not order him out, he would be telling a lie. The defendant refused to accept the key of the premises.

Fanny Levy, wife of the plaintiff, corroborated her husband's testimony with regard to the defendant's offer of either the shop or the money. The day after the plaintiff was ordered out, the defendant offered to settle the matter.

Wm. Christopher Dracott, building inspector to the Sea Point Municipality, said he remembered interviewing the plaintiff at the shop. He merely told him that Mr. Rose had not got a completion certificate yet. The plaintiff then locked the shop up, and said he would see the defendant about it. Witness had no power to turn the plaintiff out. When he saw plaintiff, he told him he was the building inspector. The occupation certificate was granted on the 10th of March. The letter was not forwarded to the defendant until the 20th April.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then he could not have had possession until the 20th April?]

No, my lord, he could have had possession on the 10th March.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then why didn't you send it to him?]

We hold it in case there are any works to be completed.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: There would have been no objection to give possession early in March. The plaintiff's story about being ordered out was false.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It was possible witness might have been annoyed at the time he spoke to plaintiff.]

[By Maasdorp, J.: He might have conveyed the meaning which plaintiff took from his remarks when he spoke to him.]

The defendant, Manuel Rose, stated that when the plaintiff called to get a lease of the shop, he (plaintiff) was very anxious to have the matter arranged. At that interview it was clearly explained to the plaintiff that he could take possession as soon as the premises were ready. The plaintiff was satisfied to take the shop when ready, and the only mention of time was the term of four months with the contractor. It was agreed that the contract with regard to the lease should be written down, but defendant mentioned nothing about writing down the time when the premises would be ready. When the plaintiff called again, he offered defendant a month's rent if he would give him two months' rent back and cancel the contract. This witness declined to do.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did you specify the 1st of March?]

I told him he could take possession when the contract was finished.

Witness, in further evidence, said that by the state of the buildings at the time he could not have thought that they would be ready by the 31st January. He saw the engineer of the Municipality with regard to what had been said as to the certificate. He saw Levy again, when the latter told him that he was going away, and that the building inspector was driving him out. Witness told him that the inspector had no right to drive him out. Levy went out. All that Levy had in the place were a shelf and gas fittings. Witness got the certificate on the 10th March. A letter was written for plaintiff on March 12 offering Levy possession, and £12 in satisfaction of any damages he might have sustained. The shops were fit for occupation, as one of them had been occupied since March. He claimed that Levy should sign the lease.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He told Levy that he could not make a promise to him as to the date when he could go in. A letter was received by him on the 30th January demanding possession on the 31st January, on behalf of the plaintiff, and giving him notice to complete the premises within one week. Witness was surprised at the receipt of the letter, because he had not made any promise as to the date of possession. The contract term was not up until March. Levy afterwards offered to let him have the key back, but witness would not accept it.

[By Maasdorp, J.: He did not tell the plaintiff that he (defendant) would be fined if plaintiff continued in occupation of the premises.]

There was just a little remaining to be done in the yard; that was the only reason as far as he knew why the certificate had not been granted. There was a screen half-way up in the shop. He had this pulled down after March 1. The plans did not show a screen.

Re-examined by Mr. Close: The screen was in the first shop; Mr. Levy occupied the second shop. He could not give possession when the summons was issued, but as soon as the premises were completed he offered the plaintiff immediate possession, and £12 damages on account of not getting the certificate granted until March 10. The plaintiff at that time had no fixtures in the shop.

Frederick Robert Sloane, a waiter in the employ of Mr. Rose at a cafe in Longstreet, said he knew the plaintiff. As to the contract of lease made in January, he was about eight yards away from the parties at the time it was entered into. The arrangement entered into between them made no mention of possession on the 31st January. Rose said he had had a contract from November for four months, and he would be prepared to let plaintiff have possession when that was up. If the building were finished before the contract term he would let him have possession then. The arrangement was that the rental should be £12 a month, three months' rental to be paid in advance, the duration of lease to be five years.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He did not distinctly hear the latter part of the conversation between Mr. Rose and Mr. Levy. He heard on a subsequent occasion the plaintiff propose to cancel the lease and forego £12 of the rent which he had paid. He understood the plaintiff to say that he did not want the shop, and that it had not been given to him in time.

This concluded the evidence.

[De Villiers, C.J., intimated that the Court would adjourn, and that in the interval the plaintiff might consider how far he should amend his declaration. The Court would be prepared to consider any reasonable amendment which would not prejudice the defendant.]

After the adjournment, Mr. Benjamin asked leave to amend the declaration, and to substitute certain words in the fourth paragraph, viz., after "ordered by the Sea Point Municipality," to read, "or defendant or both of them to vacate the said premises immediately."

[De Villiers, C.J.: You have left out the most important point. The plaintiff says that the defendant ordered him off the premises.]

Mr. Benjamin said the words he proposed to insert after "on or about the 3rd March plaintiff was ordered by the Sea Point Municipality," were "or their officer, or defendant, or all of them."

[De Villiers, C.J.: The declaration says nothing about the defendant ordering the plaintiff off the premises. I should say "ordered by defendant or the Sea Point Municipality, or by one or other of them." The only question is whether it would prejudice the case.]

Mr. Close said he could not see there was any definite prejudice to the defendant by the alteration.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I don't think it could possibly prejudice the defendant.]

Mr. Benjamin said that the other amendment was to add "or that in the alternative that on the 2nd March, 1903, no certificate of occupation of the said premises had been granted to the defendant by the said municipality, and that his (the plaintiff's) occupation was unlawful, and rendered him liable to penalties for breach of the said regulations, and that he was accordingly justified in vacating the premises."

Mr. Close pointed out that it was a very drastic alteration of the whole declaration that was proposed.

[De Villiers, C.J., said he admitted it was somewhat drastic, but it raised no new question that the defendant should not be prepared to meet.]

After counsel had been heard in argument on the facts of the case,

De Villiers, C.J.: It is common cause in this case that on the 3rd January last the plaintiff paid to the defendant the sum of £36 for three months' rent in advance, and that he received from the defendant a receipt in the following terms: "Received from Mr. Levy the sum of £36 sterling, payable three months in advance, being rent for a shop on Main-road and Milton-road, Sea Point, the second to the chemist's shop. Promised five years' lease." (Signed by defendant.)

This document is clearly not intended as a contract of lease, but merely as a receipt, and it was the intention of both parties that a formal lease should be executed. Now the question is, when was this formal lease to be executed, and when was the lease to commence? Well, if there were no other evidence in this case, the Court would hold that the lease must be forthwith executed, and possession given as soon as the lease is completed.

The evidence, however, of the plaintiff shows that it was intended that some time should elapse before the possession, at all events, could be given. It is admitted that he knew at the time that the buildings were not yet completed, and that some time must elapse. As to what that time is, there is a difference. The plaintiff's version is that it was represented to him that within four weeks' time the premises would be ready, and the defendant's version is that he made him understand that under the contract which he had with the contractor, that the building would not be completed until the 1st of March. I am not at all satisfied, however, that this was told by the defendant, and I am more inclined to accept the plaintiff's statement that he understood that by the end of that month of January he would get possession, and this view is supported by the correspondence, which shows that the plaintiff, at all events clearly must have understood that within the four weeks at the utmost he would get possession. However, the plaintiff is not entitled to take advantage of this circumstance because he subsequently waived his right by expressing his readiness and willingness to accept possession on the 1st March. It is clear that on the 1st March, if the defendant had said to the plaintiff, "Well, now, I am unable to give you possession in ten days," the plaintiff would have been quite right in saying, "I am not going to execute the lease; it was an essential part of our agreement that you should give me possession not later than the 1st of March; you have broken your contract, and I claim back the rent which I have paid in advance." That is not exactly what took place, but the effect of it is exactly the same. On the 1st March he obtained possession, and, at all events, he got the key, went into the buildings, went to certain expense in putting up shelving, and after he had been there working for some time, first comes the inspector, who tells him he had no business to be there, or words to that effect. The inspector admitted that he was somewhat annoyed, and probably he used language that was not quite so gentle as he wished the Court to believe he used; and I believe he left the impression on the plaintiff that he wished him to go out. Then the defendant comes on the scene, and the plaintiff informs him of what had passed with the inspector, and the defendant then said he had seen the inspector, and when he returns again the defendant was annoyed too, and I believe the plaintiff's statement that the defendant told him to clear out temporarily, probably for ten days, until the certificate could be given; but I am satisfied the defendant wanted the plaintiff to clear out until then. He was willing to pay expenses of carrying the goods there and back, clearly showing that his desire, at all events, was that the plaintiff should go. The position was exactly the same as if there had been a refusal on the 1st March to give him possession, and in my opinion the plaintiff was not bound to return to the premises. He was quite justified, then, in saying: "I have been waiting now for four weeks. You have not given me possession yet; you should have given me possession on the 1st March. I am not going to wait till the 10th now; the whole agreement is put an end to, therefore I claim the cancellation of the whole agreement, and claim also damages for your breach." This view of the case entirely disposes of the claim in re-convention, in which the defendant claims that the plaintiff should execute the lease. In my opinion the plaintiff is not bound to execute the lease under these circumstances. If there was a breach of contract on the part of the defendant in not being ready with his building on the day, and not being ready to give possession to the plaintiff, then the plaintiff was entitled to claim damages. The question is, what shall be the measure of the damages? The only damages proved in this case are, first of all, the £36 which he has paid in the way of rent in advance. He has paid that money, and he is entitled to recover it back. Then there is the shelving which he put up, and the £1 10s. expenses in going there and back, and also another £1 expenses, making £7 10s. That is all that is clearly proved. The other damages are somewhat remote and very vague. The plaintiff has a firm belief that he would have done well in these premises; but if he really believed that he would have done so well, then the wonder is that he did not go on with the lease, because it was open to him to obtain the lease on the 10th March. By the 10th March it is quite clear that he would have got possession. But he had his own reasons. He says that he had secured other premises, but it did not seem that he had any objection to having more than one business place. But, whatever the state of facts may be, one thing is clear, that there is not sufficient proof of damages to justify the Court in awarding damages in respect of the delay that took place. The judgment of the Court will, therefore, be for the plaintiff for £43 10s., with costs. Judgment for the defendant on the claim in reconvention.

Provisional sentence — Bill of exchange—Novation—Agreement to give time.

The defendant, being sued for provisional sentence on certain overdue bills of exchange accepted by him, raised the defence that the plaintiff had agreed to accept payment in instalments, but the evidence showed that, although there had been negotiations for such a settlement, no definite agreement had been arrived at.

Held, that the plaintiff was entitled to provisional sentence.

This was an application for provisional sentence on certain bills of exchange.

The bills were dated as follows, and were for the following amounts: 21st March, 1902, £676 14s. 6d.; 27th March, £194 1s. 1d.; 4th April, £264 11s. 3d.; 11th April, £1,413 19s.; 18th April, £1,336 14s. 11d.; 25th April, £137 5s.; 9th May, £457 11s. 3d. and £481 0s. 6d. He said he understood that £1,000 had already been paid.

Defendant's affidavit stated that he carried on business in East London. Plaintiffs acted as his buyers in Europe and America, and shipped merchandise to him. Up to July, 1902, they drew drafts on him at 120 days sight. Up to the end of June, 1901, he paid the drafts regularly, but through the war great difficulties arose at East London. In June, 1902, the plaintiffs' representative came to East London, and expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the defendant's position. Negotiations were entered into in August, when the defendant owed the plaintiff £7,792. On the 9th November, 1902, a great fire occurred in East London, in which the defendants' premises were destroyed. Subsequently it was agreed that the Colonial creditors should be paid out of the fire insurance money, and that the plaintiffs and other creditors should be paid pro rata. He was to pay the balance of the debt by instalments, and a verbal agreement to that effect was entered into with Mr. Mouat. On the 18th ult. the plaintiffs accepted the sum of £1,000, and the summons was issued on the 24th ult. Counsel submitted the instalments were reasonable, and so long as he reduced the plaintiffs' debt by such instalments they were not entitled to take the action.

The affidavit of Charles Thomas Mouat, who represented the plaintiffs in East London, stated that in November last he went to Durban, and received a letter from the defendant, which stated that it would take time to realise such a business. The defendant pointed out that he proposed to Mr. Pennington that Mr. Drake and his solicitor should constitute a committee of inspection, and he would give all information. The defendant calculated that three or four months would be required to wind up the business, and suggested that if the arrangement was considered satisfactory, Mr. Mouat should wire from Durban, "Proposal considered favourable," which the deponent did. It was understood that the assets should be drafted up for settlement, and Mouat pointed out to the defendant that if he were forced into a second insolvency his business career in the Colony would be at an end, as very bad times were anticipated for business men for three or four years. On the 9th November a great fire occurred at East London, and the defendant's premises were destroyed. He said that he would lodge the fire insurance money with Wakefield after paying certain Colonial debts. Mouat entered into no arrangement with the defendant to postpone legal proceedings. He had ascertained from defendant's letters that a binding agreement had been entered into, which he entirely repudiated. It was pointed out that the payment of £1,200 out of £3,000 to Messrs. Thompson was not pro rata with the plaintiff's claim.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for defendant; Mr. McGregor for plaintiff.

Sir H. Juta, K.C.: It is perfectly clear that after the fire at East London on November 9, 1902, an arrangement was entered into between the parties. Mouat denies this, but in the correspondence with Lance and Wakefield plaintiffs admit an agreement. Hence it is evident that Mouat's memory is not reliable. According to Mouat it was not till the end of January that anything was said about an agreement.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you say that there was a novation?]

No, not a novation, but a certain arrangement for valuable consideration. Defendant virtually said to Mouat: "If you press me now I must become insolvent, but if you give me time I will gradually reduce the debt, and everybody will be paid.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question is, was there a definite agreement?]

Yes; I want in the first place to dispose of Mouat's affidavit. That affidavit implies that we did not set up any arrangement till the 3rd of February, but the negotiations alluded to by Mouat were entered into before the fire took place. That altered the whole situation. Then, again, Mouat says nothing about the arrangement made by the letter of December, the 18th. The agreement as to the insurance money was acted upon by both parties.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There was nothing definite and final.]

Our letter is definite enough, and plaintiffs received their pro rata share of the insurance money. See Lance and Wakefield's letter of March 30.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The agreement has been repudiated by them all along.]

Not the whole agreement, but only as to the payment of the balance in instalments. The point arises: "Is their story or ours the more probable?" If there was an arrangement as to the payment of the balance, the agreement has no meaning. If the defendant was liable to be called upon at any moment to pay everybody in full, why say that goods, etc., must be at once paid in full? Several instalments were accepted by the plaintiffs without protest. Lance and Wakefield's letter of December 23 shows that payment by instalments was agreed to.

[Maasdorp, J.: Subject to confirmation. Where is your confirmation?]

Confirmation may be given by acts as well as in writing.

Mr. McGregor was not called upon.

De Villiers, C. J.: The defendants are sued as acceptors of a number of bills of exchange long overdue, and the plaintiffs are consequently entitled to provisional sentence unless there is a reasonable probability that the defendant will succeed in the principal case. In my opinion, upon the documents before us, the probabilities are the other way. It is a case in which the defence depends almost entirely upon the meaning of certain correspondence, which has been read, and the Court, having read that correspondence, is in a position upon that correspondence to decide whether there was such a definite agreement as would justify the Court in refusing to give provisional sentence. The correspondence shows that all along the plaintiffs have denied that there is any definite agreement. All they admit was that when the fire had taken place the plaintiffs consented that, instead of the whole amount of the insurance money being paid to them, the amount should be divided pro rata amongst the principal creditors. But there is nothing in the correspondence, so far as has been read, which shows that there was a definite agreement that time should be given, or that there was anything in the nature of a pactum de non petendo. Provisional sentence must be granted.

STEYN V. PRICE. { 1903. May 7th.

This was a motion for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court. The present defendant, instituted an action for malicious prosecution against the present plaintiff, and in that matter judgment was given for the defendant in the suit, with costs. It was for the costs of the action, £119 3s. 11d., that the present application was brought.

Mr. Benjamin moved,

Respondent appeared in person.

The defendant said that he was willing to pay the costs, but he was absolutely without means at present. He was earning £2 10s. a week as a temporary boatman. He had no property and his wife had none.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: His wife's mother had no property. His father-in-law had only a part share in a launch and a boat. He could not pay above £1 a month. The costs that he incurred in the suit, he believed, had been paid by Mr. Stephan on behalf of his father-in-law. He did not think that if a decree of civil imprisonment were made against him, money would be found to satisfy this judgment; in fact, he was sure it would not.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Decrees of civil imprisonment are not given with a view of putting pressure on others.]

Further cross-examined: He had formerly been in the employ of the Texas Jack Circus at £10 a week, and he calculated that if he had not been arrested at Steyn's instigation, he would have been able to earn £1,000 a year. He had recently been trying to obtain further employment with Texas Jack.

De Villiers, C. J.: According to the evidence which is not contradicted, the defendant has no means. He has an income of £10 a month, which is barely sufficient to keep him and his wife alive and keep them in clothing. It would appear that he cannot possibly afford to pay £1 a month. His salary is £10 a month, and he has to pay £8 for board and lodging, leaving £2 to provide clothing for his wife and himself, so that practically the man has no means. It is possible that at some future time he will have means, and in that case an order may be applied for again, but at present there will be no order, with leave to apply again on proof that the man has means.

HEDDLE BROS. V. LLOYD AND FITTLE.

Mr. Buchanan moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied judgment, obtained on the 14th April, for £71 14s., on a certain bill of exchange, and also for costs, £8 12s. 11d.

The defendant Lloyd said that he wished to have this case reheard. The debt referred to certain machinery; he did not get the machinery, and it went to the Imperial Brick and Tile Co.

[De Villiers, C. J.: How is it you did not appear when the case came on before?]

Defendant replied that he could not get the chairman and secretary of the company to make affidavits. The chairman of the company told him that he need not trouble himself, as he (the chairman) would see the matter settled.

[De Villiers, C. J. (to defendant): You can reopen the case by entering an appearance. To Mr. Buchanan: It is rather hard measure, Mr. Buchanan, to sue for civil imprisonment if this man has done his best to meet you?]

Mr. Buchanan: If all he says is true, it might be so, my lord, but I am instructed that it is not true. I am instructed that, so far from his having an action against this Brick and Tile Co., they have an action against him. Be that as it may, we sue him on a bill of exchange which he gave to us.

Defendant, in answer to the Chief Justice, said his average earnings, after payment of expenses, were about £30 a month, and he paid £14 a month for the board and lodgings of his wife and himself. He offered £5 a month in satisfaction of the judgment.

The Court granted a decree of civil imprisonment, with costs, to be suspended upon the defendant paying £2 a month until the judgment was liquidated, the first payment to be made on the 1st June.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

JACKS V. JACKS. { 1903. May 7th.

Mr. Upington said that this was the return day of an order of Court calling upon the defendant to restore to plaintiff her conjugal rights on or before April 15, failing which to show cause why the bonds of marriage should not be dissolved with costs, and why the plaintiff should not have an order entitling her to have the custody of the minor child of the marriage. Their lordships would remember the case. They had some doubts as to the jurisdiction of the Court, as to whether domicile was sufficient. Counsel read the affidavit of G. P. Kotze, a clerk in the office of Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissinne, plaintiff's attorneys, deposing that he served notice of the rule upon Walter Barrett Jacks. A letter had been addressed by Mrs. Jacks to her husband, in which she pointed out that he took up his domicile at the Cape, and got a good situation here, and yet he had contributed nothing to her support. She had no means whatever to proceed to the Cape, and she asked her husband to provide her with passage money and a home on her arrival here, and to maintain her and her child as a good husband and father should do. An affidavit sworn by Mr. W. T. Buissinne set forth that he had received a letter from W. B. Jacks, stating that it was not his intention to restore conjugal rights to his wife, and he should have no means of paying his wife's passage to this country.

Ordered that the rule be made absolute.

NEALE V. NEALE. { 1903. May 7th.

Judicial separation—Division of goods held in community—Suspension of community—Marital power—Husband and wife.

On a decree of judicial separation and division of goods owned in community it is competent for the Court to interdict the husband from dealing with his wife's share or with property acquired by her, but not to dissolve the community altogether.

This was an application by the plaintiff on motion for an order of the Supreme Court made on the 11th September, 1902, to be explained and amended by the insertion therein of a decree dissolving community of property.

The affidavit of Welhelmina Sarah Neale, stated that the Court granted her a decree of separation from her husband, and authorised her to retain the balance of the estate in her hands after payment to her husband of £750, the custody of the children being given to her. She begged to refer the Court to the order granted last September, with a view to more definite particulars being stated. It was not definitely stated in the order that the community of property had been dissolved. Defendant desired the Court to add to the order granted on September 11 last a clause enabling her to deal entirely with her property. Counsel said that he had been unable to find any precedents for this application.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You had better consider the matter between this and two o'clock, becauses it raises a very important question. I am inclined to think that the same object could be attained in another way.].

Mr. C. W. de Villiers, for applicant; Respondent in default.

Mr. De Villiers: What we really want is simply an order of Court to enable the applicant to deal with her property independently of the respondent's control. The Court has already granted a separation a mensa et thoro, and this would seem to have the effect of suspending the community of goods as long as the parties remain apart.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If that is the law you have everything you want. Why should you want an order for the dissolution of the community?]

In view of what Van der Linden says (1—3—9) and Van der Keessel (Thesis 231), it would see that a judicial decree is necessary in order to dissolve the community. see also Wessels v. Wessels (12 S.C.R., 465). All we want is to have it made perfectly clear that the Court allows the applicant to deal with her property during her separation from her husband.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Voet (24—2—17) does not go quite as far as your authorities.]

De Villiers, C.J.: The notice of motion calls upon the defendant to show cause why a decree of separation a mensa et thoro already granted shall not be explained and amended by adding an order dissolving the community of goods between the parties. The application is founded upon a misconception as to the true effect of a decree of judicial separation. Such a decree leaves it open to the parties to be again reconciled and live together as husband and wife, and, even where a division of goods owned in community is decreed, the community of goods is not dissolved or intended to be entirely dissolved. Voet indeed (24—2—17) goes so far as to hold that, unless the husband is interdicted from dealing with his wife's share, the marital power remains in force, and the community is not even suspended. Van der Linden, who of course, wrote many years after Voet, says (1—3—9) that where the decree of separation includes a division of goods, and is duly published, the community of goods, as well as the marital power, is suspended so long as the parties remain apart. The object of the present application is to prevent the defendant from dealing with any property acquired by the plaintiff, but this object might be attained without the drastic remedy of an entire dissolution of the community. Such an order would remain in force even should there be a future reconciliation, with the result that, without an antenuptial contract to that effect, community of goods would be excluded between two spouses living together. The defendant does not object to an order interdicting him from dealing with his wife's separate estate, and this order will be granted accordingly.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Van Zyl and Buissinné; Respondent in default.]

SEKELINI v. SEKELINI. { 1903. May 7th.

Executor — Native custom — Interdict.

A native, who had been married in Griqualand East in 1874 according to Christian rites, died in 1902, and the applicant was appointed as executor. The respondent, who was the eldest son of the deceased, retained possession of the property, claiming to be entitled to such possession under native law and custom

Held, that as long as the appointment of the applicant was not revoked he was entitled to administer the property, and the respondent was accordingly interdicted from parting with the property unless and until the appointment should be set aside, and leave was given to the respondent to proceed by motion for that purpose.

This was a motion for a rule to be made absolute restraining the respondent from disposing of any part of the assets of his late father's estate.

The petitioner's affidavit set forth that she was the widow of the late William Sekelini, of Griqualand East. The respondent was her eldest son. On the death of the said William Sekelini, the estate was not administered, probably through the ignorance of the parties. The eldest son took possession of the estate. A death notice and inventory notice were recently published, and an executor dative was appointed. The respondent petitioned against the appointment. The petitioner had unsuccessfully tried to get possession of the estate, and the respondent had disposed of the majority of the assets since the appointment. In his protest Johannes Sekelini pointed out that his father and mother were married at Hopewell, East Griqualand, in 1874, by a minister of the Christian religion, and at that time the native tribes were under their own law. Competent men were appointed to inquire into disputes, and, according to the customs of the Griquas, the eldest son succeeded to his father's property, and the respondent contended he was entitled under that law to do so. During 1879 the Governor by Proclamation declared that East Griqualand would be subject to the laws of the Cape Colony under the terms of the annexation.

The respondent, in his affidavit, denied that since his father's death he had used the property solely for his own benefit. He had kept no strict account of his father's estate, but he had contributed to the maintenance of his mother. A few days before his death, his father declared before his mother that he (the respondent) was to take over the property. The point of dispute was whether the estate should be administered under Ordinance 104, existing in East Griqualand at the time of the death of the father.

Mr. Upington for applicant; Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for respondent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are there any disputed facts?]

Mr. Schreiner: It is really a point of law, my lord. It would be a great pity to have any further litigation, and I will waive the point of the father having specified the son previous to his death.

Mr. Upington proceeded to read a further affidavit from the petitioner, in which she denied that any disposition of the estate was made by her husband previous to his death. She denied that the respondent had any property as a result of his own labour, and also that he had always contributed towards the maintenance of herself and children. On the 9th April, 1903, the respondent had handed over nine oxen to the Messenger of the Court, who served a writ on him for £129 6s. 9d.

Mr. Schreiner: Although the question raised by this application is one of considerable importance, it can, I submit, be decided on affidavit. The whole question really turns on the interpretation of Sec. 2 of Act 38 of 1877. Ordinance 104 did not by virtue of that Act come into operation in the Native territories, though it has been brought into operation to some extent by subsequent proclamations. The term "Act" used in Sec. 2 of Act 38 of 1877, includes "Ordinance," and, therefore, proclamations 110 and 112, Sec. 7 of 1879, define the extent to which Ordinance 104 is brought into force in Native Territories.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Were these people married before 1879?]

Yes, in 1874. Then see proclamations 207 of 1899 and 112 Sec. 31 to 33. This is a prospective and not a retrospective law. The question which now comes before the Court was discussed in Fortuin's Executor v. Abrahams (14—S.C.R. 21). Sec. 34 of proclamation 112 shows that a marriage by Christian rites must be registered, hence this proclamation cannot refer to a time when the Marriage Register Act did not exist as far as Native Territories were concerned. The Master has no right to appoint an executor unless either there is a will, or unless the marriage has been registered. Kafir or Fingo marriages should be registered in a book, and Christian marriages in the manner prescribed by the Marriage Ordinance.

[Maasdorp, J.: What would be the effect of an unregistered European marriage; it would be binding on the parties?]

Yes; but such a marriage would not fall under Ordinance 104. Then, my client has now been in possession of the estate for five years; and says that he is entitled to remain in possession of the whole property subject to the obligation of making provision for his mother, his brothers, and sisters.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Could the deceased have made a will?]

Certainly he could.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then does not the fact that he did not make one amount to an indication that he wished the estate to be distributed in accordance with Colonial law?]

I submit not. We should have no objection to the appointment of an executor dative if he were instructed to administer in accordance with native laws.

[Maasdorp, J.: I can see that the relations of husband and wife may have been governed by native law, but it does not follow that the devolution of the property should follow native law.]

I submit it would. See section 101 of the Report on Native Law.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Suppose two Kafirs are married in the Colony, under what law would they come?]

That depends upon whether they fall under the Locations' Act or not. Mohile v. Mosesh (5 Juta, 30).

[De Villiers, C.J.: Should the decision of the Court be favourable to your client, I take it that the interests of the widow and of the other nine children would be protected by a Magistrate administering native law?]

Most certainly they would.

Mr. Upington: I fear that I have not come into Court fully prepared to meet the argument of respondent's counsel. I thought the only question before the Court was: "Should the rule nisi be made absolute or not?" The executor has already been appointed, and unless he is removed the assets in the estate must be handed over to him. I contend that the words of Section 32 of Proclamation 112, of 1879, show that in the case of all natives married by Christian rites an executor must be appointed, no matter what law governs the devolution of their property.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then do you say that the Section is retrospective?]

Yes, decidedly.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Suppose that under Kafir law the widow were entitled to two-thirds of the estate; would the Proclamation deprive her of a portion of her share?]

That I am hardly prepared to say; but if "Act" includes "Ordinance" the whole argument falls to the ground. See Re Dugmore's Estate (5 E. D. C. 96). The whole question is:—Whether at the time of the father's death in 1898, Ord. 104 was in force or not?

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then you say that the widow is entitled to one half?]

In all probability, but I am not prepared to argue the full effect of the Proclamation, I only say that the executor has been rightly appointed, and that the assets must be handed over to him for administration. The widow's proper course would have been to at once get the appointment set aside. See Poppies v. R.M. of Kokstad (6 E.D.C., 183).

[De Villiers, C.J.: That was a different case from this.]

I must admit that the two cases are not perfectly analogous.

Mr. Schreiner: My client made a full protest at the time the executor was appointed.

[De Villiers, C.J., said there were some points on which they would require evidence. One point was as to the date when the son was born, and another was what his rights were before the date of annexation under native custom, and again. what rights the widow had.]

Mr. Schreiner said that the widow, he supposed, would have some vague rights.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What right has the son before the death of his parent?]

Mr. Schreiner: I would not contend that he has any right. Under native custom he could only have the right of primogeniture after his father's death.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What you say is that his father died under the belief that the will would be administered under native law?]

Mr. Schreiner: That is so, otherwise he would have made a will, my lord.

[Maasdorp, J.: Is it admitted that the marriage was celebrated by a minister of the Christian religion?]

Mr. Schreiner: Under Christian custom, my lord.

Mr. Upington: That is admitted by the respondent, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: At present an executor has been appointed, and until that appointment has been set aside has he not control of the estate?]

Mr. Schreiner said if he had succeeded in showing the merits of the case their lordships would be quite in order in getting a report from the Master of the Supreme Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What could be the rights of Europeans who were married there before the annexation?]

Mr. Schreiner said that that was a nice point of international private law, but if the Europeans were domiciled there the Court would probably hold as in the case of Fortuin's Executor v. Abrahams.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is to be regretted that the case is not ripe for decision now, and that further costs will have to be incurred before the real question at issue can be decided. As the case now stands an executor has been appointed to the estate, and, in his capacity as executor, he claims a rule calling upon the respondent to show cause why he shall not be interdicted from parting with the assets of the estate. It is impossible upon the case as it stands for the Court to set aside the appointment of the executor. There is no motion to that effect, and without some proper motion or action the Court could not take that course. I am bound to say from the argument, as far as it has gone, that it appears to me that under Proclamation 112 only the marriages celebrated after the passing of that Proclamation were intended to be affected. It could hardly have been decided that this Proclamation should have a retrospective effect, so as to affect the rights of parties married before that proclamation, entirely altering succession and entirely altering the relations between husband and wife. But, as the case now stands, this point does not really arise. All the Court knows is that an executor has been appointed, and until that appointment is set aside the Court cannot give an authoritative pronouncement upon the issue which has been raised by Mr. Schreiner. At present, therefore, the Court can only grant an order interdicting the respondent from parting with the property in his possession, and belonging to the estate, so long as the appointment of the applicant as executor shall not be set aside, and the question of costs will stand over. The possession will remain with the respondent, but he is not to deal with that property until the appointment of the executor shall have been set aside. He should at once proceed with his motion or his action to have the appointment set aside, and the question of costs will stand over.

Order granted as prayed, costs of application to be costs in the cause.

KINNEAR V. HUXHAM.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for a commission to be appointed to take the evidence of a certain witness at Krugersdorp, Transvaal.

SOUTH AFRICAN SUPPLY COMPANY V. CAPE TOWN COUNCIL.

Mr. Buchanan moved for an award of arbitrators to be made a rule of Court.

Order granted as prayed.

BARLOW V. BARLOW.

Mr. Alexander said that this matter was before the Court on the first day of the present term, and was ordered to stand over until the present sitting. They had received return of service, but it was not in proper form, and therefore had to be sent back to the Transvaal. Counsel asked that the matter should stand over until the 21st inst.

Application granted.

Ex parte VON POST.

Mr. Buchanan moved on behalf of petitioner, who was leaving the Colony and proceeding to Stockholm, Sweden, for authority to sell certain property belonging to his minor daughters. The matter had been before the Master, and he recommended that leave to sell be given on condition that the proceeds of the sale be paid into the Guardians' Fund, so that the money might be remitted from them to the gentleman who occupied a similar position in Sweden.

Order granted in terms of Master's report.

Ex parte TITUS.

Mr. De Waal moved for an order authorising the Registrar of Deeds to amend the petitioner's name on a certain mortgage bond to Carolus Mattheus Titus instead of Carolus Titus. The mortgage was upon a fortieth share in a certain property.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that the name on the bond should be consistent with the name on the deeds. They could not grant an order to alter the name on the bond, because the bond must be identical with the name on the deeds of the property. There would be no order.

Ex parte VERMOOTEN.

Attorney—Reinstatement.

Mr. Van Zyl applied on behalf of Octavius Septimus Vermooten, the petitioner, for his reinstatement as an attorney and notary public, and for the return from the Registrar of the Court of his certificate of admission. The petition was to the effect that Vermooten, who resided at Dordrecht, was formerly admitted as an attorney and notary public, and that in May, 1900, he was tried at Graham's Town before the Judge-President and a jury for high treason, and found guilty, and sentenced to four years' imprisonment. He was subsequently suspended from practice as an attorney and notary public of the Court until a further order of the Court, and ordered to deliver up to the Registrar his certificate of admission. Petitioner was imprisoned at Graham's Town and Tokai from the date of his conviction until the 4th November, 1902, when he was released. Since his release the petitioner had been serving as a clerk in an attorney's office at Dordrecht.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has the Law Society had notice of this application?]

Mr. Van Zyl: I am not instructed.

De Villiers, C.J., in giving judgment, said: Under all the circumstances, the Court will grant an order. The Law Society does not appear to oppose. The applicant has undergone sentence and served his imprisonment for 2½ years, and been suspended from practice for nearly three, and under all these circumstances, an order will be made.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Michau and De Villiers.]

Ex parte THE EXECUTORS OF THE ESTATE GARDNER.

Mr. Buchanan, on behalf of the petitioners, applied for leave to raise £1,100 on mortgage, in order to carry out necessary repairs and alterations to the buildings situate at Mowbray.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why is the property not sold?]

Mr. Buchanan: The survivor is a usufructary.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte WOLFF.

Mr. Close moved for the release of petitioner's estate from sequestration. Counsel stated that the petitioner made a voluntary surrender of his estate to his creditors. At the first meeting of the creditors, held at Oudtshoorn, debts were proved to the amount of £1,151, and at the second meeting, debts were proved to the amount of over £3,000. At the second meeting, an offer was made by some friends of the debtor, and this was accepted by the creditors, who decided not to proceed further with the sequestration, inasmuch as their claims had been settled. The petitioner had not been able to deal with the assets of the estate, as they were still vested in the hands of the Master of the Supreme Court. The difficulty, said counsel, was that all the sections in the Insolvency Ordnances dealing with the release of property said that it was to be done after the third meeting had been held. That meeting must be called by the trustee, but in this case no trustee had been elected.

De Villiers, C.J.: Under the special circumstances, an order will be granted as prayed.

Ex parte VAN DER WALT.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved, on behalf of petitioner, who was the father and natural guardian of certain minors, for leave to transfer certain property at Steynsburg. The property in which the minors were interested was situate near the Dutch Church; a certain lady wanted this, and she was prepared to give in exchange property adjoining the greater portion of the petitioner's land. The exchange would be to the advantage of the minors. The Master reported favourably.

Order granted as prayed.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D. (Chief Justice), and the Hon Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

Re ESTATE EATON, GOODSON AND ANOTHER v. BATHGATE. } 1903. May 8th.

The Registrar informed the Court that, in accordance with the 116th and 337th Rules of Court, the High Sheriff reported that on the 6th May, 1903, the sale of immovable property attached in this matter was held at Claremont, in the division of the Cape, before Johan Carel Hinsbeeck, as Commissioner, but the said property was not sold, as the highest offer, made by one Simon Westermann, namely, £1,560, did not reach the reserve price fixed under the 113th Rule of Court, namely, £1,900. The High Sheriff recommended that this offer of £1,560 be accepted, and that the sale to Simon Westermann be confirmed by the Court. On the first occasion the highest bid was £1,010. The bonds on the property amounted to £1,850.

The Chief Justice: What do the bondholders say?

The Registrar: They desire that the sale may be confirmed, my lord.

Order granted as prayed confirming sale.

TREVOR v. CHETTY.

This was an action for the transfer of certain property or for damages. Sir H. Juta, K.C., appeared for the plaintiff and Mr. Alexander for the defendant.

Mr. Alexander applied for a postponement on the ground of the defendant's illness. He stated that he was prepared to prove this by the evidence of the defendant's brother and the doctor attending him.

Sir H. Juta: I see no reason why the plaintiff's case, at any rate, should not go on. All his witnesses are here.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are they not all Cape Town witnesses?]

Sir H. Juta: Yes, my lord. It might simplify matters if the plaintiff's case were opened, because there is an important legal question raised as to whether any evidence can be given at all by the defendant. The action is brought for transfer of certain property or for damages, and the declaration alleges that a sale took place on a broker's note that the defendant signed, and that broker's note contained a statement that the property consisted of buildings and lands numbered 1 to 19, Alfred-street. Upon the transfer being passed, it was discovered that numbers 17 and 19 in Alfred-street were not contained in the transfer, and the plaintiff now sought transfer of those portions or damages.

The defence set up was that the terms of the contract were incorrectly stated in the broker's note, and that the properties in dispute were not included in the contract, purchase, and sale.

Mr. Alexander said he did not see that anything could be gained by going into the case that day. The defendant was unavoidably absent.

The Chief Justice: What about the costs of to-day?

Mr. Alexander replied that he thought the costs should be costs in the cause. Owing to the defendant's illness, he had been unable to have a consultation with him.

Sir H. Juta said he was quite prepared to admit that the defendant was ill. If he could not come to the court, then he (counsel) did not see why the plaintiff should have to pay the costs of that day.

The hearing of the action was set down for Saturday, May 23, any additional witnesses' expenses occasioned by the postponement to be paid by the defendant, and the question of other costs to stand over.

BUDGE AND ANOTHER v. BUDGE. ESTATE BUDGE. 1903. May 8th.

Mutual will—Adiation—Acquiescence—Kinderbewys.

By the mutual will of the testator and his wife, who were married in community, they appointed the survivor and their eight children as heirs of the first dying, and directed that the survivor should have the usufruct of the joint-estate, and that on the death of the survivor the joint-estate should be divided between the children. The wife died in 1875 and the testator remained in possession of the joint-estate, and about a year after her death, when he was about to re-marry, he framed an account and passed a deed of kinderbewys for the amount of his children's maternal inheritance after deducting his own child's portion under the will. Some of the childrens' maternal portions, including that of the plaintiff, who was one of the children, remained unpaid until the death of the testator, which took place in 1902.

Held, that there was sufficient proof of adiation on the part of the testator, and that the plaintiff, who had never seen the account or the deed of kinderbewys, was entitled to claim his one-eighth share of the joint-estate on the death of the testator, and that his delay in making his claim could not be construed into acquiescence, seeing that he was justified under the will in not making his claim to any part of the joint-estate until after the testator's death.

This was an action brought by George Thomas Erith Budge (eldest son of the late George Ryall Budge and Ann Budge) and George William Steytler (executor dative in the estate of the late Ann Budge) for a declaration of the first plaintiff's rights.

The declaration showed that the late George Ryall Budge and Ann Budge were married in community of property. That marriage was ended in December, 1874, by the death of Ann Budge. There was a joint will of the testator and Ann Budge, his first wife, dated April 23, 1868, which, at the time of the death of Ann Budge, was in full legal force and effect. The joint will of April 23, 1868, provided that at the death of the first dying, the survivor should have the life usufruct of the estate, with equal shares for the children already born, but the will contained a penal clause to the effect that, in case any of the heirs required that his share should be realised and paid to him, he should be cut off, not with the full share that he would be entitled to at the death of the survivor, but with the smallest legitimate share that the law permitted. There was nothing in the will as to what was to take place on the re-marriage of the testator. The testatrix, Ann Budge, died in December, 1874, and the survivor was appointed sole executor under the will. He took out letters of administration in January, 1875. He filed no account, and he did nothing to indicate any repudiation of the joint will until the surviving spouse entered into a second marriage, which took place in January, 1876, he filed an account dated December 24, 1875, purporting to be a liquidation and distribution account, in which he valued the estate. There was no realisation of the assets. The executor awarded half to himself, and also awarded a child's portion to himself, and then shortly afterwards passed a Kinderbewys for securing the inheritance of five minor children, and secured to them thereby a sum of £98 odd upon that account. At no time during the lifetime of the executor did the first plaintiff, George T. E. Budge, receive any sum out of his mother's estate. The testator, George Ryall Budge, died in 1902. He had in 1898, having been married without community of goods to his second wife, made with her a second will, the validity of which was now questioned, in so far as it proposed to touch the assets in the joint estate of the testator and his first wife. Testator died in September last, four years after making that will with his second wife, and the present defendants were appointed his executors testamentary under the will of 1898. The second plaintiff, G. W. Steytler, was thereon, at the instance of the first plaintiff principally, as a heir in the estate, appointed as an executor dative in the estate of Ann Budge, the first wife, and he was joined to the action with the first plaintiff, who asked for a declaration of rights. There were valuable assets in the estate of the late George Ryall Budge and Ann Budge, in the hands of defendants, who unlawfully and wrongfully refused to recognise the rights of the plaintiffs. Plaintiffs asked that the joint estate of George Ryall Budge and Ann Budge should be realised under the joint will of April 23, 1868, and also for a declaration that the first plaintiff was entitled to receive a one-eighth share of the assets of the said joint estate. A further order was sought, declaring that the second plaintiff was entitled to join with the defendants in realising and administering the assets of the joint estate. In the alternative, in case their lordships held that there was no ordination, they asked for an order, declaring that the second plaintiff was entitled to receive and administer the half of the assets of the said joint estate, as executor dative of the estate of the late Ann Budge, and compelling the defendants to account for the same, and also an order declaring the plaintiff entitled to receive an eighth of the realised value of the half of the said joint estate of his parents. As a further alternative, judgment was sought for the plaintiff for the sum of £38 17s. 11d., and for one-eighth of the sum of £98 17s. 11d., awarded for the executor testamentary of the late Ann Budge to her surviving spouse, the late George Ryall Budge. The defendant's plea denied adiation and acceptance of benefits.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. Close), for the Plaintiffs; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Russell), for the Defendants.

The matter, said Mr. Schreiner, was largely one of construction. He put in various documents, and especially called their lordships' attention to the second will, executed in 1898 by both Mr. Budge and his widow. There were two wills. The testator, in his will, desired that his children, with Edith Burn, should take an immediate distribution of one half, and the other half remained subject to a life interest in favour of his widow. The plaintiff's contention was that so far as the assets of the joint estate were concerned those assets were massed, and that the survivors adiated and accepted benefit.

[Maasdorp, J.: What did the first estate consist of?]

Mr. Schreiner: Landed property largely There is considerable property, valued at over £5,000, which were assets at a time long before the death of Mrs. Ann Budge. My client lived away at East London, and hardly ever saw his father, but there was property that was realised and sold. There was a farm, Rocklands, beyond Simon's Town, and there was a farm on the hill, and also some property in the town. The testator had also acquired some property in the town There are two sets of property involved—the property acquired after the death of the first wife, now remaining, and the property acquired before.

George Thomas Erith Budge, first plaintiff, and eldest son of the late George Ryall Budge, said that until the age of 21 he lived with his father, and he then went to live with his uncle, Mr. Lindsay, through whom he received 400 sheep from his father. Occasionally, he paid visits to Simon's Town, and was there before his mother's death, and was also present at his father's death. He never received anything from his father, on account of his portion under his mother's will.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What was the value of the sheep?]

Between 4s. 6d. and 5s. each.

He never had any communication about the sheep from his father, although he understood they were a gift from him, and he wrote in return thanking his parents. When he heard about the will, he came and saw it at the Master's Office. During his lifetime he never made any demands on his father. When the second will was read at Simon's Town he immediately protested.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: He never heard from his sisters that they had had some money on account. He could not say why he never had the farm Bossisveld left to him by his grandfather. He denied asking his father for money in 1890, in the presence of his brother. When his father sold the farm, witness expressed his satisfaction, but he denied ever having been told by his father that he could have the farm if he paid the mortgage. He had legal advice in 1890 about the farm, but on nothing else.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You said you took advice on the lot?]

Witness: I took advice principally on the farm.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did you take advice on the will?]

Witness: No, my lord; I took no advice on the will.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well, that is a mistake, then.]

In further cross-examination, plaintiff said that he did not go to see his mother's will with a view to getting money. He had been to see his father since 1890, but never heard that his brothers and sisters had been paid. Mrs. Runciman was the only one of the family he was aware of who had been paid out of his mother's estate.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: It was his grandfather's will, under which he was entitled to Bossisveld, that he took advice upon, and not his mother's will.

Jane Elizabeth de Villiers, eldest daughter of the late Geo. Ryall Budge, said she received £100 eleven months after her mother's death. She never gave a receipt for the amount, and she did not know at the time that it was her portion from her mother's will. When the first plaintiff came to see her she advised him not to claim anything under his mother's will, otherwise he would not get anything at his father's death. The day after the will was read none of the family would give her eldest brother (plaintiff) a hearing.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: She thought that the plaintiff was going to make a fuss about her grandfather's will. She did not know why she advised her brother not to claim anything under his mother's will.

Re-examined by Mr. Schreiner: She could not exactly say when she told her brother that she had been paid.

This closed the evidence for the plaintiffs.

For the defence, Sir Henry Juta called,

John Wm. Budge, son of the late Geo. Ryall Budge, who said that he had received his share under his mother's will. About 1890 he said he was aware that some of his brothers and sisters had been paid their share under his mother's will George came up from King William's Town after his mother's death, and asked his father about his share under his mother's will. His father said that he had had that. He next asked his father about the farm, and his father said that if he paid off the mortgage he could have it. He wanted to set up in the wheelwright business, and wanted money from his father.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He could not say what the farm was sold for.

Re-examined by Sir Henry Juta: He did know of his own knowledge that George had had any money from his father. The sheep were mentioned at the table in general conversation.

George Runciman, one of the executors in the estate of the late George Lyall Budge, said that all the children, with the exception of George, had been paid their inheritance under their mother's will. The property that was in existence at the death of the first Mrs. Budge had since been realised. At the death of the first Mrs. Budge there were a number of mortgages which had been paid off by the time of Mr. Budge's death.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: As executor he paid the last witness his mother's portion in 1902. He did not get any receipts from the three majors at the time of the death. He never had any receipt from the last witness. He could not say that Rocklands, Simon's Town, was owned by the plaintiff's father before the death of the first Mrs. Budge. The late Mr. Budge was very reticent about his transactions, and witness knew nothing of Bossisveld having been sold and transferred in 1874. According to the list he had filed if the Court were to hold that the joint estate was to be administered there would be considerable assets.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Isn't it possible that part of these properties were acquired by means of the proceeds of the property in the first estate?]

Witness: I cannot trace any books to that effect, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You cannot say it is not so?]

Witness: I cannot say it is not, my lord.

Mr. Schreiner: The joint will speaks for itself as to the merits of this case. It does contain a penal clause, but it does not penalise the second marriage. The will certainly shows that the joint estate was massed, and that there was a gift over to the survivor. No doubt any one of the children might have been entitled to get a child's portion from the estate of the first dying, but only his or her bare legitime out of the rest of the estate. If, then, the defendant adiated, what can be said against our claim? Then in 1898 Budge made a second will. In 1874 and 1875 he had enjoyed the usufruct of the whole estate for his Kinderbeways referred only to the estate of his deceased spouse, and undoubtedly complied with the provisions of Sec. 1 of Act 12, of 1856. But the point which settles the fact of adiation is that he awarded himself a child's portion under the will. An account should have been framed, but a detailed account could not possibly be framed after the lapse of some years. If the defendant wished to repudiate his benefits under the will he should have refused his child's portion, and apportioned the estate among the children. Watson v. Burchell (9 Juta, 2). If the survivor does not adiate he cannot take even his interest as an heir. Again, had he not adiated, he would have paid out the mother's portion as soon as any one of the children attained majority or married; but some of these portions were not paid out till long after his death. Clearly George Budge was not a persona grata in the eyes of his father, and I, therefore, submit that the father would never have paid him £98 without taking a receipt for this money. Let Messrs. Steytler and Runciman frame an account and administer the estate.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would it not be better for the parties to agree upon a certain sum?]

Certainly, but here are considerable assets brought into question, and they should be followed up. A mere rough valuation made in passing a Kinderbewys cannot be held to bind the heirs for all time. The value of the estate of the deceased spouse should be brought up as it was at the survivor's death.

Sir H. Juta (for defendants): The principal point in this case is—was there such an adiation under the joint will as would prevent the survivor from making another will? The meaning of adiation is that the survivor means to support the joint will. The fact that the survivor accepts a child's portion is no proof of adiation.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Can a man adopt a will in part, and dispute it in part?]

Not, if he understands what he is doing; but this transaction took place in 1875 when the rules of law were not as well known as they are at the present day. The whole conduct of the defendant is inconsistent with adiation, save that he took a child's portion. But then he pays off a very heavy mortgage, and would he have done that if he thought he was to get only a life usufruct out of the property. Then, again, why should he pay out the children's portions of the mother's share if he was entitled to the usufruct of the whole estate? As to the passing of the Kinderbewys, that is rather a proof that the defendant did not adiate than that he did.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Well that cuts both ways.]

If the defendant had adiated there would have been been no need of a Kinderbewys (See Section 1 of Act 12 of 1856), for nothing would have been due to the children till the death of the survivor.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When did Budge die?]

On the 11th of December, 1874.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then does it not raise a presumption of adiation if he remained in possession of the whole estate?]

He did not remain in possession of the whole. He paid out the children's portions, and paid off a mortgage (in all about £1,500). It is not necessary to go by what he did within the first few months after his wife's death; we must be guided by the whole of his conduct during his lifetime.

[Maasdorp, J.: No, he may have changed his mind.]

The burden of proving adiation is on the plaintiff. See S.A. Association v. Mostert (Buch. 1868, 286; 1869, 231; and 1873, 31; L.J.P.C., 41). There Mrs. Mostert gave up part of the will. But, if the court is not with me as to adiation, we say that Budge did not consider himself bound by this will, but still considered that he was entitled to the share left him under the will. See Van Rooyen v. Gorman (6 Juta, 55) and Silver v. Silver's Executors (5 Juta, 29), where see particularly the judgment of De Villiers, C.J. It is not to be presumed that a man has surrendered his rights unless some definite act by which he has done so can be proved. Williams v. Williams and Others (12 S.C.R., 392), where see the judgment of De Villiers, C.J., at p. 398. Some of Budge's evidence (e.g., as to his looking up the will) is quite incredible, and now, after 29 years, he, having been then a major, cannot come in and upset all that has been done.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But if the never received his share, is he not entitled to it now?]

He is entitled to his £98 if he has not received that, but it is very difficult to make up satisfactory accounts since 1875.

In any question as to adiation each case must be judged on its own merits. The conditions for adiation laid down in Silver's case are all present here. It is quite a new doctrine that a man need not file a Kinderbewys if he has adiated.

[After Counsel had argued at length on the facts of the case:—]

De Villiers, C.J.: The real question to be determined in this case is whether the late Mr. Budge adiated in terms of the mutual will, which had been previously made by himself and his wife. She died on December 11, 1874, and no account was framed by Mr. Budge until December, 1875. In that account he awarded to himself one half of the property held in community, and in addition to that awarded to himself a child's portion. If there had been no will he would not have been entitled to any child's portion at all. Now, it would appear to me in the present case that the Court should hold that there has been adiation. It has been held, and I think correctly held, especially in the case of Silver and Silver, that adiation must be unequivocal, and in the present case I am of opinion that it was unequivocal. The facts to prove such adiation are threefold. In the first instance there was no account framed within six months as required by law, and after the expiry of six months the testator remained in possession of the joint estate, as he is authorised to do by the will. This is one circumstance. The next circumstance is that when he came to frame the account he awarded to himself a child's portion due to him as heir. That could not have been done except under the will. The will gave him a child's portion, the first portion of the will, and it could only be because he adopted the will and intended to act on the will that he awarded himself that amount. The third circumstance to be borne in mind is that even after the deed of kinderbewys had been executed the testator did not at once proceed to pay out the shares to the major children. He had paid a certain amount by way of advance to Mrs. De Villiers before his re-marriage, and it was only after such re-marriage that he informed her that that payment was made as a portion of the maternal estate. In regard to the other children, he did not pay them all as they became of age, and in point of fact several of those children remained unpaid until the testator's death. As to the plaintiff, at all events, he never got paid, and the conduct of the testator towards him was quite consistent with his adoption of the will, and quite inconsistent with the alleged repudiation. The only circumstance in the present case which is inconsistent with such adiation is that by this account and the deed of kinderbewys, the testator awarded to himself a half share as coming to him by virtue of community of property. No doubt, that is a circumstance to be borne in mind, but in my opinion this was simply done for the purpose of complying with the law as to a deed of kinderbewys. I find that this is simply a printed form of the deed of kinderbewys which was employed in the present case, and I do not consider that this circumstance, taken, by itself, would justify the Court in throwing aside all the other circumstances of adiation, and coming to the conclusion that there was an intention on the part of the testator not to abide by the will. This being the view of the Court the plaintiff would be entitled to succeed, unless he has done anything by way of renunciation of his rights, or has acquiesced in the acts of the testator. There is no proof whatever of any such reunciation or acquiescence. The plaintiff has never received his inheritance, he has never seen the account, he has never given any receipt for the proceeds which ought to have been given to him, and in that way acknowledged that he has received anything from his father. And in the absence of any renunciation on the part of the plaintiff, he is still entitled to succeed, notwithstanding the lapse of time. Under ordinary circumstances, no doubt, lapse of time may debar the plaintiff, and might be proof of acquiescence, but in the circumstances of the present case I do not think that the lapse of time can in any way affect the plaintiff's case, because the plaintiff knew the terms of the will, and he knew under that will his father was entitled to remain in possession of the joint estate, and therefore he was quite justified in remaining quiet and in not pressing for the settlement of his claim until his father's death. At the same time, considering that the plaintiff is the only person who, so far as the Court can judge at present, is interested in having all the proceedings set aside, and having a further administration of the estate of the deceased testator I consider that it is unnecessary to make an order in terms of the first prayer of the declaration, an order declaring that the assets of the said estate shall be realised and distributed in accordance with the provisions of the joint will, dated April 23, 1868. That can stand over for the present. I think the plaintiff is entitled to an order in terms of prayer (b), "Declaring the first plaintiff to be entitled to receive one-eighth of the assets of the said joint estate, or of the realised value thereof." If it is impossible to realise it without calling in the aid of the second plaintiff, then possibly it may become necessary to grant a further order, declaring that the second plaintiff is entitled to join with the defendant in realising and administering the assets of the said joint estate, but I should think, after an expression of the opinion of the Court, there ought to be no difficulty on the part of the plaintiff and defendant in coming to some terms. The only question that may arise on the part of the defendant is as to what would be the amount to which the plaintiff would fairly be entitled under the order of the Court, and if they do not come to terms, then it may become necessary for the Court to make an order in terms of prayers (a) and (c). For the present I think there will be no order upon them, reserving to the Court the right to make an order in case the parties should not come to terms of prayer (b) of the declaration. As to the costs, I think they may fairly come out of the joint estate.

COLONIAL GOVERNMENT V. COATON AND LOUW.

Mr. Upington, on behalf of the defendants, mentioned the case of the Colonial Government against Coaton and Louw, concerning alleged underpaid carriage. (See 12 C.T.R., 752). Counsel said that he had witnesses in court from Wellington, who would be prepared to give further evidence. The case had been part heard, and then the questions of account, figures, and so forth was referred to Mr. Nash, who had now presented his report. He might state that the defendants had tendered to the Government the balance of £5,481 9s. 4d., which the accountant found to be due to the Government, with costs to date of tender. That had not been accepted.

Mr. Schreiner (with him Mr. McGregor) said that this was a case in which the Government were extremely desirous that the finding of the accountant should form a judgment of Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Upon the question of mixing Colonial and imported produce?]

Mr. Schreiner: Yes; it is not so much a matter of the lump sum to be paid as the moral effect which a pronouncement in open Court would have. The Government are wishful that there should be nothing bearing a semblance of settlement out of Court.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Schreiner): Could not the case be settled at once by giving judgment for the amount of £5.481 9s. 4d., with costs to date of tender.]

Mr. Schreiner: We are prepared to go on with it on the understanding that it should be a judgment of Court. Counsel added that the accountant had given the defendants full credit for all their Colonial produce having been sent by rail. That, he thought, was hardly probable, but he admitted that Mr. Nash could have hardly done better with the material before him.

Mr. Upington said that Mr. Nash expressly pointed out that it was to the advantage of Messrs. Coaton and Louw to have sold all their imported produce locally, and not have sent it away by rail.

De Villiers, C.J.: In this case, which was heard by my brother Buchanan and myself, there was the evidence of Floyd, the first witness, which was certainly very clearly given and very damaging to the defendant. He was positive that it had been the regular practice at the defendants' establishment to mix the Colonial and imported grains, to grind them together, and then to send them upcountry as Colonial meal and Colonial flour, and if his evidence had been corroborated by other trustworthy witnesses it would have been difficult for the defendants to escape liability for the full amount of the claim. But Floyd was not corroborated, and witness after witness was called who denied any practice of this kind. The impression upon the minds of both the judges, who heard the evidence thus far, was that it would be extremely dangerous, upon the uncorroborated testimony of that witness, to find the defendants guilty of the gross fraud imputed to them. The case was not proven, and there would be absolution from the instance. The proof is not satisfactory, and therefore, while I do not wish to say that in the opinion of the judges Floyd was saying what was intentionally untrue, I consider that without some corroboration it would not be safe to act upon his testimony, as opposed to that of the defendant's witnesses. It is admitted, however, that wheat had been sent by train as Colonial wheat which really was imported wheat, and there was a tender for £4,800 or some similar amount. The matter, however, was referred to Mr. Nash, the accountant, and he has found that there is no proof of the mixing, but that there would still be due to the Government the sum of £5,481 9s. 4d. in respect to imported wheat, which was sent as Colonial wheat. For that amount, at all events, the Government is entitled to judgment, with costs up to the date of tender, which was on the 4th May, 1903. Any costs subsequently incurred, which must be comparatively trifling, must, of course, be paid by the Government, but the main costs in the case will be paid by the defendants.

FAISHT v. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. 1903. May 8th.

Pleading — Replication — New cause of action.

The plaintiff by his declaration claimed damages from the Cape Railway department for non-delivery of certain luggage at Johannesburg. The plea alleged that the luggage had been duly conveyed to Johannesburg and there according to custom left in the custody of the Transvaal Railway department, and that by plaintiff's direction the Transvaal department was requested to return the luggage to Cape Town. The plaintiff then by his replication alleged that the defendant had contracted for hire to deliver the luggage at Cape Town.

Held, that such new matter raised a fresh cause of action, and that, as the declaration relied upon a contract to deliver at Johannesburg, the plaintiff could not by his replication raise a claim based upon a contract to return the goods to Cape Town.

This was an argument on exceptions. The plaintiff's declaration alleged, inter alia, that he had entrusted to the charge of the Cape Government Railways certain passenger's luggage, to be by them conveyed from Cape Town to Johannesburg, and that the defendants had only re-delivered a portion thereof to the plaintiff at Cape Town. The defendants' plea admitted that they had received the said luggage, but said that they had carried it safely to Johannesburg, and that as plaintiff was not there to claim it, the defendants placed it, in accordance with custom, in the custody of the Central South African Railways, to whom the Park Station at Johannesburg belongs, and who duly received the same for and on behalf of plaintiff. That thereafter plaintiff asked that the said luggage should be returned to Cape Town, and defendants accordingly requested the Central South African Railways to so return it, and such portion as was so returned was duly delivered to the plaintiff. Plaintiff's replication said that defendants contracted with him to carry the said luggage back to Cape Town, and there safely to deliver the same to the plaintiff, but that defendants in breach of the said contract did not so safely deliver the same, but only a portion thereof. Plaintiff said his sole contract was with defendants, and with no other, and that if the luggage was received and accepted by the Central South African Railways, the said Railways acted as the agents of the defendants and not of the plaintiff. To this replication the defendants now excepted, as being embarrassing and bad in law.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C. (for the exceptors): The replication sets up quite a different case from that disclosed by the declaration. The latter claims damages on the ground that the goods were not safely delivered at Johannesburg. The replication claims damages on the ground that they were not brought back and re-delivered at Cape Town.

Mr. Wilkinson (for the respondent): See Scothorn v. South Staffordshire Railway (8 Exch., 341).

[De Villiers, C.J.: But does the point in that case turn upon a question of pleading?]

It affects the question at issue to this extent, that it was there decided that if a Railway Company contracts to convey goods from A to B over its own line, and then hands them over to another company to be conveyed from B to C, and the consignor thereupon requests the first of these companies to return the goods to him and this said company directs the second company to return them from C to B that they may be forwarded to A, this second company acts throughout as the agent, not of the consignor but of the first company, and the contract which this first company tacitly makes with the consignor to return his goods is really an extension of its original contract to deliver the goods at C. That case is on all fours with the present case, and if the decision there is law, it is clear that our replication, while it may introduce fresh matter, does not disclose any new cause of action. We had no knowledge of the Central South African Railways in this matter, there was no privity of contract between us, and whatever they did they did merely as the agents of the defendants.

Mr. Schreiner was not called upon in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: It often becomes necessary for a plaintiff, in order to meet the plea of the defendant, to allege new matter, and a mere allegation of new matter is not necessarily "embarassing." But the plaintiff cannot by his replication set up an entirely new cause of action, and that is what the plaintiff has done in the present case. His original cause of action was in respect of the non-delivery to the plaintiff of certain luggage at Johannesburg. He alleges that the defendant undertook to carry the luggage to Johannesburg, and there deliver it to the plaintiff, that the defendant has not delivered the same to the plaintiff, but only a portion thereof, and that he has either lost or retained the remainder. Then, the defendant, by his plea, says that the luggage was taken to Johannesburg, and there, in accordance with custom, placed in the charge and the custody of the Central South African Railways, and that the plaintiff thereafter asked that the luggage should be returned to Cape Town, and the defendant accordingly requested the C.S.A.R. to return the luggage to Cape Town, and that a portion of such luggage was thereafter returned, and duly delivered to the plaintiff. Then, in his replication, the plaintiff says that the defendant contracted for hire with the plaintiff safely to carry the said luggage back to Cape Town. That is new cause altogether. In my opinion, it would be exceedingly embarrassing to the defendant if this new cause of action were allowed, so long as the declaration stands. The better course for the plaintiff would have been, when he discovered the mistake, or saw what the true circumstances were, to have applied to the defendant to allow him to amend the declaration. If he refused, application might have been made to the Court to amend the declaration, so that there might not be two opposing causes of action by the same plaintiff in the same action. The replication clearly is bad, so long as the declaration is unamended, and the exception must be allowed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

REGISTRATION APPEALS. { 1903. May 11th.

The Chief Justice stated that it would be necessary to fix a day for the hearing of the registration appeals, for which purpose there would be a full Court, and the only day available would be the 22nd May. In consequence, the trial cases set down for that day would be postponed, viz., Robertson v. Moss, Lazar v. Harbour Board, and Spiegel v. Eilenberg. They were Cape Town cases, so that they might be postponed until the following week. Robertson v. Moss would be set down for the 2nd June, Lazar v. Harbour Board for the 3rd June, and Spiegel v. Eilenberg for the 4th June. The rest of the cases for that day were appeals from R.M. courts. Then some of the other cases standing in the list might be postponed. To-morrow (Tuesday) there were a large number of cases in the list. Steyn v. Zeeman would probably take some time. The case of Masterton v. Bray and Tarry would be taken first. Domingo v. Tonkin would be taken on June 8, Black v. Kaiser on June 9, and Harbour Board v. Sacks and Christ and Cumes on June 10. On Wednesday the Court might sit in two divisions.

STEVEN V. STEVEN.

This was a suit for divorce instituted by John Steven, an engine driver, of Cape Town, against his wife, Mary Maggie Steven (born Thomson), of Maxwell Town, Kirkcudbrightshire, Scotland, on the ground of her adultery.

The petitioner had obtained leave in this Court to sue by edictal citation, and the return day was fixed for the 1st May. In the edictal citation, which was personally served on the defendant, the return day was correctly stated as the 1st May, but on the notice of trial the return day was stated as the 23rd April, and the day of trial May 1. That was served on the defendant on the 26th February, so that she had time enough to enter an appearance. The defendant was at present in Scotland. The trial day had subsequently been altered.

The notice having been read, the Chief Justice said counsel might proceed with the case.

Mr. Russell for plaintiff; defendant in default.

The plaintiff stated that he was an engine driver in the Municipal quarry. He was married to his wife Mary Maggie Thomson, on the 26th June, 1885, at Holywood, Dumfriesshire. They lived together until November, 1896, and there was issue of marriage of three children, a boy and two girls. He left Scotland in that month for South Africa to better his position. He had never been back to Scotland since then. His intention was to settle in South Africa, and he had regularly sent money to his wife. In July, 1900, he made inquiries about certain reports he had heard, and found that the defendant had committed adultery with some person unknown, and as a result she had an illegitimate male child on the 26th September, 1900, at Maxwell Town, Kirkcudbrightshire.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Why didn't you send for your wife when you got work?]

I was not in a position, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: You sent her money regularly. How much did you send her?]

Witness: £3 10s. and £4 a month, my lord, according to my wages.

Mr. Russell then adduced further evidence taken on commission, notice of which had been sent by registered letter to the defendant. The sworn testimony of Andrew Steven, brother of the plaintiff, was read, which stated that in consequence of talk he had heard in Glasgow of a scandal at Maxwell Town about the end of 1900, he proceeded there, and found his sister-in-law enceinte.

[De Villiers, C J.: I see in the register of births the child is given as illegitimate?]

Mr. Russell: The father's name is not given, my lord.

Decree granted as prayed.

RAPLEY V. RAPLEY.

This was an action brought by Lena Rapley, of London, England, against her husband, Wm. Rapley, late of Stellenbosch, for the restitution of conjugal rights, or, failing compliance, for a decree of divorce with custody of the three children of the marriage, and maintenance at the rate of £15 a month.

Mr. Upington appeared for plaintiff; defendant in default.

The petitioner, Mrs. Lena Rapley, stated that on the 9th August, 1886, she was married to the defendant at Tunbridge Wells, England. Shortly after, she came out to Pretoria with her husband in 1888, where her husband entered into partnership in a broker's business. Her health was not good, and she returned in 1889 to England. Her husband returned home in 1900. Later on, they came out to Johannesburg. Shortly after, her husband lost all his money, and in 1891 they went to Natal, where her husband had a position as secretary to a club in Pietermaritzburg. He lost that position, and they again went to Johannesburg. In 1894 her health was again unsatisfactory, and she went to England, but her husband did not supply her with money, and she had to come to Johannesburg again. She again, however, had to go back to England on account of her health. About five months afterwards she received a remittance of £20, and later on one of £10. Since then she had not received a penny from defendant. She had not had letters from her husband since 1897, except only occasionally. She had written to him repeatedly, asking him to take her back, but he declined, and said that he preferred to remain a bachelor. Her correspondence was now in the hands of her attorneys in England. Since the issue of the summons and the filing of the declaration, the defendant had not made any offer to her. Since 1895 she had maintained herself and family with the aid of friends. Her family—three girls, aged 16, 13, and 10 years—were under the care of a convent until she returned. She had written to her husband at Fraserburg, where he was Commandant, asking him to take her back. She came out to the Cape about three weeks ago in the Walmer Castle.

[By De Villiers, C.J.: She had earned her livelihood on the stage acting and reciting, and at times giving lessons in elocution. She was not strong now. She did not know whether her husband had any means.]

Mr. Upington: As a matter of fact he has taken the farm Amoy, at Stellenbosch, in partnership with another gentleman.

George Holker, of the farm Amoy, Stellenbosch, said he entered into a lease of the farm in partnership with the defendant, Wm. Rapley. They had taken the farm for 19 months, with the option of purchase.

[By De Villiers, C.J.: They supplied capital in equal amounts. Defendant had supplied between £300 and £400. They had been in business since last October.]

[Maasdorp, J.: Where is the defendant?]

I don't know.

The Court granted a decree of restitution of conjugal rights, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 31st May, failing which plaintiff should take a rule calling on the defendant to show cause on the 12th June why a decree of divorce should not be granted with costs, the plaintiff to be entitled to custody of the children of the marriage, and, further, why the defendant should not pay £8 per month for the maintenance of the children until the youngest child shall have attained the age of 16 years.

VAN DER POST v. TWYFELHOEK DIAMOND PROSPECTING SYNDICATE. 1903. May 11th.

Evidence — Surrounding circumstances — Interpretation of written agreements.

The defendant purchased a certain farm from the plaintiff, and by two written agreements it was agreed that a portion of the price should be paid in cash, and that, as to the balance, it should be paid within six months in case tranquillity should be restored, but that in any case a bond for the amount should be passed. After tranquillity had been admittedly restored a third agreement in writing was entered into, providing that the provisions of the two previous agreements should be considered as therein inserted word for word, and that a bond for three years certain should be passed.

Held, that the three agreements should be construed as a whole, and that those provisions of the two earlier documents which were in conflict with the latest document were intended to be superseded.

Held further, that even if the matter were in doubt, the fact that tranquillity had been restored at the date of the latest document was one of those surrounding circumstances which may be taken into consideration for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties.

This was an action brought by Christian Wilhelm van der Post, of Stellenbosch, and late of Fauresmith, O.R.C., to have an agreement cancelled into which he had entered with the defendant company for the sale of certain lands.

The declaration set forth that on or about 3rd December, 1901, a written agreement was entered into between the plaintiff, who resided at Stellenbosch, on the one hand, and one Isak Bosman, acting for himself and for other persons, afterwards to be constituted a syndicate, on the other hand, in which the said Bosman obtained the option of purchase for the sum of £10,000 of a certain farm in the Orange River Colony, the property of the plaintiff, upon certain terms set forth in the said agreement. In terms of the said agreement certain sums of money were from time to time paid to the plaintiff by Bosman for the said refusal or option. About 20th February, 1902, the terms and conditions of the said agreement (a) were altered by mutual consent, in a letter written by the plaintiff to Bosman on that date. Those agreements (a) and (b) constituted the contract between the parties. The syndicate was formed for the purpose of carrying out the agreements (a) and (b), and on April 9, 1902, the syndicate notified to plaintiff that it exercised the option of purchase under the said agreements; the time for the payment of the first instalment of the purchase price having been extended by plaintiff. An interdict was placed upon the transfer in March, 1902, by the military authorities, and the fact was duly notified to the defendant company. It was provided in the agreement (b) that on payment of the sum of £2,500, including all sums already paid for the refusal or option, the sale of the said property should be finally concluded. About March, 1902, plaintiff agreed to extend the time to May, 1902, when the defendants paid the sum of £2,500 It was further provided in (b) that the balance of the purchase money, viz., £7,500, should become payable within six months of tranquillity, or in any case, within three years. Another document was submitted to plaintiff in July, 1902, and a clause inserted to the effect that the balance should be left on mortgage for three years, but subject to the stipulations in (a) and (b). Tranquillity was restored in July, 1902, and the balance became payable six months thereafter. The defendant company failed to pay the sum, and contended, by virtue of the clause in the agreement (c), that they were not called upon to do so for three years. The plaintiff claimed the sum of £7,500 with interest (tendering the transfer of the property), and further, if it appeared to the Court to be necessary, a rectification of the document (c), which, he contended, neither varied nor altered the agreements (a) and (b). Failing the above, he claimed a cancellation of all agreements between the plaintiff and defendants, plaintiff tendering to return all moneys paid by him or on behalf of the defendant syndicate in respect of the purchase price of the said property or interest.

The defendants' plea admitted the allegations up to paragraph 9, but denied that the agreement (c) was not part of the contract between the parties. The plaintiff entered into the latter agreement with a full knowledge of its contents. They denied the restoration of tranquillity on the date given, but admitted having received notice of it. They contended that they were not bound to pay the sum until the lapse of three years, and claimed in reconvention for the transfer of the property.

The replication was general.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for the plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin), for the defendants.

Mr. Burton said that the pleadings and documents gave the gist of the question. It seemed that Mr. Izak Bosman wanted to get hold of an option on the farm Twyfelhoek, which belonged to the plaintiff, and subsequently he got the amendment made by the plaintiff contained in document (b). They would contend that the document (c) contained all that was in (a) and (b). The defendants stated that according to the terms of (c) they were entitled to give a mortgage bond, and to have payment of the balance of the purchase money deferred for three years. Counsel contended that six months after July 1 the money became payable.

[Maasdorp, J.: What is the meaning of "in any case" in (b)?]

He says once tranquillity was restored the money became payable within six months, and, in any case, if the war went on he was not to be kept out of his money any longer than three years.

[Maasdorp, J.: What does three consecutive years mean. Does it mean instalments?]

No, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What is your case, then? That he did not read this before he signed it?]

No, my lord. After the document (b) was signed the plaintiff was approached in the first place to give the defendant time for the payment of the first instalment of £2,500. Then the defendants, through their attorney, wrote to him in May, after they had paid the first instalment, saying that they wanted to register the syndicate as a company, and it was desirable to have a new contract. They sent him a draft of such a new contract. That draft contained practically the document (c) as it stood, with the insertion in the preamble of the words "subject to the stipulations in (a) and (b)." That alteration was introduced by the plaintiff himself.

The plaintiff, Christian Wilhelm van der Post, said he was a burgher of the late Orange Free State, and that he was for 15 years a member of the late Volksraad, and was chairman for some time. He lived at Fauresmith. He was allowed to come down to Stellenbosch on parole in September, 1901. He knew Mr. Izak Bosman. They entered into an agreement on the 4th December. He subsequently received a letter from Mr. Bosman on the 20th February, embodying the offer of £10,000, and witness sent in reply a letter containing the terms. On the 19th March his agents received a telegram from Mr. Bosman, stating that the syndicate would complete contract on the 31st March. Further correspondence took place. Witness spoke to an interview with Mr. Saber, one of the directors, and Mr. Bosman.

Sir Henry Juta (interposing) said he thought one might at this stage raise a question of some importance to the case. There was no allegation of fraud in the statement of declaration, and it was a little bit difficult to understand on what his friend proposed to erect his case.

His case was that there was a contract, so that no verbal evidence could be led as to what took place before it. If there were to be a rectification, there must be an allegation of fraud or mistake. Neither had been made in the present case. First, the contract must be construed simply as it stood, and then if there were to be a rectification there must be an allegation of fraud or mistake.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But is not that practically alleged?]

No, there is no allegation of fraud or mistake. The declaration contains no allegation that there was anything fraudulent about it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: No exception has been taken.]

I admit that; but the whole question is whether evidence is admissible as to anything which took place before this contract was signed. I submit it is not alleged that it is fraudulent, because, on the face of it, it is ridiculous to allege that it was fraudulent, inasmuch as he had the contract, and he made the additions to the contract himself.

[Maasdorp, J.: But is there not a mistake? Does it not amount to saying, "I signed one thing when I intended to sign another?"]

When a contract says A sells B a horse, then B cannot come and say that he bona fide believed that he was buying a cow. I am prepared to maintain that unless a person is illiterate, and he has no opportunity of reading a document, and as long as the words are plain and definite, unless you allege fraud or a mutual mistake, you cannot ask that that document should be altered.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But would not a mistake by default of another be sufficient? If one party brings a representation to bear on another man, and puts before him a document, and says it contains so and so, the latter says, "I signed it in the honest belief that it was correct." The person who induced him to have that honest belief could not take advantage of the mistake caused by his false statement.]

Mr. Van der Post had the document, and he made pencil alterations on it; the contract was drawn up in accordance with his own alterations, and he came into a solicitor's office and signed it.

[Maasdorp, J.: If he actually read it, he cannot now fall back on his being deceived.]

Yes, that is exactly what he did.

Witness (continuing) said that the interview took place on April 4 at Stellenbosch. Mr. Saber told him that, on account of the reasons already stated in the previous letter, namely, Mr. Rhodes's death and the Easter Holidays, he would have to wait a little while for payment of the first instalment. A sum of £800 was offered to witness, and he was told that he would have to wait for the balance of the first instalment. He agreed to wait for a reasonable time. Witness afterwards got a letter on the 7th April informing him that there would be a meeting of the syndicate, and on the 9th he received notification that the directors were authorised to proceed with the purchase of the farm on the terms arranged. Further correspondence ensued with regard to the payment of the first instalment of £2,500. On the 7th May, 1902, he received a letter from the defendants' attorneys enclosing a cheque for £1,250 and a receipt for £250 in respect of ten shares in the company. He had previously received £1,000. On the 12th May he returned the receipt for the ten shares until a proper certificate was issued to him, and he declined to execute a new memorandum of agreement which had been sent to him, on the ground that the syndicate were drawing a red herring across the track. They were proposing to make Bosman and himself cancel the previous contract, and enter into a new one. He informed them that they could not reasonably expect him to sign that document, seeing that it was contrary to existing documents. He received further letters on the 3rd and 12th June, and on the 17th June he agreed to sign an agreement drawn up in accordance with the alterations which he had made in pencil in the draft. On the 1st July he was in Cape Town, and he signed the agreement. He met Messrs. Saber and Irwin at the secretary's office on other business. When that business was completed, they asked him to accompany them to the office of Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissinne to sign a new agreement. He went with them, and met Mr. Van Zyl, the junior partner in the firm, who handed a document to him. He looked through it, and found that the alterations which he had made in pencil on the draft had been inserted, and he thereupon signed the contract. The parties who were to sign the document on behalf of the syndicate were not present. He thought at the time that he was fully protected under the contract.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Burton): How can you go behind the contract?]

There is still left the question of mistake.

[De Villiers, C.J.: He receives the draft and makes his alterations, the alterations are accepted, and then there is the final contract which he inspects and then signs.]

Mr. Burton admitted that that side of the case was not strong, and said he took it that, in view of his lordship's holding, the evidence in the case ceased at that stage.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I should think so.]

Counsel were heard at length in argument.

It was contended, for the defence, that the agreement (c) was absolute and binding, and that the clause, referring to the repayment of the balance of the purchase money at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, on a mortgage bond, was thoroughly understood by the plaintiff when he signed the document.

De Villiers, C.J.: The plaintiff in this case has given his evidence with perfect fairness and candour. On the 6th December, 1901, he entered into an agreement with one Izak Bosman, acting on behalf of the defendant syndicate, by which he gave them an option of purchase in respect of his farm Twyfelhoek, in the Orange River Colony. Some discussion subsequently arose between the parties in regard to the terms of this contract, which could not be fully carried out by the defendant, and the syndicate wrote a letter early in 1902, which formed part of the agreement between them. Subsequently, on the 1st July, 1902, a further document was executed, and it is in regard to the execution of this document that the real dispute between the parties arises. The plaintiff alleges in regard to this document of the 1st July, 1902, that at Cape Town, the defendant tendered to the plaintiff for his signature a document marked "c," representing to the plaintiff that this merely embodied the terms of (a) and (b). The evidence in the case wholly fails to support this allegation. It appears that some time before the execution of this document a document had been sent by the defendant to the plaintiff with a request that he would execute it. He thoroughly examines it, and he subsequently returned it with certain amendments written in pencil on the face of this document. The defendant then executed the formal agreement, in which the amendments proposed by the plaintiff were inserted. The plaintiff came to Cape Town, and went to the office of the defendants' attorneys, and according to his own account, he signed this document without any further representations having been made to him. "I was asked to go to the office of Van Zyl and Buissinne. I went. I met Van Zyl. He gave me the document. I looked through it. I found the alterations I had made had been inserted, and thereupon I signed the contract." There is no proof here whatever of such a representation being made to the plaintiff as is alleged in the declaration. Therefore, this case must be decided as if there were these three documents executed between the parties, and the Court has now to construe these three documents together. I agree that the documents (a) and (b) should be read as if they had been inserted in the preamble of (c), and that the third paragraph of the document (c) should be read as if subject to the stipulations contained in the two first agreements. It is a principle in the construction of every document to give effect, if possible, to every part of it, and to endeavour to give a consistent interpretation to the whole of the document, and that is what the Court has to do in the present case. It appears to me a perfectly consistent view to hold that those provisions of the earlier documents which are in conflict with any of the provisions of the latest document were intended to be superseded. Those provisions, on the other hand, of the earlier documents which are consistent with the latest must remain in force. For instance, in the second clause of (b): "This balance shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable quarterly, and failing payments, I shall have the right to demand and enforce immediate payment of the capital owing, if the property shall have been transferred, and if not yet transferred, then to declare the sale cancelled, retaining all moneys that have already been paid. All payments to be made at the office of Messrs. P. J. Bosman and Son, Stellenbosch." The stipulation which I have just read is wholly consistent with the rest of this agreement, and therefore it must be considered as still binding on the plaintiff. Would it be consistent with the last document (c) to hold that a provision that the moneys shall become payable in full six months after tranquillity has been restored is still binding? In my opinion, it is wholly inconsistent, but more, it seems to me that whatever the plaintiff may have thought of the matter, the defendants, at all events, might fairly believe that this part of the agreement was wholly set side, inasmuch as tranquillity had been restored. Even if there had been a doubt as to the true intention of the parties, the fact that tranquillity had been restored at the date of the latest agreement would have been one of those surrounding circumstances which the Court would have been justified in considering for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of the agreement. The earlier documents refer to the restoration of tranquillity as being an event on the occurrence of which the balance of the purchase money should become payable in six months. It is clear, however, that the parties intended that this stipulation should fall to the ground, for, notwithstanding the restoration of tranquillity, they agree to a provision for the passing of a bond for three years certain. There must be absolution from the instance with costs, and the plaintiff in reconvention will have judgment with costs.

SIBBET AND STEPHAN v. WILLIAMS.

Mr. Russell mentioned this case as a matter of urgency. He said the petitioners were brokers in the sale of a certain piece of land by Thomas Williams to John Koppel for £1,850. Koppel passed a mortgage bond on the property to Williams for £300 in payment of the balance of the purchase price. Wilson refused to pay the brokerage—£46 5s. Williams was now in Johannesburg, and the bond was in the hands of Messrs. J. and H. Reid and Nephew, of Cape Town, Wilson's attorneys. Petitioners asked that the bond might be attached to found jurisdiction in an action against Williams for the said sum, and also for leave to sue by edictal citation.

Both applications were granted, the edictal citation to be served personally and returnable on June 12.

STEYN v. ZEEMAN. { 1903. May 12th. „ 13th.

Water—Servitude—Prescription—Accustomed flow—Rights of owner of dominant tenement.

A servitude had been imposed on the tenement of defendant's predecessor in title in the following terms:—"That the proprietor shall not be entitled to use more of the water coming down from the kloof than what is required for domestic purposes and not to lead off more than a stream of one inch, and that he shall be obliged to allow the remainder of the water to pass free and undisturbed, and not to be allowed to alter or displace any water-course by which the free run of the water might be impeded." In or about 1862 the river water had been diverted from the previous course of the river, and the then owners of plaintiff's farm cut a new furrow. Plaintiff now complained that the defendant had interfered with and damaged this said furrow, and had unlawfully diverted water therefrom. Plaintiff now claimed 1) a declaration that he was entitled to the sole free and undisturbed use of the water of the said river, and to that of the furrow traversing defendant's land, to maintain the said furrow, to have access thereto, and to take materials necessary for that purpose from defendant's land; (2) a perpetual interdict restraining defendant from interfering with the said river, the said furrow or the water therein, and (3) judgment for £1,000 by way of damages.

Held, that (1) the plaintiff was entitled to the free and undisturbed use of the water in the said furrow, and to reasonable access for the purposes of cleaning and repairing the same; that he was not justified in taking materials from defendant's land (save in the immediate vicinity of the furrow) for the purpose of executing such repairs; (2) that no interdict could be granted; (3) that inasmuch as the furrow had been damaged by the defendant the plaintiff was entitled to some damages, which the Court assessed at £50.

In this matter the plaintiff was Casparus Steyn, of the farm Orangerie, in the district of Malmesbury, and the defendant was Andries Zeeman, of the farm Uitkyk, also in the district of Malmesbury. The plaintiff sought an order of Court restoring his rights to the waters of Siebrits River, in the use and enjoyment of which he alleged he had been disturbed by the defendant, and he claimed £1,000 damages for the alleged wrongful acts of the defendant in so doing.

The declaration set out:

(1) That the plaintiff was the owner of certain land, part freehold and part quitrent, forming portion of the farm known as Orangerie.

(2) That on or about the 13th January, 1837, one Bartholomeus Siebrits, the owner of the said first undivided farm, transferred a portion to Bartholomeus Siebrits, jun., and subjected the remaining extent of quitrent, not so transferred, to a certain condition in favour of the said transferee, regarding the use of the water theretofore, belonging to the said farm.

(3) That the defendant was the successor in title to the owner of the said remaining extent.

(4) That in and under the terms of the said condition the defendant was precluded and barred from using, and had no right or title to use any part of the water of the Siebrits Kloof River (save as to one inch thereof, the rights to which or part thereof were no longer vested in the defendant, but which right or rights it was not necessary to set forth in this form), and the plaintiff was entitled as against the defendant to the sole enjoyment and use of the said water.

(5) That continually from a period prior to 1862 the plaintiff and his predecessors in title had had and enjoyed as of right the sole and exclusive use of the water of the stream known as Siebrits River (save and except as to the one inch aforesaid), and had continually and as of right diverted and led the said water from the said stream by an artificial furrow or watercourse, in 1862, or theretofore made and since then repaired and maintained by the predecessors in title of the plaintiff, and by him for the purposes of such sole and exclusive use as aforesaid.

(6) That the furrow traversed certain land formerly forming part of the farm Orangerie; the said furrow had been cleaned, maintained, and repaired, and materials taken for that purpose from the said land.

(7) That in August, 1900, the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully interfered with, damaged, and re-laid the said furrow and diverted water therefrom, but on the 7th December, 1900, he admitted that such acts were wrongful, and paid certain costs incurred by the plaintiff in preparing to take legal proceedings.

(8) That thereafter in December, 1900, the defendant (a) wrongfully interfered with, re-laid, and damaged the said furrow, causing the banks to be damaged, and otherwise damnifying the plaintiff, and (b) wrongfully and unlawfully interfered with the water in and the channel of the said Siebrits River, and damaged and weakened the banks thereof, causing the same to fall in, and diverted the water in the said river, and made use of the said water for several days, and deprived plaintiff of the use thereof, and also further damnified him.

(9) That on the 10th January, 1901, defendant admitted that he had no claim to the water, and that on the 7th December he had wrongfully diverted and used the water.

(10) That plaintiff claimed £100 damages from defendant, but he was willing to settle the matter on payment of £50 if the defendant would enter into a written agreement, acknowledging plaintiff's rights, both as to the water and the furrow, and as to taking materials for the repair of the furrow, but the defendant refused to pay damages, and no agreement was executed.

(11) Thereafter the defendant (a) in March, 1901, again interfered with the furrow, and diverted the water into his plantations, and in May and June, 1901, and damaged 50 yards of the said furrow or thereabouts, and caused the same to be washed away and filled up with sand and dirt; (b) in August, 1902, defendant injuriously interfered with and damaged the said furrow where it ran on to the farm Kweeperfontein, in consequence whereof the said embankments were washed away, and the furrow was entirely covered up and silted with sand for some distance, and otherwise injured; (c) in November, 1902, defendant interfered with and damaged the said furrow, where it was led out of the aforesaid river, by making embankments in the river and impairing the banks of the said furrow.

(12) In consequence of defendant's action plaintiff has been deprived of the use of the water, to which he is entitled, his orchards, vegetable gardens, and plantations have suffered in consequence, and he had otherwise been put to labour, expense, and trouble, and had so been damnified in the sum of £1,000.

Plaintiff therefore claimed:

(a) A declaration that he was entitled, as against the defendant, to the sole, exclusive, and undisturbed use and enjoyment of the water of the said river, and to the free and undisturbed use of the furrow traversing the defendant's said land, and to clean, maintain, and repair the same from time to time, and had exclusive access to and reasonably take materials for those purposes, and to the sole and exclusive use of the water diverted and led in by the said furrow from the Siebrits River, across the defendant's said land.

(b) A perpetual interdict restraining the defndant or his servants or agents from in any way interfering with the said river or the water therein, or with the said furrow or the water therein, or in any way preventing the plaintiff from the free and undisturbed use of the said furrow or the sole and exclusive use and enjoyment of the said water as aforesaid, whether in furrow or river.

(c) Judgment for £1,000 sterling by way of damages.

(d) Other relief.

(e) Costs of suit.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted paragraphs 1 to 6 inclusive. He admitted the allegations in paragraph 7. As to paragraph 8, he admitted the use of water in sub-section (b), but denied the allegation of damage. He denied the allegations in paragraph 9, admitted the allegation in paragraph 10, except that he said plaintiff originally claimed, not £100, but £50; denied the allegations in paragraph 11, save that he admitted that he made the embankments in the river, but said that the water thereby diverted flowed into the furrow and then on to the plaintiff's land, and was not used by defendant. He denied the allegations in paragraph 12, but tendered £5 in full and sufficient satisfaction of any claim that the plaintiff had. He further said that the plaintiff had from time to time neglected to keep the furrow clean, and give a clear passage to the said water, and that, in consequence, he (defendant) had become entitled to and did so clean the same. He was prepared to submit to judgment in terms of prayer (a) of the declaration, subject to the omission of the words "and reasonably take materials for those purposes," and subject to a declaration that he was entitled to use the furrow for the passage of the water herein referred to, and to clean the same if the plaintiff should neglect so to do. He was further prepared, and expressed his willingness to submit to an interdict, and tendered the sum of £5, together with taxed costs. Save as to the tender he had made, he prayed that the claim should be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Sohreiner, K.C. (with him Mr. McGregor) for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin) for defendant.

Mr. Schreiner, in going over the various clauses of the declaration, said that the furrow was practically a lost furrow now to the plaintiff. He could not get his supply of water now as formerly, and it would be a very heavy cost to him to reinstate that furrow as it was prior to the interference of the defendant. The other furrow made by Mr. Zeeman in the river bed had robbed the plaintiff of water which was of great value to him; he had prevented the water coming down as it used to do by sand silting up and by large fallings down of the bank. The defendant had not the title even to an inch of the water. The inch named in the declaration belonged to Meltz Steyn, and the defendant had no right to touch a drop of water apart from domestic user. The defendant had interfered with the plaintiff's furrow most detrimentally, in fact, ruined it lower down, by collecting the drainage water from his upper property, which used to come down in many small streams and driblets into or over the furrow to plaintiff's property, and so into the river. He had taken the drainage water, and brought it down in one great stream. The defendant, in his plea, submitted to a declaration of rights, and to an interdict, but he asked that the declaration of the plaintiff's rights should be made, subject to his right to send his drain water down the plaintiff's furrow. The plaintiff, of course, could not consent to that. The question was one not only of defendant using water belonging to the plaintiff, but he had deprived the plaintiff of his acqueductus and of the servitude which he had across the defendant's property. If the drain water were allowed to go down the plaintiff's furrow, the defendant would by that means be able to make it perfectly useless. The plaintiff could not consent to that; that was perhaps the most important issue outstanding between the parties. As to the question of materials, Voet laid it down that where they had servitude, they must have all the conditions necessary for the servitude. The plaintiff was informed that the defendant had, since this action was brought, sold his property to one Mr. Smidt, but he understood from the other side that transfer had not actually been passed. Counsel laid some stress on the damage sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the defendant's acts.

Pieter Adrian Bergh, Government Land Surveyor, spoke to a survey which he made in 1898 of Uitkyk, and the alteration of the plaintiff s furrow between that time and 1901. The old furrow was a very substantial one, overgrown with shrubs. He also spoke to finding a new furrow in the river bed in 1901. There were furrows which led the water to the defendant's plantation.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: It was an inference of his own that the furrow must have been cut for defendant's purposes—for irrigation purposes. He saw the defendant leading water out of Steyn's furrow on to his plantation. The defendant said it was an overwash, and that he had come to block it up. The defendant blocked it up. He was confident that there had been a cutting. He saw the spade marks at the outlet. He had been down at Orangerie, where the water came down into a dam, but he did not know where the water went from the dam. The furrow was very much overgrown when he saw it in 1898; he would not deny that it was a very much neglected furrow.

Bartholomeus Siebrits (73) said he was born on the farm Orangerie. It was his father's property. When he was ten years old he left the farm a little time —about two years—and he then returned and lived in the neighbourhood. He left when he was about 30 years of age, and came to Cape Town for about two years, and he then returned and farmed a portion of Orangerie for some years. He had occupied the present farm about thirty years. When he was quite young, the Steyn furrow was there. As far as he knew, the furrow was always there until Mr. Zeeman became the owner of the adjacent farm. Zeeman was the fifth owner of the farm Uitkyk since the furrow was placed there. It was purely the Orangerie sluit; there was one inch of water allowed, but that was acquired by Meltz Steyn. The furrow was large enough to take the rain-water. There was a watermill driven by the water formerly, and the farm had no water, except what was got from the furrow. Orangerie was dependent on that furrow mainly. The defendant did not lead water to his vineyard, but it oozed through. He saw Mr. Steyn's furrow a fortnight ago. In some places the old furrow was still the same, but in several places it was changed. Defendant had diverted the stream of the river and taken the poplars out of the bank. The water could not be taken now into the furrow from the place where it was formerly taken from. The water was too low, and a wall had had to be built to get it to the same place. The defendant now cultivated right up to where the water ran, and the broad bank which used to be there had disappeared.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Sir H. Juta): What are the acts in respect of which you tender £5?]

The defendant admitted diverting the water. The allegation was that the defendant took the water in December, 1900. It appeared from the declaration that there was a complaint made, and the matter was settled by his client paying costs, and what he said now was that he did take water, but it was before the settlement was made. The plaintiff alleged that the defendant twice relaid the furrow, but the defendant said that he only once relaid it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is a curious kind of settlement. I should have thought the settlement would include everything.]

That is what my client thought, too.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then why do you tender £5?]

I don't know exactly. He rather thought, I suppose, that in order to settle a matter like this he would tender a few pounds, in the hope that nothing more would be heard of the case. He admits that he put the embankment in the river. His statement is that he did so because Mr. Steyn was complaining that he could get no water down the furrow. Defendant said that that was because the plaintiff did not repair the dam.

Witness (continuing) said that during the first two years the water supply was all right, but during the last year there was none. This was not on account of the last season being a dry one, because elsewhere the water ran all right. The stoppage of the supply was on account of the defendant's delving operations higher up, and his cutting away the poplars, thus causing another outlet. Lately he had cut a channel on the other side of the river from his estate, and this washing away the banks, caused drift sand in the bed of the river, thereby impeding the flow. There was a dam down below belonging to the plaintiff, which before defendant's operations supplied water to his stock, but it had not done since.

Cross-examined, witness said the plaintiff used the water in the dam for his distillery, poultry, and lands. He was aware plaintiff had a spring down below, from which he pumped water on to his werf, and used for his household. He was aware that Jordaan and all the proprietors below cultivated up to the edge of the river, but he asserted that they did not go as near to the edge of the embankment as the defendant, and did no damage to the water supply. He knew the Widow Jordaan's place on the river, and admitted she worked nearer to the river than the defendant, but trees there protected the bank. There was a dam which turned the water into the furrow, but it was damaged, and could not kept in a proper state of repair to be efficient. He had not tried it.

Sir H. Juta: Oh, but we have.

Witness, re-examined: If a masonry or cement wall were made, the water could be raised to the proper level; but a loose embankment to the dam would not stand, as now that the river was made to run off in a different place, the bank would all wash away.

[Maasdorp, J. (to Mr. Schreiner): Does your client object to an embankment being put there?]

I am instructed that the alteration would entail an outlay of £6,000 to £7,000 to reinstate the position.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In order to shorten the proceedings, I may say there is much evidence about which there can be no conflict.

Sir H. Juta: So far from objecting to an embankment to the dam being made, my client has made one to send the water into the dam, and that is the case of the plaintiff.

Casparus Johannes Reinhard Steyn, plaintiff in the case, said that before defendant came to the place he (plaintiff) had had no difficulty in getting water into his furrow, and during the sixteen years he had been on the farm he had had no trouble about the water with any other proprietor above. Now and then other proprietors had let a little water on to their land. Plaintiff mentioned several dates on which defendant took or interfered with his water. The water ran all right opposite the defendant's place, but it washed the loose ground down, and silted up his (plaintiff's) dams. To take the water from defendant's ground through an 8-inch pipe on to his (plaintiff's) ground would cost him £600, and he would also have to pay the cost of transport. Defendant's claim to send his drainage water down his (plaintiff's) furrow was correct, but the water had to spread, and not come down in a single stream, and thus damage his embankments. Plaintiff objected to this, in 1901, and defendant made certain alterations by laying corrugated iron, and so forth, to obviate it, but without avail. On defendant's own ground, he could take the water over plaintiff's furrow by means of a chute. Plaintiff described how, by being deprived of water through defendant's action, he had sustained damage to his lands, his distillery, and his poultry, estimating it at over £1,000.

Cross-examined, plaintiff admitted there was a dam made by the defendant which, if repaired, would turn the water into the furrow; but he held that the cost would be too great.

Re-examined, he had tried three times to make the dam good without avail, and unless he employed cement and masonry, the cost of which would be too great, the dam could not be utilised.

Casper Johannes Reinhard Bresler and Bartholomeus le Roux, who claimed to be for a long number of years acquainted with the property in question, and a coloured man who constructed the new furrow on defendant's property, were called in support.

Johannes Petrus Minnaar, of Malmesbury, testified as an expert in water matters as to the great expense that would be incurred in rectifying the damage that had resulted from the construction of the new furrow. He also corroborated the evidence that had been given as to the heavy cost that would be necessary to build a proper dam wall on the plaintiff's farm.

Mr. Werdmuller, attorney, practising at Malmesbury, and acting for the plaintiff, said that on the 10th January, 1901, plaintiff offered to withdraw proceedings on payment by defendant of £50, and making certain alterations and improvements in the sluits, and giving a notarial undertaking not to interfere with the water supply in future. This defendant refused to do.

Mr. Schreiner intimated that he had other witnesses, but closed his case.

Sir Henry Juta said he had any number of witnesses, but he would confine the number to five.

Sir H. Juta, before opening the case for the defence, said he should like to put a question or two to the plaintiff.

The plaintiff (re-called), replying to Sir Henry, said he knew Nicola Smidt, of Malmesbury. He did not remember asking Smidt before the war to give an estimate for laying a pipe from the intake to bring water to his farm.

Nicola Smidt, contractor, Malmesbury, for the defence, said his brother-in-law was owner of part of the farm before Steyn. He knew Steyn's furrow, and he also knew Meltz Steyn's farm. In summer the water sometimes failed to reach Steyn's farm. The furrow was leaky. In some places it was cultivated close to the furrow. Before the war conversation took place between plaintiff and himself with regard to laying a pipe, the plaintiff saying that water spread too much and did not always reach his farm. He had seen the intake. The water could be turned into the furrow with an ordinary dam. The dam might be washed away in heavy rain. It was possible to put something here that would not be washed away. He could make a simple dam there for £5, and an "extra" dam for £30.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: For £5 he would make a dam, but it would wash away when the rain came. The £30 dam would not wash away when the rain came. He had made concrete walls in the river at Porterville. The £30 would incude the repair of the furrow. The "extra" dam would be made of concrete and cement. He would go down to proper foundations, and would carry out the work for £30. He had recently seen the river. At the out-turn place it was formerly deeper than now. It was more difficult formerly than now to turn the water in the furrow.

Nicholas Siebrits said he formerly farmed part of Uitkyk for four years. He knew the sluit known as Steyn's furrow.

In his pressing season he used to carry his grapes across the furrow. It was leaky. He made a furrow below Steyn's furrow to take the water oozing from the other furrow, so as not to get it into his vineyards. He lost vines through damage in that way. The water used to overflow Steyn's furrow. He used to cultivate close up to the furrow. Jordaines and others of the lower proprietors used to cultivate close to the furrow. He had not seen the place lately. The water did not always run in the furrow in summer; it ran about three or four months in the summer.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: He had heard Mr. Bartholomeus Siebrits's evidence as to the furrow, though not all that he had said. The furrow was only a foot wide at some places; it might have been a yard wide in other places. He worked within half a foot of the furrow. He had not seen whether the defendant proceeded on similar lines. He had not seen how Mr. Zeeman drained his property now. There was a made furrow in witness's time to take the water from the kloof. In the old time the water used to reach Steyn's furrow in a body, and not in a series of small sluits.

Re-examined by Sir H. Juta: There was no embankment of three or four feet deep in Steyn's furrow.

By De Villiers, C.J.: The slope towards the river varied a good deal. It was great in some places. It was in some places 1½ ft. deep, while in others it was 3 ft. deep.

Bartholomeus Siebrits, jun., said he was born on the farm Uitkyk. He left there about 1893, a little before Mr. Nicholas Siebrits bought the farm. As to Steyn's furrow, below the orange trees was a little embankment. In places the furrow was both narrow and shallow, and he had passed a thousand times with his cart over it. The furrow would have done a lot of damage through leakages to their vineyards if they had not attended to it themselves. The poplar trees which had been spoken of were more or less in the middle of the river. It was necessary to put down a small dam to turn the water into the furrow. If a heavy rainfall occurred the dam was washed away. The water had failed on several occasions before it reached the farm.

Cross-examined by Mr. Schreiner: The water ran into Steyn's sluit at the turn down at the old boundary sluit into the river.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The whole question is now what became of the water after running into the furrow, or whether there is such an increased flow into this furrow as to make Zeeman liable to an action.]

Mr. Schreiner: We ask that if the Court is of opinion that we should receive the water in the furrow, that defendant should not send it down in such quantities as to make a servitude of our property.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The defendant has nothing to do with the water after it reaches plaintiff's furrow.]

My point is that after reaching the furrow it was previously the custom to turn it into the river. If the Court holds that my client must receive the water, and that it is not necessary for defendant to send it over the furrow in a chute, my contention is that the water should be sent down in such quantities as could be dealt with on reaching the furrow.

Willem Riepersberg, formerly in the service of Melt Steyn, of the farm Waterval, situate above Uitkyk, was called to prove that there had previously been a difficulty in obtaining water from the river. Questioned as to the broken dam on the plaintiff's property, which it was held by the defence would be adequate to supply water to plaintiff's property were the dam repaired, witness concurred. He was not of opinion that the removal of the trees would by loosening the soil and thereby causing a bank to be formed lower down affect the water supply.

Charles John Pritchard, Government Land Surveyor, said he visited plaintiff's farm on the 7th of the present month. In the orchards the pear trees were shrunken, but otherwise all the trees were in splendid order. The vineyards also looked well, with the exception of those that had phylloxera. He did not see any trace of damage from want of water. The bush on the bank of the river had been cleared, but cultivation on the edge of the river at defendant's property was as near as on the others. He had had some experience of dams. From what he could see there should be no difficulty in turning the water from the furrow into the river. The bed of the furrow and the level of the water in the river were only two feet in difference.

Mr. Schreiner produced an envelope containing some shrivelled specimens of what was supposed to be fruit, and inquired if witness would expect that sort of fruit from the trees he said looked so well.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The best orchards might have a few specimens like that. If your witness had said these were the best specimens of the fruit this would be valuable.]

Stephanus Sebastian Walters having given evidence,

Andries Petrus Zeeman, the defendant, was called. He said that when he became the owner of the farm Uitkyk in 1899, the furrow was in a most "miserable" condition, being overgrown with bushes and weeds, and the banks being broken down. Some parts of the ground were so wet that they could not be cultivated. He cleared out the furrow and improved it, but keeping it the same level. While he was making the furrow, plaintiff often saw him at work, and did not interfere. Since the furrow was made his vineyards were much better. The "intake" of the new furrow was in the same place as the old one. Plaintiff never attempted to turn the water into the furrow, but with the assistance of a couple of "boys," he did so. On account of plaintiff complaining that he could get no water, witness constructed a dam to turn the water into the furrow. The water ran for nine days, and then the dam was broken. He did not know how the dam was broken, but he could see hoof marks around the place. He could make another dam that would answer the purpose, and he denied that it was necessary to make a cement wall. On the specific occasions on which he was charged with breaking the furrow he denied having done so with one exception by arrangement with Jordaan, but a dispute arising, the furrow was closed again. The only embankment he had made was the dam in the river. There were no trees or gardens that were damaged for the want of water. "All I saw in his vineyards was phylloxera; I could not see a place where he could suffer one penny," added witness.

Cross examined by Mr. Schreiner: It was all nonsense for Lategan to talk about making a furrow 105 yards long for witness. It was untrue that his furrow was altered at the intake. There was no change of furrow where the old intake was. He took out the poplars; he did not alter the embankment. He had not taken out a wall, because there had not been one there. He had had a good deal of litigation from time to time. Haman sued him, and he had had to pay plaintiff's costs. Mrs. Jordaan had a claim against him in 1901, and recovered £15. Smidt had a case against him. There were also two cases pending against him. Leroux had a case against him. He thought the other man and himself were friendly now. His overseer sued him for assault, and he was fined £4. He was also fined 10s. for another assault. He contended that the plaintiff had only a "common" case against him; he was "unguilty." He had been very friendly with Mr. Steyn.

He did not ask Mr. Steyn's permission for what he did. He never went to Mr. Steyn and complained that the furrow was neglected. He did not do so as long as they were friendly. He did not take water out of Steyn's furrow in March, 1901; he might have allowed overflow water to go on to his sweet potatoes from the furrow. He denied that he was leading out water about where the old furrow was. The one inch of reserved water was Melt Steyn's; the other was water belonging "to Orangerie." In March, 1901, the water was overflowing from the furrow. The furrow was bad. He did not know whether there had been heavy rains at the time. He had told Mr. Bergh that Mr. Kotze had told him that he had the right to lead water from the river, but not from the furrow. He had never taken out of the furrow; he had taken water out of the river. He took the water out of the river 60 yards below the intake. It was untrue that he had led water out of the furrow to his potatoes. As to water from the mountain, he knew the road that ran parallel with Steyn's furrow. He had not made a furrow to carry the water in the drain from the mountain; he had simply opened an old furrow. The drain water had always come down that old furrow. His knowledge of the locality extended beyond 1899. He was acquainted with the farm long before then.

Mr. Schreiner: But then you won't put your evidence against the evidence of old Mr. Bartholomeus Siebrits?

Witness: I was there many and many a time. I was there as a young man. I used to go there to see Bartholomeus Siebrits. In further examination, witness said that the old people on the other side were not giving correct evidence. Mr. Bartholomeus Siebrits was one of the old people. He was very sorry for them. He should have won his other cases if the other side had spoken the truth.

This concluded the evidence.

Mr. Schreiner (for the plaintiff) commented very strongly on the evidence for the defence, observing that none of the old residents had been called, and that several of the witnesses had not seen the furrow at all lately. The central fact of the case, he contended, was how was the water taken out by the furrow from the river before Andries Zeeman interfered with it? They had had no credible witness called for the defendant on this point. The plaintiff's witnesses had given most reliable evidence on this point. The defendant had absolutely interfered with the furrow at the out-take itself. It was most extraordinary that the defendant in his plea should submit to a perpetual injunction in view of the testimony that he had given that day. Counsel laid stress on the interruption and damage caused to plaintiff's furrow by the defendant sending down his drain water in a big stream instead of in small driblets. He contended that if the Court made an order in terms of the defendant's plea the plaintiff would lose his acqueductus servitude. He also asked for substantial damages, such as would indicate the Court's view of the acts committed by the defendant.

Sir H. Juta, for the defendant, said that in face of the defendant's admissions and the pleadings there was no question arising in the present case as to the defendant's rights. The only two questions that could arise were—firstly, the amount of damage; and, secondly, whether the plaintiff was entitled to the wide interdict that he sought without the qualifications which the defendant's plea contained. In the declaration they would notice that no complaint was made but the defendant had been sending down more water into the plaintiff's furrow than he should do, that was not a grievance alleged at all, and, consequently, the defendant, in order that the scope of the interdict may not be made so large as to prevent him from sending the water into this furrow had put in these two qualifications, the second one being that the defendant should have the right to clean out the furrow if the plaintiff did not. As to the question of damages, counsel contended that the plaintiff's idea was to get a cement dam and pipes for his own benefit at the expense of the defendant. No reliance was to be placed on the plaintiff's evidence as to the furrow being put into good order again. He said, "I don't think it can be done," or, "I can't see a chance of its being done." Where was the evidence then, that it could not be done? The plaintiff had made no attempt to prove that the water would not run down the furrow again if he made an attempt to make it. Evidence had been given to the Court that for a small sum they could make a substantial dam. The evidence showed that there was no damage. Mr. Zeeman had done wrong technically, but that was all settled, and there was no damage accruing during the year 1902. The truth of the matter rather seemed to be that Mr. Steyn would like to have pipes, and that he did speak to Mr. Smidt about pipes.

Mr. Schreiner was heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: The servitude which is now in question was imposed in the following terms: "That the proprietor shall not be entitled to use more of the water coming down from the kloof than what is required for domestic purposes, and not to lead off more than a stream of one inch, and that he shall be obliged to allow the remainder of the water to pass free and undisturbed, and not to be allowed to alter or displace any watercourse by which the free run of the water might be impeded." If this condition had stood by itself there would have been no proof whatever that the right of water-leading had been given by the former owner of the defendant's farm to the former owner of the plaintiff's farm. It is only by inference and by referring to the actual facts as they stood at the time when this servitude was imposed, and as they stood afterwards that such a right of water-leading can be ascertained. It would appear that at that time there was a kind of water-course, and that nearly as far back as the year 1862 the river water had been diverted from the river by a course different from the original course of the river, and, substantially, the water-course which is now in question is the water-course which has existed there since the year 1862. For upwards of 40 years, therefore, the owners of the plaintiff's farm have enjoyed the right under this condition to lead water out of the river by means of the furrow, and a servitude, in my opinion, was established, and the plaintiff, therefore, is entitled to the full benefits of such a servitude. He is, of course, liable to all the inconveniences which result from the existence of this watercourse, and therefore, to come first of all to this question of the drainage, if any drainage water from the defendant's farm has been accustomed to flow down into this water-course, the plaintiff cannot now object to this water-course being used as a receptacle for such drainage water, as well as a means of bringing this irrigation water to his own farm. The defendant has satisfied me by his evidence and by the evidence of other witnesses who have been called that this water which is led into this furrow was water which had been accustomed to flow there; all that he has done has been to improve his farm for cultivation, and the Court cannot allow the existence of a servitude to have the effect in operation of preventing the owner of the servient tenement from improving his farm in the ordinary way, and from cultivating it as a good farmer would do. Defendant appears to me to have done no more than that for the purpose of preventing the water from injuring his cultivated land. He had to make certain cross furrows, and the effect has been perhaps to bring the water in a body, but I do not believe that any larger quantity of water has been forced into the furrow than came down there before, nor am I satisfied that the silt, or mud and sand has been greater in consequence. Therefore, upon that part of the case which raises the question as to whether if a declaration is made by the Court, the defendant would be entitled to have that declaration modified upon that point, the opinion of the Court is entirely in favour of the defendant. In the same way, the opinion of the Court is in favour of the defendant upon the further question raised as to whether the plaintiff is entitled to a general declaration that he is entitled to take materials from the land of the defendant for the purpose of repairing and maintaining this furrow. I am not aware of any authority which gives the owner of a dominant tenement any such rights in respect of such acqueductus. All the authorities lay down clearly that where servitude has been created the owner of the dominant tenement has all those rights without which it is impossible for him to enjoy his servitude, and the illustrations given by the authorities show what is meant. The first illustration given is where a person has the right to take water from a well. It is understood that he has a right of way to the well. It follows, it is an absolute necessity that he cannot draw the water from the well without going to the well, and, therefore, he must have a road to the well. That is a kind of necessity which goes with the servitude. But it would be going quite beyond any authority or any decision of this Court to hold that the owner of the dominant tenement may take materials from the servient tenement for the purpose of enabling him to better enjoy his servitude. Take the case, a person having a right of road. It has never been held that he has the right to take the gravel from the land of the servient tenement for the purpose of repairing that road. He must get the gravel and soil as best he can; all he has the right to is that road, but he has no right to go to the land itself. There is no doubt in a case like this, where a watercourse is made, he may use the stuff taken out of the soil. Naturally he can do that, because the stuff which had been taken out of the ground must be put somewhere, and he may use it for the purpose of an embankment. No authority has been cited, and I certainly know of none by which the right is given to take materials from elsewhere, even in the immediate vicinity, for the purpose of improving, or maintaining, or repairing the watercourse to which the owner of the dominant tenement has the right. Before I leave this point, I may say I don't see there is any necessity for really making any declaration at all in the case. If a declaration has to be made, it will have to be made with certain modifications. If the defendant had made a claim in reconvention, and asked for a declaration, then the Court would have been in a position to frame such a declaration as will give the defendant his full rights. The Court cannot by merely modifying the form of declaration of rights asked for by the plaintiff give the defendant any declaration in respect of his rights, nor do I think there is any necessity for an interdict in this case, because it is not alleged that the defendant will again infringe the plaintiff's rights. On the contrary, as far as one can gather from the evidence in the present case, there is no such intention, and, therefore, the necessity for giving such intedict has not been proved. I come, therefore, now to the only question left for the consideration of the Court, and that is the question of damages. Upon this question of damages I am bound to say also that the plaintiff has greatly exaggerated his own rights. Just in the same way he has been wholly wrong in claiming too much from the defendant in regard to the declaration of rights, in the same way he has claimed excessive damages in the present case. There is no proof whatever that he has sustained anything approaching £1,000 damages, though he would lead the Court to believe that that is a very moderate estimate indeed. The defendant, in my opinion, has not been guilty of any very gross infringement of rights, but I think he has gone wrong, and has gone wrong chiefly in this respect: It was his duty before he altered the water-course and before he did anything by which the nature and substance of that water-course could be altered—it was his bounden duty to have given notice to the plaintiff of his intention to do so; and having made an alteration in the furrow and in the intake, it was his duty to restore the watercourse to the condition in which it was before he started his alterations. The watercourse was an old one; it had existed there for many years—something like 70 years—and certainly for 40 years it had been in existence, as it was just before the alterations. The trees had been allowed to grow, and the ground was hardened, and naturally the flow was in a certain way, and there was not much escape of water from an old-established furrow like this. The mistake defendant made was in removing the trees from the immediate neighbourhood, changing the watercourse, and then not taking sufficient pains so to harden the soil, either by the use of cement or stones or other matter, so as to make the watercourse as substantial as it had been before, and put it in a condition to allow as little water as possible to escape as had been accustomed to escape before. The effect of the loosening of the soil in that neighbourhood was undoubtedly to make it easier for the water to escape from this furrow than it had been before. The hard, old-established, trodden-down soil was altered altogether; it was loosened, trees taken out, roots removed, and there was left a loose soil there, through which any action of crabs or moles would have a much readier effect in allowing the water to escape than ever before. Then the defendant, I am satisfied, took advantage of the escaped water. I don't believe it is clearly proved that on any occasion that he deliberately led water out of this furrow, but he took advantage of it. There was then loose soil in consequence of this new aqueduct, this new watercourse, and here and there water escaped, and the defendant was not slow to take advantage of this escaping water for the purpose of watering his sweet potatoes, and other plants that required water. In that the defendant did wrong, and he must suffer for the consequence of his acts. I believe, however, that the damages are nothing approaching the amount which the plaintiff claims. I believe that with a moderate expenditure —with an expenditure of about £30, it would be quite possible for the plaintiff to make this dam, this intake and furrow as substantial, and as resistent to the escape of water as it ever had been before, and I think the sum of £20 will be ample compensation for any other damage he has sustained. The judgment of the Court will, therefore, be for the plaintiff for £50 damages, and as there has been no sufficient tender, but only a tender of £5, the judgment will carry costs.

Mr. Schreiner: Will you allow the plaintiff his witness's expenses?

De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose so.

Mr. Schreiner also applied for the cost of making the surveyor's plan.

The Chief Justice allowed £5 for the preparation of the plan.

The summons also set forth a claim for £75, as damages, but counsel did not ask for that sum.

Order granted as prayed.

MASTERTON V. BRAY AND TARRY.

Mr. Gardiner moved for judgment under rule 319 for the sum of £1,000, the purchase price of a certain house and land being lot 23, block A, situate on the Cape Flats, under conditions set out in a certain broker's note. By the said note it was, inter alia, provided that transfer should be taken on November 30, 1902, and further, that the said purchase price should be payable as to £250 on transfer, and the balance of £750 to be secured by bond if so required by the defendants. Plaintiff had tendered transfer, but the defendants failed to pay, and plaintiff now asked for judgment in the sum of £1,000 sterling, one defendant paying, the other to be absolved. Mr. De Waal applied for the rehabilitation of Coenraad Hendrik Loubser.

The estate was surrendered on the 30th May, 1898, and there was a deficiency of £918 14s. 2d. Insolvency was attributed to rinderpest. The Trustee's report was favourable.

There was nothing unfavourable in the Trustee's report.

Granted.

Mr. Buchanan made a similar application on behalf of Eliza Jane Hodson.

HERBERT V. HERBERT.

This was an action for the restitution of conjugal rights. The declaration stated that the plaintiff, Johanna J. Herbert, resided at Sea Point. The defendant was Ewald Herbert, formerly of Port Elizabeth, and was now at Johannesburg. The parties were married at Port Elizabeth on the 18th July, 1900, and shortly after the marriage the defendant deserted his wife, and had not since returned.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers for plaintiff; defendant in default.

Chas. William H. J. Smith produced a copy of the marriage certificate.

Applicant was called, and said she was married to the defendant at Port Elizabeth on 18th July, 1900, and she lived with him until 1st September, when she left, with his consent, to go to Bredesdorp to fetch some things. She was married out of community of property. She received a letter from her husband to say he had joined a corps. When she left him to go to Bredesdorp she did not know that he intended doing so. He was at that time in business, and at the time of their marriage he was in the Civil Service. During the war he went to Johannesburg, and during the year he sent her different sums amounting to £31 10s. She had often written to him to make a home for her.

Mr. De Villiers read a long letter which applicant said she had received from her husband at Johannesburg. In it he asked her to wait until the end of January, by which time he hoped to get a billet, and then he would be in a position to support her. If by that time he was unable to do so, then he would assist her to get a divorce "without unnecessary publicity or expense." Later on in the letter he remarked that if for any other causes she required a divorce he would not stand in her way, but he would not assist her to that end. He refused to see any relations she might send to him before the 31st prox. He would not write again until he could say he was in a position to support her, or that he had failed to get a better situation.

Applicant (continuing) said that on previous occasions her husband had promised to receive her back, but never did anything. She did not reply to the letter which had been read, and she got no further communication until the letter now produced. He did not do anything for her by January 31, when she issued a summons. On the 22nd April he wrote informing her that he contemplated leaving Johannesburg, and he had given instructions for a summons, if issued, to be served on his solicitor. He also asserted that he did not intend to pay any costs.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Have you got any copies of your letters to him?]

Witness: No. I said he must tell me once and for all whether he would support me.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Are you ready and willing to go back to him?]

Witness: Yes; I am willing if he will support me properly.

[De Villiers, C.J. (reading): "I now know from inquiries the real reason why you require a divorce." What does he mean by that?]

Witness: All I can make out is that his sisters seem to think I have another motive—that I want to get married again. There is nothing in that. The sisters are spiteful about me. They live down here.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is a pity you did not keep copies of your letters. It is very important that I should know what you wrote to him. You are quite sure you expressed willingness and a desire to go back to him.]

Witness: I am willing.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did you say so?]

Witness: I said I would go back if he would support me.

Mr. De Villiers: Have you heard that he had several billets in Johannesburg, and that he is very intemperate?

Witness: Yes. Shortly after my marriage. I had occasion to remonstrate with him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: If the defendant is willing to take you back, you must go and live with him.]

Witness: Certainly I will.

Mr. De Villiers said the applicant had entered into an antenuptial contract at Uitenhage, which settled upon her a life policy of £250.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That would fall to the ground should this application be granted.]

Mr. De Villiers: Yes, my lord.

De Villiers, C.J.: You may take a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, defendant to return to his wife on or before June 30, failing which you may take a rule calling upon him to show cause by the 20th of July why a decree of divorce should not be granted.

Ex parte BRISENDEN.

Mr. Buchanan applied for the confirmation of the sale of certain property. The applicant, he said, was one of the sons of the late Lewis Jas. Brisenden, and was joint proprietor with Leonard Stewart Brisenden of a piece of ground at Graham's Town. He was for some time in the Cape Police at Douglas, and was now temporarily employed by the Plague Board at Port Elizabeth. There was some doubt about the applicant being a minor, but his mother-in-law, who was his only guardian, concurred in the petition.

De Villiers, C.J., said that according to the birth certificate applicant was a minor, and the application should come before the Master to see if the sale was for the applicant's benefit.

Ex parte VAN HEERDEN

Mr. C. W. de Villiers applied for leave to transfer certain property. The applicant was executor testamentary in the estate of G. Maria van Heerden. In liquidating the estate a certain piece of ground with building thereon at Graaff-Reinet was bought for £1,010 by the applicant, and it was therefore necessary to approach the Court for authority to have the property registered in his name.

Application granted.

Ex parte NEETHLING.

Mr. Buchanan applied on behalf of the petitioner for leave to transfer certain property, bought for £775, at a public auction from an estate of which he is executor, on the 12th February. Affidavits were read to show that the price was a good one, and the sale in the interest of the minors.

Application granted.

Ex parte PFLUGSTERT.

Mr. Buchanan applied for an order authorising the cancellation of certain mortgage bonds. On the 18th February, 1898, the petitioner passed to and in favour of William Wilkinson, now in England, bonds for £665 on certain buildings in Faure-street, Cape Town. Applicant desired to sell the property specially hypothecated, as he was about to leave for Germany, and wished to arrange the matter before doing so. Wilkinson had sent his power of attorney, giving the necessary authority, but it had been necessary to return it to England. He (Mr. Buchanan) asked for authority to cancel the mortgage bond on the authority of the power of attorney.

De Villiers, C.J., thought the proper course would be to make an order that on the production of a certificate of receipt from the Master that he was in possession of the money, that the Registrar of Deeds be authorised to cancel the deed.

Ex parte COETZEE.

Mr. Joubert applied for leave to sell certain property. The petitioner was the only guardian of seven minors, who were possessed of property valued at £250. She asked for leave to sell the property, the present being a most favourable time for disposing of the property, and pay the money into the guardian's fund. The Master was entirely favourable.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court authorises the sale at a price, the minimum of which is to be fixed by the Master.

DYER v. DYER.

Mr. Buchanan, on behalf of the petitioner, Percy Dunsterville Dyer, moved for an order declaring the petitioner's brother, Stephen Dyer, now an inmate of the Valkenberg Asylum, to be of unsound mind, and appointing a curator of his person and property. Mr. C. W. de Villiers watched the case as curator ad litem.

Dr. Dods, medical superintendent of the Valkenberg Asylum, gave evidence to the effect that the defendant was admitted in August, 1899, and that he had been detained on an order of Mr. Justice Maasdorp, and had been under continual supervision. He was still of unsound mind, and was incapable of managing his person or his affairs.

Mr. Buchanan said he was instructed that the lunatic had certain property in the Transvaal. Counsel asked that the defendants' brother, the petitioner, who resided in the Transvaal, be appointed curator of his person and property.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers intimated that he was satisfied with the proposal to appoint Percy Dyer as curator. He had interviewed the lunatic, Stephen Dyer, and he was satisfied that he could not manage his own affairs.

Order granted, declaring defendant of unsound mind, and appointing Percy Dyer as the curator of his person and property.

BOZZETT V. BOZZETT.

Mr. Black moved, on behalf of the petitioner, for a decree of divorce from his wife, who resided at Poplar, England. Counsel stated that the petitioner had obtained a decree for the restitution of conjugal rights, and that notice had been served upon the respondent, who had been furnished with a passage to the Cape per the Union-Castle Steamship Co. Respondent refused to avail herself of this passage, and wrote to the petitioner: "You know as well as I do that I do not intend to use the ticket; as you are aware, as far as I am concerned, the case is at an end." The affidavit of Henry Macdonald stated that he was living with the defendant as her husband, not knowing that she was married.

Decree of divorce granted as prayed.

COWLEY V. COWLEY.

Mr. M. Bisset moved for a decree of divorce in default of respondent's failure to obey an order for the restitution of conjugal rights granted to Mrs. Cowley in the Circuit Court of Oudtshoorn on the 26th March.

Decree of divorce granted, plaintiff to have custody of the child of the marriage, and defendant to contribute to the maintenance of the said child until it attained the age of 16, at the rate of £2 10s. per month, and to pay costs of suit.

Ex parte BROSTER.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for the rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act, on the 17th April last, to be made absolute. Notice having been duly published.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte BEHUKE.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for the rule nisi granted under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Order granted as prayed.

BYRNE V. BYRNE.

Mr. Gardiner moved on behalf of the petitioner, who resides in England, for the appointment of a commission de bene esse to take her evidence for the purposes of a divorce suit which she had instituted against her husband, who resides at Wynberg, in the Cape Division, on the ground of his adultery in London, Port Elizabeth, and elsewhere, and also for the forfeiture of all benefits accruing to him by community of property. Petitioner stated that she had not sufficient means to come to the Cape in connection with the case.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte THE BUILDING SOCIETY OF THE SOUTHERN CROSS LODGE.

Mr. Gardiner moved for leave to make absolute a rule nisi for the winding up of the society, the appointment of a trustee, and the power to sell the immovable property of the said society, to be vested in the Southern Cross Lodge.

Order granted as prayed.

HADLEY V. CILLIERS.

This was a motion for leave to inspect certain registers in the recent election of Petrus Stephanus Cilliers as member of the House of Assembly for the Division of Prieska.

The petition of Robert George Hadley, now of Claremont, and formerly of Prieska, and a voter in the division of Prieska, set forth that he objected to the election of the respondent as M.L.A. for the division of Prieska, on the ground that he had held certain offices of profit under the Crown. Petitioner had deposited with the Registrar of the Supreme Court £300, being the amount required to cover costs, etc. Petitioner, said respondent, was deputy sheriff of Britstown, Messenger of the Court at Britstown, and a Field-cornet, which offices he was informed were subject to confirmation of or held under the Governor of the Cape of Good Hope. He prayed that the said election be declared null and void, and that the seat be declared vacant. In his letter to the Registrar of the Supreme Court, the petitioner intimated that he would also apply for an order authorising petitioner and his agent to obtain access to, and inspect the marked register in connection with the said election. He asked that his application should be supplementary to the previous one. Petitioner stated that his object was to ascertain how many disqualified persons recorded their votes in the election with a view of obtaining a recount, as he was given reason to believe that several voted who had been struck off the list for political offences.

Mr. Burton read the petition of the respondent's attorney, Paul de Villiers, in which application was made for the postponement of the motion until Thursday, the 21st inst. Mr. Burton added that, so far as inspecting the marked copies of the register was concerned, there appeared to be no necessity to apply for an order of Court, as, under the Ballot Act. No. 9 of 1882, any person might go and inspect and obtain copies of the marked register from the Colonial Secretary.

[De Villiers, C.J., said that there was clearly no necessity to proceed by motion.]

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for applicant; Mr. Burton for respondent.

Mr. Burton said that in the petition the names of certain persons were not substantially objected to. Petitioner said they were persons "concerning whom the petitioner has ascertained by inquiries," and then, again, "he has reason to believe."

De Villiers, C.J., said the petition of the applicant embodied no direct prayer that the respondent be unseated. He thought it should be amended by the inclusion of a prayer that the respondent be unseated on the grounds set forth.

Sir H. Juta said that he applied for leave to amend the petition accordingly.

De Villiers, C.J.: The Court will authorise the amendment of the supplementary petition, as asked for, and addition of other names, provided that reasonable notice of such additional names be given before the day of trial. The Court will fix the day of trial for the 11th June, security of £300 to be sufficient security for supplementary, as well as original petition, costs to be costs in the cause.

Attorney—Admission—Act 30 of 1892.

An attorney who had been enrolled in the late South African Republic applied to be admitted as an attorney of the Supreme Court. He, however, had not passed the examination prescribed by Sec. 1 (b) of Act 30 of 1892.

Held, that as the Governor had not and did not intend to exercise the power vested in him by the aforesaid Act the applicant was entitled to admission.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved, under section 2 of Act 30 of 1892 for the admission of the petitioner, who was formerly an attorney of the late South African Republic, as an attorney-at-law and notary public of this Court.

Mr. Gardiner, for the Incorporated Law Society, said that the section named provided for four qualifications before an attorney of the Transvaal could be admitted to this Court. In respect of three of these, the applicant fulfilled all requirements, but, as to the fourth, he had not complied with the stipulation laid down in the section, which stated that he must pass such an examination in the statute law of the Cape of Good Hope as the Governor may from time to time specify, and he must get a certificate to that effect from the Incorporated Law Society. Counsel added that a difficulty arose, inasmuch as the Governor had not specified any such examinations. He also observed that the petitioner applied for admission as a notary public.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers said he with drew the latter part of the application.

De Villiers, C. J., said he did not think the applicant could be deprived of his right to be admitted if it were clear that the Governor did not intend to authorise such an examination, but that was not clear yet. Until there was some authoritative statement that the Governor had no such intention, he thought he should assume that His Excellency did intend to authorise one. The case must be postponed, either to enable the Governor to authorise such an examination, or else an affidavit that he did not intend to authorise one.

Ex parte CARR BROS. AND ASH, LTD.

Mr. McGregor moved for leave to amend certain title deeds in accordance with a resolution of the company to change their name to Carr Bros. and Ash, Ltd., and to omit the name of Mr. Edmondson, formerly a managing director.

LE. ROUX V. ZEEMAN. { 1903. May 14th.

Slander—Justification.

Where justification is pleaded to an action for defamation charging the plaintiff to have committed a criminal offence the plea must fail unless the offence is clearly proved to have been committed by him.

This was an action for slander in which the plaintiff claimed £500 damages, with costs, for slander.

The plaintiff, in his declaration, said he was a farmer and a retired field-cornet of seven years' standing, residing at Grassendalen, in the division of Malmesbury, and the defendant was a farmer, residing at Uitkyk, in the said division. On or about the 15th September, 1902, and the 2nd October, 1902, the plaintiff gave evidence in a certain suit instituted in the Resident Magistrate's Court at Malmesbury by one Anna Jordaan, against the defendant, for damage caused by the defendant to the property of the said Jordaan. On or about the month of October, 1902, and at Siebritskloof, in the division of Malmesbury, in the presence and hearing of Jan Daniels, Abraham de Klerck and others, the defendant falsely and maliciously spoke and published on and concerning the plaintiff with reference to the evidence given by him as aforesaid the following defamatory words in the Dutch language: "Ik heb de papieren in myne zak, en ik gaat Bart le Roux opbreng voor valsch eed," which, being interpreted into English, are "I have the papers in my pocket, and I am going to put this Bart le Roux in gaol for having committed perjury," meaning thereby that the plaintiff had committed perjury. On or about the 7th October, 1902, and at Waterfall and Uitkyk, in the said division, in the presence and hearing of Albert Louw, Casparus Steyn, Johan Liebetrau, and others, the defendant also said in Dutch: "Gij Bart le Roux, het valsch gesiveer, en jou plek was al in die tronk, en alsdie judge nie gezit het nie, dan was gij al daar, en ik zal jou mon gaan aangeef en met you werk," which, being interpreted into English, meant: "You, Bart le Roux, have committed perjury, and you ought to have been in goal already, and if the judge had not been sitting then you would already have been there, and I will now go and charge you, and will work with you."

The defendant denied that he spoke the words falsely and maliciously, and that they were defamatory. He said the words were true in substance and in fact, and were spoken without malice and in the public interest.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Van Zyl) for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Close) for defendant.

Mr. Burton said it appeared the defendant's plea was one of justification. The plaintiff left the matter of damages on those words with the Court, and he would not lead any special evidence.

Sir Henry Juta said the case would not be unfamiliar to his lordship, after the case of Steyn. There was a furrow called Steyn's furrow, and at one portion Mr. Zeeman put down some zinc sheets in order to prevent the water that was coming from his and another person's sluits running into the furrow. According to his story, two of the zinc sheets were loosened by the rush of water, and he removed them, but the others were left. The result was that a quantity of water flowed on to Jordaan's property, and Jordaan brought an action against Zeeman for allowing the water to go on his ground. According to the plaintiff, the zinc sheets had been removed. Jordaan's complaint was that by the removal of the sheets the water came on his ground, and it became very material to ascertain whether the zinc sheets were there. Mr. Le Roux stated that he had gone specially for the purpose of examining the place, and in his evidence he swore there were no zinc sheets there, but on a subsequent occasion before the Court he modified that statement. The second point was that there was a break in the furrow at Steyn's, which caused the water to go on to Jordaan's property. The case of Zeeman was ...at there was also a large break before the furrow came on to his property. Le Roux swore there was only one break, and that was on Steyn's furrow.

Mr. Burton: Is that on the record?

Sir Henry Juta: No.

Mr. Burton: Oh!

Sir Henry Juta said Mr. Zeeman said Le Roux's statements were false, and there was no concealment about what he said.

Defendant was called, and proceeded to give evidence in support of counsel's statement.

Counsel were heard in argument as to whether defendant could lead evidence that the plaintiff said more than appeared on the record.

Sir Henry Juta pointed out that the statements which defendant alleged were falsely made by plaintiff, and which did not appear in the record, were contained in the document prepared for the Magistrate when defendant made application to have plaintiff committed for perjury. Plaintiff had given notice that he would avail himself of this document.

In giving judgment on the point, De Villiers, C. J., said: I think if the plaintiffs had excepted to the plea he would have had good ground of exception, because there is no specific statement as to the line of defence that would be taken; but seeing that no exception has been taken, I think the defendant ought to be allowed to give this evidence, more especially as the plaintiff had some notice as to the line of defence that was going to be taken.

Witness, continuing, said it was important in his case to show there had been a break, which caused damage apart from his interference with Steyn's furrow. Mr. Le Roux said, in regard to these two breaks, that it was only at the zinc that the water flowed over. Witness's attorney asked Le Roux what he would say if he took him up and showed him a second break only three yards away from the zinc. Le Roux said he had not seen it. In every case in which witness was concerned Le Roux was against him. At the time when Le Roux said he went up to look the two breaks were there. The breaks took place at the beginning of the winter. After the case, witness saw the Assistant Magistrate.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness had had a good deal of litigation in his time. In most of the cases in which he had been concerned, the witnesses on the other side had spoken falsely. In 1901, Mrs. Jordaan proceeded against witness for damages for witness having cut a furrow. She succeeded in that action. Witness then agreed to block up the furrow with zinc sheets. This was done to protect witness and the other parties. Witness blocked up the way through which the water had gone on to Jordaan's property with zinc sheets; he could not say how many sheets he used at that precise spot.

By the Court: One of the points upon which witness alleged plaintiff had spoken falsely was that he (plaintiff) said witness had taken all the sheets away. The other point was that he said there was not a break-away from witness's land.

Cross-examination continued: Witness put four sheets at the place, one and a half sheets below and two and a half across. The sheets across were to prevent the water washing back. Witness removed the sheets below Steyn's furrow. He, however, left about half a sheet below. He took these away, because they did not help to keep off the water; the others—the ones across—were just as useless. Witness could do nothing further. Le Roux must have seen the break between the zinc sheets and the junction of witness's and Losper's furrows. From that break the water would have to run into Steyn's furrow all the same.

Re-examined by Sir Henry Juta: The breach above caused the water to flow not only in Steyn's furrow, but over it as well. Hence the importance of having the fact established that there was this second breach.

Stephanus B. Walters, farmer and field-cornet, gave evidence corroborating that of the last witness in regard to the statements alleged to have been made in court by Le Roux. Witness saw the zinc sheets, which were old. Part of the sheets were below, and part across the furrow. The second breach in Losper's furrow was a big one, and caused the water to go across the furrow above the zinc. Witness saw the break the day before the trial. It was not a breach of a day or two; witness could not swear the breach was there a fortnight before.

Peter Daniel Zeeman, son of the defendant, gave similar evidence as to what Le Roux saw. The zinc sheets were there a long time before the case came on; more than a fortnight before. Two of the sheets had been washed away. Le Roux swore distinctly that all the sheets had been taken away. The break at Losper's occurred at the beginning of the winter, before the time Le Roux said he saw the place. It was about six yards from the zinc, and anyone standing at the zinc must have seen it.

Henry P. van Eyk, the attorney for Zeeman in the case with Jordaan, said he cross-examined Le Roux in the case. Witness asked him, "Were all the zinc sheets away?" and he replied, "Yes; all." Witness also questioned him with regard to the breaches. He said he went up specially to examine the place. In examination in chief, Le Roux said there was only one break, and witness pressed him upon the point, and he said he had not seen the second. Anyone standing at the zinc could not help seeing the other breach.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The only conclusion witness could come to was that Le Roux was trying to deliberately mislead the Court. He was very much surprised at Le Roux's evidence. A portion of the zinc sheets were still below.

Sir Henry Juta then closed his case.

Mr. Burton called,

Christopher John Sweeney, R.M., who stated that the case was heard before him. At the first hearing he did not think the question of the zinc across the furrow was raised.

Cross-examined: He could not remember what had transpired beyond what appeared on the record.

Bartholomeus Johanne le Roux, the plaintiff, a farmer, living in the Malmesbury division, and for a number of years field-cornet in the ward in which the parties resided, alleged that he was present when defendant agreed to close up the opening he had made in the furrow. This was in 1901. He was asked to inspect the damage, and then he noticed the spot where the zinc had been, and that it was gone. Some sheets of corrugated iron were still there. He did not see any other break. If he had been mistaken in anything he had not intentionally said anything that was not correct.

Cross-examined: He did not say before the Magistrate that there had only been one break. He was not asked to inspect the furrow—merely the damage.

Re-examined: When he made his examination his attention was not drawn to Steyn's furrow.

Mr. Burton then closed his case.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Will counsel please confine themselves to the question of damages?]

Mr. Burton: That is a question I must leave entirely to the Court.

Sir H. Juta: The Magistrate can state only what is on his record. He did not put down everything, and I therefore would ask that his evidence should be dismissed. The real point is—was Zeeman bound to make this furrow? and if so, by whose fault did the damage complained of happen; and when and where did it happn? The damage was caused by an overflow which took place on another man's property, but Le Roux's evidence gave the impression that there was only one break in the furrow and that that was on defendant's property. Now it is common enough for a man to swear that he has not seen a thing, but then the plaintiff does not merely say that he did not see this second break, but that he would have seen it if it had been there. In point of fact, the break was some six yards long, but Le Roux says he never saw it. Had it not been for Le Roux's conduct this action would never have been brought into Court, and how then can he come here and ask for damages? The statements he made before the Magistrate were clearly not correct; he has not produced a single witness to prove that his character has been injured in any way by the statements of the defendant, and that being so, he cannot be entitled to any damages whatever.

Mr. Burton was not called upon in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is common cause in the present case that on two occasions the defendant used defamatory language concerning plaintiff. On the first occasion the words used were: "I have the papers in my pocket, and I am going to charge Le Roux with perjury." On the second occasion the words used were: "You, Bart le Roux, have committed perjury, and you ought to have been in gaol already, and if the judge had not been sitting then you would already have been there, and I will now go and charge you." These words are admitted to have been used, and the defence is that they are true in substance and in fact and were spoken in the public interest and without malice. The plea is in effect a plea of justification, and such a plea must fail unless the offence charged is clearly proved to have been committed. There can be no evidence which has been given in justification no jury in the world would convict plaintiff of perjury. The two points on which he is alleged to have sworn falsely are, firstly, in regard to the zinc plates, and, secondly, as to the breakage. As to the zinc plates it is clear that the point upon which the examination took place was entirely in regard to the plates which prevented the water from rushing over to Jordaan's place. The plaintiff in his evidence stated that the zinc plates had been removed. Now, clearly, the plates to which he referred could only be the plates which helped to keep out the water. The bent plates would do very little, if anything at all, towards it, and the substantial point was whether the plates which kept back the water had been removed or not. It is clear that plaintiff would have confined his attention to that point, and if the question were asked: "Were all the zinc plates removed?" he might have answered "Yes" in good faith, and if we were satisfied that all the plates had not been removed I should not hold that he had been guilty of perjury. But I am not satisfied that these words were used. If the Magistrate had attached any importance to these words he would have taken them down, but they are not on the record. Then comes the important fact that before the case was finally decided the plaintiff had again an opportunity of giving evidence. When the merits of the case came to be inquired into, then the plaintiff was examined more in detail, and in his evidence he was asked whether the plates across the furrow were there, and he said "Yes." Clearly, therefore, the defendant ought to have seen that on the question of the zinc plates there was no desire on the part of the plaintiff to give false evidence against him. Before the Magistrate gave his verdict the plaintiff gave the Magistrate to understand that the plates were still across the furrow, so no possible injury was done to the defendant. I believe what he said was: "I did not see the breakage in the furrow." It seems to me extremely possible that he did not see it. His first object was to inspect the damage done to the vineyard, and he would not therefore examine above the furrow. His attention would be called to the place, and he would see that the plates had been removed, and he would not attach importance to a point which the parties themselves had not attached any imporance to up to then. Even in the evidence of the other witnesses no stress at all was laid on the point of this breakage. The proof is wholly insufficient to show that the plaintiff has been guilty of perjury. If the defendant had withdrawn the charge before action the Court would not have awarded more than nominal damages, but he has persisted in the charge, and the damages awarded must be substantial. The judgment of the Court will be for the plaintiff, for £500 damages, with costs.

Kotze, J., concurred.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and a Jury.]

LEVIN v. COCHRANE AND CHERRY. 1903. May 14th.

This was an action brought by Benjamin Levin, merchant, of Cape Town, against Cochrane and Cherry, building contractors, for breach of contract, and for the recovery of £1,250, being the half amount of profit realised on certain property on which the plaintiff claimed an option.

The plaintiff's declaration set forth that he was a merchant, carrying on business at Cape Town, and the defendants, builders and contractors, carrying on a partnership at the same place. About April, 1902, plaintiff entered into an agreement which was embodied in writing, whereby it was provided, inter alia, that plaintiff should have, during a period of twelve months, the right to purchase certain immovable property belonging to defendants in Roeland-street for the sum of £6,000, and whereby it was further provided that should the defendants, with the consent of plaintiff, sell the property to any other person, plaintiff should be entitled to receive one half of the price realised in excess of £6,000, which consent plaintiff should not be entitled to withhold if a price of £7,000 should be obtained. Defendants had since sold the property for £8,500, and plaintiff claimed the sum of £1,250. Defendants were further indebted to plaintiff in the sum of £131 5s. 11d., being the balance of an account. The plaintiff asked for (a) judgment for the sums of £1,250 and £131 5s. 11d. respectively; (b) interest a tempore morae; (c) alternative relief; and (d) costs of suit.

The defendants, in their plea, admitted entering into an agreement with the plaintiff relative to their property in Roeland-street on the 8th April, 1902. On the 5th April the defendants wanted money, and the plaintiff offered to become security to the African Banking Corporation for £500, the defendants to pay him £50 commission. The plaintiff subsequently offered to become security to the bank for £1,000 for the period of one year, instead of the £500 originally agreed on. The defendants accepted the offer, and it was agreed that the plaintiff should have a written agreement embodying the terms as to the sale of the Roeland-street property. The agreement was drawn up by the plaintiff's solicitors on April 8. The plaintiff did not enter into the agreement with the bank, which he had promised and undertaken to do, but merely signed a letter of guarantee to the bank for the sum of £1,000, to be withdrawn at any time on notice to the bank. On the 15th April he withdrew the guarantee, and refused to be bound by it, or in any manner to the defendants. On the 17th April the bank intimated to them that they could have no further facilities, and the defendants claimed that they were put to serious loss and inconvenience. They claimed that the plaintiff was not entitled to any benefit in respect of the provisions of the agreement of April 8. An alternative plea was put that by reason of the plaintiff's failure to keep the agreement, he could not sue on his option on the property in Roeland-street. The claim in reconvention claimed that the agreement of 8th April be declared null and void.

The replication denied that the security was to extend for a year. The plaintiff admitted that he withdrew the guarantee by notice on the 15th April, but, thereafter, as a matter of grace, renewed the guarantee until the month of May, 1902. He admitted signing a letter of guarantee to the bank for £1,000 to be withdrawn at any time on notice. He had no knowledge that the bank withdrew the banking facilities from the defendants on 17th April, or of their serious loss and inconvenience thereby. He admitted the allegation in defendant's plea with reference to the £131 5s. 11d., but claimed that the tender was wholly insufficient.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Russell) for plaintiff; Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington) for defendants.

Mr. Benjamin called the plaintiff. He stated that on the 5th April, 1902, the defendant's asked him to guarantee them for £500, and stated that they would be able to pay the £500 and their overdraft by the 15th of the month. Witness signed a further guarantee for £1,000 at the bank, but there was no specific time, the understanding being that, when £1,000 or more was due, the defendants would pay that amount. A rough agreement was drawn up, and the original agreement was drawn up with the defendants on the 8th April, 1902. On the 16th April he made certain inquiries at the bank, and as a result of certain information he instructed the manager of the bank to close the account so far as he was concerned. Subsequently, he saw either Cherry or Cochrane, and told one of them to pay the overdraft, and the reply was that they had been disappointed. Cherry said if he would wait a few days the bank would get the money.

He further said that he would give the bank an order on the Harbour Works at Mossel Bay to cover the overdraft. The defendants were contractors for the Harbour Board, and the order was for the bank to receive the money due to the defendants. In addition there was a bill from Black for £400. Witness had tried unsuccessfully to sell the property in Roeland-street for £6,500, and the defendants also put up the property again in May, but only something under £6,000 was offered. Towards the latter end of May one of the defendants—he believed it was Cherry—asked him to give him a cheque in return for a crossed one for £60, which the defendant asked witness to hold over. On the 4th June the cheque was returned by the bank marked "N.S.F." When he interviewed the bank manager he instructed him not to let the defendants draw any more on his guarantee. On June 10 a deed of inspection was drawn up by the defendants' creditors, and a Mr. Mouat was given the same power as the defendants in their business. Witness received a letter from Mr. Mouat in December, 1902, stating that the property in Roeland-street had been disposed of for £8,500, and that it was expected the various jobs would be completed by January, and that there would be about £4,000 available for creditors after the bond of £2,750 had been paid. On the 17th December, witness wrote to the defendants pointing out that he had an option on the property until 8th April, 1903, and informing them that he would expect his share of the profits. They replied, saying that the plaintiff had withdrawn his guarantee, and, therefore, there would be no reason to consult him in the matter of their property. Witness then applied for an interdict restraining the defendants from dealing with the property until he could institute an action.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: His memory was fairly good as to what transpired at the time. He would be surprised to know that the letter which he said Cherry had shown him was not in existence. He did not give notice to the defendants before he withdrew his guarantee. He received his £50 commission for the £500, but it was not true that he suggested to let them have £1,000. The first guarantee of £500 was simply increased to £1,000. The defendants expected their money probably about the middle of the month, and witness thought he was justified in going to the bank on the 15th of the month without giving the defendants the slightest notice. He never mentioned to Mr. Mouat anything about the option on the Roeland-street property. When Mr. Mouat was instructed to draw up a rough statement of the assets, witness did not write to him about the most important asset, viz., the property in Roeland-street.

Re-examined by Mr. Benjamin: The guarantee was definitely fixed for April 15. He had nothing to do with the deed of inspection. He concluded that all the papers, including his option, had been handed over to Mr. Mouat.

For the defence, Mr. Searle called

John Edwin Cherry, partner in the firm of Cochrane and Cherry, building contractors, carrying on business in Cape Town, who stated that in April, 1902, he had two big jobs on, one at Mossel Bay and the other at the reservoir works at Newlands. On 5th April he wanted about £900 to pay his workmen, and saw the plaintiff. He never received any letter from the bank calling up his overdraft. He had had a verbal communication from the manager of the bank with reference to the matter. The £500 received from plaintiff, for which they gave him £50, was to be paid before the 5th May. When that was done the plaintiff suggested making the guarantee £1,000 for 12 months, on the understanding that the defendants would give him an option on the Roeland-street property at £6,000. It was further agreed that should the property be sold by either party for anything over £6,000 the profits would be divided. A rough agreement was drawn up that day, and the following Tuesday defendants and plaintiff went to Mr. Moore's office and signed the agreement. Witness would not have given him such an option if the plaintiff could call up the money at any time. When witness received the letter from the bank he asked the plaintiff what he meant, and he replied that he had been thinking over the matter and had really given no guarantee to the bank, as the defendants' creditors might be down on them at any moment.

Robert Cochrane, a partner in the defendant firm, gave corroborative evidence.

Cross examined by Mr. Benjamin: He placed a reserve on the property of £8,000, and after the defendants had received £500 the second £500 was accepted as a matter of convenience. At the time they entered into the agreement witness valued the property at £7,000, and according to that calculation the plaintiff was to receive £500 for the guarantee of £1,000 for a year, although the defendants were not pressed for the extra money at the time.

Maasdorp, J., in summing up, said the jury would have to consider from the evidence whether the agreement with regard to the £1,000 was for twelve months, or, as the plaintiff put it, for no specific time. The plaintiff said that he gave the defendants the first £500 for a few days, but the defendants said for one month. Did they think the agreement was likely to be entered into for a few days or for a month? Would the bank not have told the plaintiff to fix the time of the guarantee of the defendants' overdraft? If the defendants were so badly pressed to what extent would a few days have assisted them? The defendant was asked if he had signed any contract, and he said he must have done so, and when he was unable to produce it he replied that it must have been destroyed. The defendants' proposal was given as a fixed one for twelve months, and the plaintiff's a vague one till about the middle of April. The question was whether men of business would not fix a definite time when such assistance would come to an end. The jury would have to rely largely on the evidence in the case, and they would notice that the defendants said that when their facilities at the bank were stopped they immediately saw the plaintiff, who denied any such interview. When the trustee took over the affairs there was no evidence that the plaintiff drew attention to his option on the property in Roeland street. If they believed that the first £500 was guaranteed for a month, was it likely that the other contract would be entered into for 10 days?

The jury found a verdict for the defendants, who are to pay costs in the action up till the 14th February, the plaintiff to pay all subsequent costs and those of the interdict.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D., the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP, and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

FORD v. FORD. { 1903. May 15th.

This was an action for divorce brought by Ada Ford, dressmaker, Cape Town, against her husband, Arthur Francis Ford, also of Cape Town, on the ground of his adultery. Petitioner also asked for custody of the minor child of the marriage, and for an order against the defendant to contribute £5 a month towards its maintenance. Mr. Upington appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Rainsford appeared for the defendant on the question of the custody of the child and of maintenance.

Plaintiff said she was married to her husband, on the 15th August, 1896, at S. Luke's Church, in the county of London. There was one child of the marriage, Winifred, aged 6 years. In January, 1899, they came to this colony, and her husband took up a position in Cape Town, which he had since continued to fill. After a while there were constant disagreements between them. He accused her of undue familiarity; even if she looked at anyone he said there was something between them. He always mistrusted her. In February, 1902, she returned to her parents in London in consequence of these disagreements. Her parents looked after the child. She came back to the Cape in February of the present year, and she inquired for her husband. She saw Mrs. Burton, of 20, Union-street, and in consequence of information she received, she instituted this action. When she left her husband he was earning £6 10s. a week. When she was in England he sent no money to her. She applied for custody of the child, and £5 towards maintenance.

Cross-examined by Mr. Rainsford: She was employed as a dressmaker, and earned £8 10s. a month. She had had to put out the child to nurse on account of her business.

Susie Brown, a Cape girl, said she had been in the employ of Mrs. Burton in October, November, and December last. She knew Mr. Ford, and she identified him in court. She used to take coffee to the rooms of the boarders in the morning. Ford was a boarder. On one occasion Ford seized her when she went in, and familiarity took place. The acts were repeated on subsequent occasions.

Mrs. Burton, of 20, Union-street, also gave evidence as to having taxed the defendant with misconduct with the girl. Witness insulted him at the table, and ordered him to quit the house. Defendant did not deny the accusation.

Mr. Rainsford said defendant's proposal was to send the child to a convent school at Wynberg, and he was willing to support her. The mother was at present unable to look after the child. Defendant also asked for reasonable access to the child.

A decree of divorce was granted, with costs, plaintiff to have custody of the child, but the defendant to have access at all reasonable times. Defendant to pay plaintiff the sum of £4 a month for the maintenance of the child until she shall reach the age of 16 years, with leave to the plaintiff to apply again for an increase, and with leave to the defendant to apply to the Court in case the plaintiff shall not attend properly to the child.

SOUTH AFRICAN MINERAL WATER CO. V. CAMP'S BAY TRAMWAY CO. { 1903. May 15th. June 16th.

Master and servant—Negligence of servant.

In an action brought by the owner of a horse for an injury done to it by the negligence of the defendant's servant in the course of his employment, it appeared that the servant was paid weekly by E., but that E. did so as a matter of convenience and as agent for the defendant.

Held, that the defendant was liable.

This was an action for damages, the plaintiffs claiming £50 from the defendants for the loss of a horse by a collision in Kloof-road, Cape Town, on the 9th October last, owing, it was alleged, to the careless and negligent driving of the defendants' servant.

The declaration set out that in October last a certain cart and two horses, under custody and control of a servant of the defendant company, acting within the scope of his employ, collided with a wagon and two horses belonging to the plaintiff company, owing to the negligent and careless driving of the said servant. In consequence of the collision, one of the plaintiffs' horses was killed, and damages were sustained in the sum of £50, being the value of the said horse. The defendant company neglected and refused to pay such sum or any portion thereof.

The plea of the defendant company admitted the fact of the collision, and that, in consequence of such collision, plaintiffs' horse had to be killed, but they denied that the said cart and horses were under the control of a servant acting under their authority. They denied that the driver was their servant, or that the collision was caused by the careless and negligent driving of such driver, and said that it was caused by the careless and negligent driving of the plaintiffs' servant. The defendants, therefore, prayed that the claim be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Gardiner for plaintiffs; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Rainsford), for defendants.

Charles Eade, contractor, said he had stables and let out horses. He had let out horses to the Camp's Bay Tramways Company. He was not in the habit of doing so. He had let them have horses on the occasion in question. He was to be paid so much per day for the horses. The Tramways Company provided both the cart and driver. The horses in the colliding vehicle were his. The driver was a Kafir boy named Johannes, who was to be paid through witness. Witness was to have a refund from the Tramways Company at the end of the month. He had no control over the boy at all. One horse belonging to witness was also killed in the collision.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: His predecessor was Mr. Makin. He had entered into the business about three weeks or a month before the accident occurred. He denied that he engaged the driver. The foreman of the road (Mr. Dyer) sent the boy to him. He charged the Tramways Company with the pay of his boys. In this case he supposed that if the company were not liable he should be. He did not engage a single driver during the month of September or October, nor did he dismiss one.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He was paid 8s. per horse per day. He fed the horses. He had no say in the matter of who should be the driver. There was no written agreement with regard to the driver. He kept baiting stables at the time of the occurrence.

Louis Simon, driver in the employ of the plaintiff company, spoke to the collision in October last in front of Mr. Marley's shop in Kloof-road. The plaintiff's wagon was at a standstill on the left side of the road close to the kerb. He was standing near to the wagon, and two boys were taking bottles into the shop. He saw two runaways coming down the road with a Scotch cart and without driver. They were in the middle of the road. The cart was loaded. The runaways turned and ran into his horses. One of his horses was killed and one of the runaways was also killed. There was a traction engine on the other side of the road. The horses were killed by the disselbooms of the respective vehicles. After the accident a coloured man, the driver, came up.

Cross-examined: His horses had their heads towards the top of the Kloof. He could see straight up the road for a long way, equal to the distance from the court to Cartwright's corner. He was attending to the bottles on the stoep. If he had been in the cart he should have got killed as well. The whole thing only occupied about a second. He did not have a chance to avert the accident.

Sir H. Juta (to witness): What could have prevented you from going behind the engine?

No answer.

Re-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He could not have taken his horses across the road to escape the oncoming horses.

Edward McGrath, engine-driver, said he was driving a steam roller for the Tramways Company in Kloof-road when the accident occurred. He saw the runaways from his engine on the right. He stopped the roller as soon as he saw the runaways; it was in a line to the shop and the plaintiff's wagon. He did not think that if the driver had been on the plaintiffs' wagon he could have got the horses out of the way. When the runaways got close up they swerved and collided with the plaintiffs' horses; he fancied they were scared by the engine. He thought if the runaways had not swerved they would have cleared both the plaintiff's horses and the engine.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He did not think sufficient warning was given of the approach of the runaways to enable the plaintiff's driver to move behind the engine.

George Charles Marley, general dealer, Kloof-road, also gave evidence. He thought that the runaways would have cleared had it not been for the presence of the engine in the road. He did not consider plaintiffs' driver had sufficient warning to move to the other side of the road.

Sir H. Juta: But, supposing you had been in the cart, what would you have done?

Witness: If I had been in the cart I don't know what I should have done. If I had tried to cross the road both my horses might have been killed. Under the circumstances, I think I should have stopped on the cart and seen what developed.

Harry Evans, one of the plaintiffs, said he valued the horse that was killed at about £40.

For the defence,

James Allan Barkly said that he had charge of the construction work for the defendant on the Kloof-road. He had an arrangement with Eade for the supply of horses. Mr. Eade also supplied the drivers. It was not true that the defendant company kept any reserve supply of drivers for Eade. They hired many carts and horses and drivers from Eade. They agreed to pay 22s. per day for team, harness, and drivers. The drivers, as far as he knew, were paid by Eade. The defendant company simply paid the accounts sent in by Eade.

De Villiers, C.J., said he noticed from the accounts sent in by Eade that the wages of the boys were charged for.

Witness, further examined, said he had nothing to do with the hiring or the dismissal of the boys. That arrangement was in force in October. The defendant company's own drivers were busy with their own carts.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The arrangement was made before witness or Mr Eade had any interest in the matter. Mr. Dyer was witness's assistant. The arrangement entered into between Mr. Wilson (witness's predecessor) and Mr. Eade's predecessor continued afterwards. He identified notes produced as being in the handwriting of Mr. Dyer, one of which read: "Kindly give the horses to driver I am sending you." His assistant had to do with the engaging and dismissing of boys.

Shapiro Cherewitz, construction overseer for the Camp's Bay Tram Co. on the work referred to. said he used some carts of his own and others he got from Eade. He had nothing to do with the drivers.

Sir Henry Juta said he had several times sent for Mr. Dyer to Fish Hoek, but he had not arrived, and as he was the most important witness in the case, and was the only one who could give the information about the carts and drivers, he must ask for a postponement.

[De Viiers, C.J.: Has he been subpœnaed?]

Sir Hy. Juta: No, my lord. Being in the company's employ, one took it for granted he would be here.

Mr. Gardiner said the case had already stood over one term, and the witness should have been subpœnaed. The amount involved being so small, it seemed a pity that costs should be piled up by a postponement. He asked for costs of the postponed.

De Villiers, C.J., commented on the fact that in postponing the case, owing to defendants' neglect to subpœna their witness, it could not be heard for another month on account of the mass of cases on hand. The Court was quite prepared to proceed with the case, and had adjourned other cases in order to do so. He quite saw the witness was a very important one, and, seeing the amount was not much, and the defendant company were not likely to suffer very much inconvenience, the case would be postponed, although he was afraid they could not hear it before the 16th June, costs occasioned by the postponement to be paid by the defendants.

Mr. Gardiner: Only I suppose for the production of Dyer.

De Villiers, C.J.: Yes. I think if the driver can be found he should be produced as well.

Postea (June 16th):

John C. Dyer, called by Sir H. Juta, said that in October last year he was in the employ of the Camp's Bay Tramways Co. as engineer in charge of construction, but he was not now in their employ. The man Eadie, who supplied horses to the company on the day in question, was successor to one Makin. Makin used to buy mules for the company, but he did not buy horses and carts. The arrangement was that inasmuch as they could not get drivers at Camp's Bay for their mules, Makin should supply drivers in town, and the mules should be sent to town. Eadie took over from Makin, and he was aware that he was taking over on the same terms as Makin. Witness did not engage any of the drivers for the carts. He remembered having sent a letter to Eadie in these terms: "I will take your horses at the price arranged, 16s. per day; kindly give them to the driver we are now sending you, and send them off with the cart at once. This was one of the drivers in the employ of the company, and witness sent him down to Eadie to bring the horses back, as they wanted a water cart at once. He remembered the accident in October last. He remembered the driver of the remaining horses. He was not the driver whom witness had sent to Mr. Eadie. He had nothing whatever to do with the engagement of the driver in question or his dismissal. The driver of the runaways continued at work for a couple of days after the accident. If he had wanted any driver to be dismissed, he should have sent him to Eadie.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: Witness was anxious to have the time of the drivers from Eadie in order to pay according to the amount of work done. The defendant company supplied the cart that was involved in the accident. Witness did not dismiss the driver. He had no knowledge personally of the accident.

Re-examined by Sir Henry Juta: He never treated the drivers as belonging to the company.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He had no notice of the last trial, and was not subpœnaed for that occasion. Eadie engaged and discharged "boys."

By Maasdorp, J.: The driver remained at the works for a couple of days after the accident, and then disappeared.

Mr. Gardiner intimated that the driver was present, and might be called by his learned friend.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Very well, if he is here, the Court might call him, and let both counsel cross-examine him.]

Johannes, the native driver, was then examined by the Chief Justice, and stated that at the time of the accident he had planks on the wagon, and was going up an incline. He inclined the load to the side as, had he driven straight, the wagon would have come back. He was urging the horses along, when the planks struck the animals on the back, and they got fractious, and the load fell off. Mr. Dyer engaged him as driver. Witness also fell off the wagon.

In reply to Sir Henry Juta, witness said he was engaged at the Camp at Camp's Bay. He had not been engaged previously by anyone else. Mr. Dyer gave him a paper to go to Mr. Eadie. Mr. Dyer sent him along in one of Mr. Eadie's carts, and Mr. Eadie said that next morning he was to have a horse and cart. He fell off the cart when the horses ran away. He did not put the planks on the cart. He did not drive after the day of the accident. Mr. Dyer told him to go away. He denied having told Mr. Dyer, in the presence of witnesses, that he was engaged by "Baas Charlie," meaning Mr. Eadie.

This concluded the evidence.

Mr. Gardiner: In this case two points have to be considered—(1) in whose control was the driver at the time of this accident, (2) was he guilty of negligence. As to the first point, there is a conflict of evidence bttween Dyer and Eadie. It may easily have escaped Dyer's memory that he engaged these drivers. Eadie's evidence is supported by that of the driver, and that evidence shows that Dyer engaged, dismissed, and paid the drivers. As to the second point, defendant's Scotch cart was left unattended and ran down the road into our waggon. Then the fact that the planks were not properly secured on this cart contributed to the accident. They were loaded up by the company's servants, and it was their duty to see that the cart was properly loaded. There was no contributory negligence on our part. Our driver could not possibly have got out of the way. As to damages, we claimed £50, but as the evidence shows that the value of the horses was only £40 I only ask judgment for that sum.

Sir H. Juta, K.C.: The plaintiff has to prove (1) that the driver of the cart was our servant and (2) that he was guilty of negligence. As to the evidence Eadie has a great interest in this case, while Dyer has no interest whatever, as he is not now in the employ of the Tramway Company. At the last moment Eadie produces the driver of the cart. If he was in our employ, why did we not pay him and enter his wages on our pay sheets? Neither the manager nor any of the officials of the Tramway Company ever considered that these drivers were in the Company's employ. It is most improbable that Eadie (a livery stable keeper) should have trusted his horses to be driven by the first Kafir Dyer liked to send. I would submit that the onus is on the plaintiff, and that he has not discharged it. Then again, there is no proof of our negligence. Planks put on a cart will often slip, no matter how carefully they may be packed. These did slip, they hit the back of the horse, and then he naturally became restive. If the driver was not under our control, we are not liable. It is hardly necessary to cite authority for this but see Jones v. The Mayor, Aldermen, etc., of Liverpool (14 Q.B. D., 890).

Mr. Gardiner was not heard in reply.

De Villiers, C.J.: There is no doubt in this case that a serious accident happened to the plaintiff's horse in October last. The accident was caused by two runaway horses coming down Kloof-road with a Scotch cart and striking one of the plaintiff's horses. In the course of the examination no attempt was made to prove that there was contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff's driver had not taken sufficient trouble and care to avoid an accident. Defendant's counsel in the course of his address said much on the subject of contributory negligence. Therefore I say no more on this subject than that there is no evidence whatever of contributory negligence. It appears to me that the plaintiff's driver did everything that a skilful driver could have done to avoid an accident, he was standing still there, and the best course under the circumstances was to remain standing still. If he had moved, as it was suggested he should have done, probably instead of one horse being killed two might have been killed. Now the question arises, who is responsible? Prima facie it would be the person who employed the driver, because the horses were without a driver, and the driver ought to have been on the cart to manage the horses. The plaintiff says that the driver had been appointed by the defendant. The defendant says that the driver had been appointed by Eadie, to whom the horses belonged. Eadie has been called, and he is positive, he gives his evidence with great certainty that the agreement was that the drivers should be appointed by the company, and that for the sake of convenience he was to pay them because the drivers would come to the stable with the horses and take them out of the carts. He paid them there as a matter of convenience. On the other hand, Mr. Dyer has been called, and he says he did not engage the driver in the present case, the man Johannes. In matters of this kind, where there is a conflict of evidence, it is always of importance to consider the terms of any documents that may be produced in the course of the trial, and certainly all the documents that have been produced in the present case are more favourable to the plaintiff's version that the driver had been engaged by the company than to the defendant's version that the driver had been engaged by Eadie. There is the letter of August 2, in which Dyer writes: "I will take your horses as per arrangement, kindly give them to the driver I am sending you, and send him off with the cart at once." Well, Mr. Dyer says this was a special occasion, but still it is strange that on this side of the case there should be writing to support the plaintiff's version. Then there is another letter, which was written by Mr. Dyer to Eadie's predecessor. It is dated the 7th June. He gives the time of the drivers, and says: "Please see them paid for this time only." Now, it is strange that Dyer should be so particular about their being paid for that particular time only if the arrangement were that which he contends for. It would matter very little to him what Eadie paid to the drivers, because he was liable only for the time during which these people were actually employed. As to that, he kept the time, and he could not be held liable for more, but if he had engaged the drivers, it was a matter of importance to him that they should not be paid more than they were entitled to, because Eadie would be entitled to recover back from him everything that had been paid. Then, if there was any doubt on the subject, all doubt is removed by the evidence of the driver himself, who has since been discovered. It is suggested that he is not speaking the truth, because he gave his evidence in his own native tongue. But we see that often, that Dutch, as well as native witnesses, prefer to give their evidence in their own language, even if they can speak English. The witness does not speak English fluently. The driver is positive that he was engaged by Dyer. I do not wish to say that Mr. Dyer intentionally swore what is false; he may have forgotten the incident, but I am perfectly satisfied that he is the man who engaged Johannes, the driver. Under these circumstances, I am of opinion that the defendant should be held liable. It is said that according to Johannes' own evidence there is not proof of negligence. I am quite satisfied, however, that there has been negligence, because, according to his evidence, the negligence consisted in the cart not being properly loaded; it was loaded in such a way that the planks that were on the cart struck the horses, and caused them to run away, and this loading was done by one of the company's servants, an Italian. This defence of want of negligence really never was raised in the plea and during the course of the trial. Now it appears that Mr. Dyer did see Johannes after the accident, and spoke to him about the matter. If the company had then satisfied themselves that there was no negligence on the part of the driver, they should, and would, have raised that point in the pleadings or in the course of the trial, but it was taken for granted throughout the trial that there was no negligence. The value of the horse is set down at £40, and for that amount judgment will be given for the plaintiff, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C. K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

THOMAS V. THOMAS. { 1903. May 18th

This was an action for the restitution of conjugal rights, and, failing compliance, for a decree of divorce on the ground of defendant's malicious desertion. The plaintiff was Mrs. A. Thomas, of Woodstock.

Mr. Alexander appeared for the plaintiff, and the defendant was unrepresented.

Plaintiff stated that she did not know her husband's address. They were married at Bloemfontein in 1884. There was one child born of the marriage, but it only lived 14 days. In 1886 they removed to Kimberley, where they lived together until 1888, when her husband left Kimberley, and she had not since heard from him. Witness remained in Kimberley until two years ago, when she came to Cape Town. She was now supporting herself by dressmaking.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Her husband was a printer. When he left Kimberley he said he would seek work in Johannesburg. She did not know where he had gone. She did not even know whether he was alive.

Mr. Alexander said that they had attempted service in Cape Town, but had been unable to trace the defendant. Counsel, replying to the Chief Justice, said the parties were married in community, but no order was asked as to property Decree of restitution granted, with costs, the defendant to return or receive the plaintiff on or before 30th June, failing compliance a rule being given calling on the defendant to show cause on the 12th July why a decree of divorce should not be granted to the plaintiff with costs.

CONSTABLE V. CONSTABLE.

The plaintiff, who resides in Cape Town, sued her husband, who is believed to be residing in Johannesburg, by edictal citation, for restitution of conjugal rights, and, failing compliance, for a decree of divorce on the ground of malicious desertion. Mr. Benjamin appeared for the plaintiff, and the defendant was unrepresented.

Charles Wm. Henry Smith, clerk of marriage records, Colonial Office, gave evidence as to the marriage of the parties to the suit at Fraserburg in April, 1884.

The defendant, Susannah Wilhelmina Constable, said they were married by ante-nuptial contract. Defendant had no occupation. They left Fraserburg on the day of the marriage, and they continued to travel. Defendant was a blacksmith, and travelled with her parents. Subsequently she returned to Richmond. He had been charged with a crime at Britstown. He afterwards returned to her at Richmond, but he then left after staying a day. He came to her again in August, 1886. She had not since seen or heard from him. Her latest information in regard to him was that he was at Johannesburg. They did not live unhappily together. At the time of the marriage, he gave her a promissory note of £3,000, but she had received nothing. He said he had an interest in a business in England.

By De Villiers, C.J.: It was about seven years since she had heard anything as to defendant's whereabouts. She had received a paper from Johannsburg, in which it was stated that a man named Constable was living with another woman.

Decree of restitution granted with costs, defendant to receive or return to the plaintiff on or before June 30, a rule being granted calling on defendant to show cause on the 12th July why a decree of divorce should not be granted to the plaintiff with costs, rule to be served personally, failing which publication as directed in regard to previous service

MALCOMNESS V. CHETTY.

This was an action brought by Malcomess and Co., carrying on business at Cathcart, against the defendants, two brothers, who carry on business in Cape Town, to recover £393 15s. 10d., less £75 16s. paid on account, leaving a net amount due of £317 19s. 10d., with interest, a tempore morae, and costs.

The case arose out of a transaction in potatoes The plaintiffs stated that they sold to defendants 500 bags of potatoes at 15s. 9d. per hundred lb., delivered on trucks at Cathcart Station. The defendants, in their plea, stated that on the 21st June they entered into a contract with Messrs. Bergh and Co., as agents for the plaintiffs, for the delivery of the said potatoes. They were to be good, sound table potatoes, and the first consignment was to be delivered on the 25th June, and the remainder on the 27th June. On or about the 1st July the defendants received the first consignment, and in consideration of what had happened the plaintiffs agreed to reduce the price to 16s 6d. per bag delivered at Cape Town. On the 7th July the plaintiffs tendered further consignments, but these were in such a bad condition that the defendants refused to accept delivery, and the potatoes were afterwards sold at the public market, realising £41 11s. 9d., after deducting costs and charges. On or about the 9th and 10th July the plaintiffs tendered 250 bags more. These potatoes also were in a rotten condition, and defendants refused to accept delivery, and had intimated to the plaintiffs that the potatoes would remain at their stores pending further directions from plaintiffs as to their disposal.

One of the defendants appeared, and asked that the case should be postponed, owing to the illness of his brother, who was more fully acquainted with the matter than he was.

De Villiers, C.J., asked defendant why their attorneys had now withdrawn from the case?

Defendant said he supposed it was because they were a little short of ready money.

De Villiers, C.J., said that as witnesses had come from Cathcart he thought the case had better go on as far as their evidence, at any rate, was concerned.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Russell) for the plaintiffs.

Percy Rose Innes said he carried on business as an agent in Cape Town. He saw the defendants on the 21st June last, and arranged the sale of the potatoes. On the 23rd June he had a broker's note drawn up for the sale of 500 bags of potatoes from plaintiffs to defendants, delivered on trucks at Cathcart Station, "delivery to be made with the least possible delay in good and sound merchantable condition." On the 24th June he received a letter from the defendants, complaining that the first portion of 250 bags had not been received, and asking, seeing that they had sold part of the consignment, when they might expect the potatoes to be delivered. The price was to be 15s. 9d per bag of 150 lb., delivered on trucks at Cathcart Station, which worked out approximately at 18s. 6d. per bag, delivered on trucks at Cape Town Station. He saw the defendants, and explained to them that he had wired on the 21st, and that after he had received confirmation in about two or three days' time from Malcomess and Co. he had prepared his broker's note. After that, the first consignment of potatoes arrived. The defendant called at his office. He complained that the market had dropped from 23s. to 17s. This was owing to a fresh shipment of potatoes having just arrived. Eventually it was arranged, in order to save further expense, that the defendants should pay 16s. 6d. per bag delivered in Cape Town, an allowance being made on the railage, but not on the price of the potatoes. Witness saw the potatoes when they arrived; they were in good condition. He also stated that the whole of the 500 bags were delivered.

Thomas Muller Preston, a clerk in the employ of Malcomess and Co., at Cathcart, stated that 250 bags were delivered at Cathcart Station on the 26th June, and the remaining 250 on the 29th June. Each bag was weighed; and the potatoes were in good condition when they left Cathcart. The reason of the delay in delivery was that they had to wait for trucks. It was just after the cessation of the war, and there was great difficulty in obtaining trucks. The potatoes were all grown in the Cathcart district, and most of them had just come from the farms.

George Cooper, stationmaster at Cathcart, spoke to receiving the consignment at the station on the dates named. At the time, he said, there was great difficulty in obtaining trucks, and considerable delay occurred in the forwarding of goods on the railway.

The defendant said that in the first consignment there was a shortage of 10 lbs. in each bag, making 1,200 lb. in all. The other potatoes were in a very bad state. Replying to the Chief Justice, defendant added that he had no evidence as to the quality and weight of the potatoes when placed in the trucks at Cathcart, and that his brother, even had he been present that day, would have been unable to give the Court any information on that point.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is clear from the broker's note what the contract between the parties was—the plaintiff had to deliver 500 bags of Cathcart potatoes at so much per lb., delivered on trucks at Cathcart Station, "delivery to be made with the least possible delay in good and sound merchantable condition." The delivery was to be made in "sound merchantable condition" at Cathcart Station. If the defendant had assured the Court that he could produce evidence as to the condition in which the potatoes were on delivery at Cathcart Station, then the Court might have postponed the case for the purpose of hearing such evidence. The witnesses for the plaintiff state positively that the potatoes were in good condition when delivered at Cathcart Station, and that they were delivered at Cathcart Station within a reasonable time, that they were delivered as soon as there were trucks available to receive them. The defendant's potatoes seem to have been knocked about in the railway trucks. By the 28th June the defendant received the first consignment of 120 bags of potatoes. We do not know what had happened to those potatoes on the railway. They might have been damaged by the Railway Department, and in that case the defendants would have their remedy against the Railway Department. If the requisite quantity was delivered the defendants are liable to pay the amount, and no good purpose can be served by postponement, which would only add to the costs of the case. The Court will now give judgment for the amount claimed with costs.

BRAUN V. COHEN.

Slander—Magistrate Court costs.

This was an action for £500 damages for slander.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff was a farmer and brickmaker residing at Cape Town, and defendant also lived in Cape Town. On or about the 12th February, 1903, the defendant, speaking to one Max Jaffe, in the Yiddish language, accused the defendant of having stolen the clay with which he made his bricks, and afterwards he said to the plaintiff, "Yes, you (meaning the plaintiff) stole the clay over there, and I am going to prove it," thereby meaning that he was dishonest, and guilty of fraudulent conduct in his business. Damages to the amount of £500 were claimed with costs. Defendant's plea denied that he used the words or had used at any time words intended to mean that plaintiff had committed an indictable offence. He also denied that plaintiff had sustained any damage to which he (defendant) was liable.

Mr. Rainsford for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner for defendant.

Max Jaffe, plaintiff's foreman, who gave his evidence in Yiddish, was called to prove the use of the words complained of, which, he said, were used in the presence of about twelve people.

Julius Braun, the plaintiff, and John Stewart, brickmaker in the plaintiff's employ, also gave evidence.

For the defence,

Jesse Cohen, the defendant, said he had some words with Jaffe about the use of a road which had been granted to him (defendant) by the Town Council. He never spoke about clay to Jaffe, but he said that plaintiff had charged him too much for water. On the following day, when he spoke to the plaintiff on the subject, he (defendant) said to him, "You are taking my water; you think it is the clay." He never accused the plaintiff of having stolen the clay, and he did not think the conversation could have been overheard by the workmen.

Mr. Gardiner, on behalf of his client, commented on the fact that no disinterested witnesses had been called, and he contended that, even had the words been used, plaintiff had not suffered either in his character or business. It had been proved in another case that plaintiff was entitled to the clay, and no one would believe the insinuation that he had stolen it.

De Villiers, C.J.: There is a conflict in the evidence as to the language actually used by the defendant. One thing is clear, that there was a dispute between the parties as to the right of road and as to water. A dispute then arose as to the clay, in the course of which the plaintiff and his witnesses said, the defendant had said the plaintiff had stolen the clay. The defendant, on the other hand, denies it. I am inclined to think some words to that effect were used; that in the heat of the moment the defendant did not measure his words; that he was annoyed about the road and about the clay, and he did use such words which might lead the bystanders to believe that he accused the plaintiff of taking the clay. At the same time, the bystanders would not be much affected by the use of the words. Only two witnesses were called on behalf of the plaintiff to prove the use of the words. They were employed by the plaintiff, and were still in his employ. It is said there were strangers present, but none were called on behalf of the plaintiff. There is no plea of justification in the present case; there is no attempt on the part of the defendant to throw any slur on the plaintiff's character; and I think this is not a case which the plaintiff should have brought into this Court. If his object was to clear his character, he might have done it in the Magistrate's Court instead of coming into this Court with a paltry case of this kind. The damages are such that no Magistrate would have awarded more than £10, which is quite within the jurisdiction of the Magistrates to award. Judgment will be, therefore, for plaintiff for £10, with Magistrate's Court costs.

STRAUSS v. LOUW.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the R.M. of Calvinia.

The appellant had brought an action in the Court of the R.M. at Calvinia to recover a certain mule, or its value. £20. The plaintiff purchased the mule from the military after the cessation of hostilities, and the point argued before the Magistrate was whether the military did or did not acquire a good title to this animal under certain circumstances under which they took it. The Magistrate gave absolution from the instance, and from that judgment the present appeal was brought.

Mr. Benjamin for appellant; Mr. Van Zyl for respondent.

[De Villiers, C.J.: When was the mule sold; after peace?]

Mr. Benjamin: It was sold after peace. My contention is that the animal had come into possession of the military, and that it was actually commandeered by them, and paid for by them. I think the doubt in the case is as to the identity of this animal. It is admitted on the record that certain mules were commandeered by the military, and commandeer notes were passed for them and payment actually made. The defendant says the particular mule in question was returned to him by the military.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Magistrate found that?]

Mr. Benjamin: He seems to have found that as a matter of fact.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Then the military officials, believing that this was the same mule which had been commandeered, sold it?]

Mr. Benjamin: They sold certain animals afterwards, and they sold this particular mule after the cessation of hostilities, and the plaintiff bought it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: How did it get into the defendant's possession?]

Mr. Benjamin: I suppose it must have strayed. The question, I think, is entirely one of credibility of the evidence before the Magistrate. There was certainly a conflict of evidence. The evidence given by the plaintiff himself was very largely hearsay evidence, and his wife, who was said to have been in possession of this particular animal during his absence on commando, was not called as a witness. There were two other witnesses called, who deposed to the fact that the animal had remained in possession of the wife, but the wife herself was not called.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There was an interdict granted after peace had been declared. Is this one of the animals?]

I should think so, although the record is not quite clear. My submission is that the military acquired a good title to this animal during the course of the war.

Mr. Van Zyl, for the respondent, contended that no sufficient reason had been adduced for setting aside the judgment. He quoted the Magistrate's reasons for judgment, which were firstly that the mule in question was the property of the defendant; secondly, that it was in his possession on or about the 13th January, 1901, and remained in his possession until on or about 14th July, 1902, after peace was declared; and, thirdly, that it was never requisitioned by the military authorities for the suppression of hostilities, or the establishment or maintenance of good order and government, and for the safety of this colony between the 12th October, 1900, and the passing of the Indemnity Act of 1902.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is entirely a question of credibility as to whether the mule was in the possession of the defendant all through the war. It has been candidly admitted on behalf of the plaintiff that if the Magistrate is right in his finding on the question of fact, the plaintiff has no case. On the question of credibility, there appears to be evidence on both sides. Some of the witnesses for the defendant swear positively that this mule was during that time in the possession of the defendant. The military authorities had allowed the defendant to retain the mule and bring it back to his place, and it was in his possession from February, 1901, to July, 1902. That is the defendant's version also. In opposition to that, there is certain evidence of some witnesses who maintained that this mule was in the possession of the military throughout; but it may well be a case of mistaken identity. Be that as it may, the Magistrate's finding is clear on this point, and he has had better opportunities than this Court has had of judging as to the credibility of the witnesses. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed, with costs.

DE KLERK V. HOLTMAN. { 1903. May 18th.

Interpleader—Pledge—Delivery.

A., being indebted to the claimant in the sum of £30, gave him as security two mules, which, however, A. retained in his possession. Subsequently B. having obtained judgment against A. the mules were attached by the messenger.

Held, in an interpleader suit that the claimant was not entitled as against B. to claim the benefit of the pledge.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the R.M. of Tulbagh.

From the record in the Court below it appeared that the present appellant obtained judgment against one De Villiers, and on the 6th April last two mules, found in the possession of De Villiers, were attached by the messenger of the R.M.'s Court. These mules were subsequently claimed by one Andries Holtman, the present respondent, who said that they were his property, and thereupon instituted an interpleader action to have determined the question whether these mules were executable or not.

The Magistrate, in his reasons for judgment, stated that it was shown by sworn evidence that the full purchase price of the animals in question was paid by the claimant, who was secured by the document "A" until their full value should be paid. From the character of De Villiers, who was known both to the Court and to the public living near him, it would be highly improbable that he would secure a loan of £30, except on very good security.

Mr. Van Zyl (for the appellant) argued that the Magistrate's judgment was not supported by the evidence.

De Villiers, C.J.: The burden of proof as to ownership in this case lay with Holtman, the claimant. In order to discharge this burden, he gave evidence that he (Holtman) had bought the mules from Theron, and on that point he is supported by De Villiers, who was the defendant in the original action. Unfortunately, however, for their case, a document was put in by the claimant himself, the contents of which were known to both De Villiers and the claimant at the time it was drawn up. In this document De Villiers acknowledges to have borrowed £30 from the claimant, which he promises to repay with interest at 7 per cent. As security for repayment, he declares that the two mules he bought from Mr. Theron, and now in his possession, shall be the property of Mr. Holtman until the said sum is repaid. The claimant and De Villiers appear to have acted under the belief that the owner of the mules could make a valid pledge of them and at the same time retain possession of the mules. It has frequently, however, been decided that, whatever the effect of such a transaction might be as between the immediate parties, it could not affect the rights of an execution creditor on whose behalf the mules had been attached by the messenger. As against him the pledge has no validity, unless the mules had been delivered to the claimant. The appeal must, therefore, be allowed, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.) and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.

WALTERS V. WALTERS. { 1908. May 19th.

This was an action for the restitution of conjugal rights, in which the plaintiff, Martha Magdalena Walters, sued her husband, one Daniel de Waal Walters.

Mr. Gardiner for plaintiff; defendant in default.

Mr. Gardiner stated that some difficulty had arisen with regard to the date of trial. The defendant, he was instructed, had been served personally with notice of trial for the 13th inst., but, unfortunately, a few days before the trial it was discovered that the plaintiff, who lived at Carnarvon, could not be in Cape Town by the 13th inst. It was then set down for the 19th inst. Unfortunately there had been no notice to the defendant of the alteration of date.

De Villiers, C.J., intimated that the case might be proceeded with.

Charles William Henry Smith, clerk in the Colonial Office in charge of the marriage registers, produced the record of marriage.

The plaintiff, Martha Magdalena Walters, said she was married to the defendant in February, 1896. There were two children. Witness and her husband had not lived happily together. They had had quarrels. He was not of sober habits, and when under the influence of drink he quarrelled. Defendant had left her on March 21, 1900. He joined the Boer forces; he told her that he would join, but he said nothing about returning. She knew nothing as to his present whereabouts. He had been an agent, and previously he was a schoolmaster. She had had no letters from him since he had left her. They had no property. She was now living with her father. Since defendant left her she had inherited a small legacy of £50. She was not aware that he had any property. Witness asked for the custody of the children.

A decree of restitution of conjugal rights was granted, defendant to return to or receive the plaintiff on or before the 30th June, failing which a rule be made calling on the defendant to show cause on the 12th July why a decree of divorce should not be granted, with costs, and plaintiff declared to be entitled to custody of the children, and defendant declared to have forfeited all benefits under the marriage in community, and why defendant should not be ordered to pay the sum of £4 per month until the youngest of the children attains the age of 16 years, personal service to be effected.

VAN BLERCK V. VAN BLERCK AND ANOTHER.

This was an action brought by one Charles C. van Blerk against his wife for divorce, on the ground of her adultery with one, Bodell, from whom costs were claimed.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff resided at Kimberley, and the defendants resided at Observatory-road, Cape Division. The parties were married at Kimberley in 1892, and there were two children of the marriage. The first-named defendant left the plaintiff in 1898, and had since cohabited with the se cond defendant as his wife in Cape Town and Observatory-road. The plaintiff claimed a decree of divorce against his wife and forfeiture of the benefits of marriage in community and costs of the suit as against the second defendant.

Mr. Buchanan for plaintiff; defendant in default.

Charles William Henry Smith, clerk in charge of the marriage registers at the Colonial Office, produced the original entries in the register of the marriage.

The plaintiff, Charles Carl van Blerck, said he was married to defendant on the 26th September, 1892, at Kimberley, in community of property. They lived happily together for some years, and a child was born, who was now seven years of age. His wife came down to the coast to visit some relatives in February, 1898. She was accompanied by their son. She was to stay with her relatives at Salt River. When she had been down here a little time she sent a letter for more money. In consequence of something that came to his notice, witness came down to the coast and made inquiries and he found that his wife was living at a boarding-house in Bree-street under another name, with the second defendant. Witness saw his own son coming downstairs. He asked Bodell where his wife was. Bodell replied that it was not his fault. He also saw his wife, and she admitted that she had been living with the other defendant as his wife. Witness told her that he would forgive her of she would return with him to Kimberley. She promised to do so. He took his son with him. She asked for a sovereign, which he gave to her. He arranged to meet her at the station in the evening, but she did not appear. Since that time they had not lived together. On Friday last he went to Observatory-road and found that she was living with Bodell as his wife. He also found that she had had a child since she had been living with him.

Corroborative evidence having been given by Joseph Abrahams, Cape Town, and Cornelius Silbert, of Woodstock,

The Court granted a decree of divorce, plaintiff being given custody of the child of the marriage, the second defendant to pay costs of the action.

LEGG V. HANDS.

This was an action in respect of certain brokerage.

Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. Gardiner) for plaintiff stated that in this case the plaintiff, after consultation, found that he was principally induced to take the action by reason of a certain letter that he had got from a Mr. Stableford, who was the purchaser of the property, and with whom he had been in negotiation with regard to the sale of it for some time, but they found that Mr. Stableford now differed from what he said in the matter to them. Counsel read the letter upon which the action was based The letter said that he had made an offer of £1,500 for certain property, and added: "It was in consequence of the inquiries I made after your introduction that I eventually decided to purchase and pay the sum of £2,500 for it." It was on that letter, said counsel, that the present action was instituted, but it was now found that Mr. Stableford had receded from that statement of fact, and, consequently, the plaintiff was not in a position to go on with the action. He would, therefore, have to submit to absolution from the instance.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Close) for defendant consented.

Absolution from the instance granted, with costs.

INSOLVENT ESTATE MUSTERS } 1903.
V. VAN DER SPUY, } May 19th.

Insolvency—Undue preference—Act 38 of 1884, Sec. 8.

This was an action brought by Thomas Herbert Hazell, as trustee in the insolvent estate of one, Musters, against Sybrand Johannes van der Spuy, of Durban-road, to have set aside an alleged preferential cession made by the insolvent out of his estate to the defendant.

The declaration set forth: (1) The plaintiff is Thomas Herbert Hazell, who sues in his capacity as sole trustee in the insolvent estate of Arthur Henry Chaworth Musters, hereinafter called the insolvent. The defendant is Sybrand Johannes van der Spuy, a farmer and speculator, residing at "Oakdale," near Durban-road, in the Cape Division. (2) The insolvent surrendered his estate voluntarily on February 5, 1902. (3) On or about September 21, the insolvent, who was then indebted to the defendant in certain sums of money, ceded, made over, and assigned to the defendant a certain claim for damages against the Imperial Government in settlement whereof the insolvent had agreed to accept the sum of £500 from the said Government, and authorised the defendant to receive the said sum from the said Government, and on or about September 14, 1901, the defendant received the sum of £467 0s. 8d. from the said Government by virtue of the said cession and assignment. (4) At the date when the insolvent made the aforesaid cession, and at the date when the defendant received the aforesaid sum by virtue thereof, the liabilities of the insolvent, fairly calculated, largely exceeded his assets fairly valued, and at the said dates the insolvent contemplated the sequestration of his estate, and intended to prefer, and did by the aforesaid means prefer, the defendant before his other creditors, and the plaintiff is entitled to have the said transaction set aside as an undue preference under Section 84 of Ordinance 6 of 1843. The plaintiff claims (a) that the cession and assignment as aforesaid be declared to be an undue preference, and null and void; (b) that the defendant be ordered to pay to the plaintiff for the benefit of the said estate the sum of £467 0s. 8d., with interest from September 14, 1901; (c) alternative relief; (d) costs of suit.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted paragraphs 1 and 2. He admitted paragraph 3, save that the sum of £467 0s. 8d. was not received by him from the Imperial Government, but was paid to his attorney by the attorney of the said insolvent. The defendant denied the allegations in paragraph 4, and he specially denied that the said insolvent contemplated the sequestration of his estate at the said date, or that the said insolvent intended to prefer, and did prefer, the defendant before his other creditors, or that the payment constituted undue preference. Wherefore he prayed that the plaintiff's claim might be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. Upington) for plaintiff; Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Benjamin) for defendant.

Thomas Herbert Hazell, accountant, of Cape Town, said he was elected trustee in this estate. After his appointment was confirmed, he obtained possession of the books of the estate. He framed an account in the estate, showing how the estate worked out. The account had not yet been filed. It was a liquidation and distribution account. This showed expenses of administration, £24; certain movables, sold for £14 10s.; outstanding debts, £2 18s. 3d.; contribution account, £5 10s. 3d.; and claims proved against the estate, £1,735. There were certain outstanding debts brought up in the schedule to the amount of £70 odd, but witness's efforts to recover these moneys were unavailing. The debts brought up in the schedule were £3,009 odd, but a number of creditors had not proved against the estate. The insolvent stated that he was entitled to certain moneys from a joint enterprise between Francois Duminy and himself, and that a sum was due to him in excess of a certain claim which had been brought against him by his brother-in-law, Duminy. Insolvent admitted that he owed £1,176 odd to Duminy. Insolvent went to England in November or December last, without any objection being raised by witness. The insolvent surrendered his estate on the 5th February, 1902. At that date the action commenced by Duminy was pending. Musters set up a counter-claim in re-convention on account of being entitled to share in the proceeds of certain transactions in property which he alleged he had with Duminy as partner. That action was set down for the November term, and was postponed until the February term, and the case was set down for trial two days after Musters surrendered his estate. The action was abandoned. It was left to witness's discretion at the third meeting of creditors to dispute Duminy's claim. To strengthen his position, he called a meeting at his office of the creditors except Duminy, and submitted the position of affairs to them, and he was then instructed to take counsel's opinion. A case was duly stated, and, in consequence of counsel's opinion being unfavourable, the action was abandoned. There was nothing in the books of Musters to support these claims in re-convention, no records whatever. There were no papers in the estate to show that Musters had ever paid a penny in connection with the property transactions. Witness called upon insolvent to state the causes of his insolvency. Musters stated that he had been joined with his brother-in-law, Duminy, in certain transactions, that Duminy had commenced an action at law against him, that he (insolvent) could not afford to fight the case, and that, acting on advice, he had decided to surrender his estate, to give his trustee an opportunity of contesting the claim, and establishing the claim in re-convention. Insolvent also stated that he had had a contract with the Government, and in consequence of the breach committed by the Government, he lost £2,000, for which he received an offer of only £500 compensation, his attorney advising him that it was unwise under the circumstances to take action. That was the £500 which formed the subject of the present action. Certain resolutions were passed by the meeting of creditors with regard to taking the evidence on commission of Mr. and Mrs. Musters, and the attorney, Mr. Brady. Their evidence was taken on commission, and, in consequence, certain resolutions were passed at a special meeting of creditors. Mr. Nash, of Messrs. Nash and Muirhead, was appointed to go into the books. After he had made his report, the present action was instituted. Witness did not anticipate that there would be any further assets in the estate. He found in the estate a document purporting to be a copy of the contract with the Government which Musters had entered into in respect to which the sum of £500 was paid as compensation, and he also found a letter from the Government in which they offered the sum of £500.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: This action was brought on the security of the principal creditor, Mr. Duminy, through witness. The commission as to the examination of certain witnesses was also carried out on the security of Mr. Duminy. After the commission had been taken, he presented a report to the creditors, at the end of which appeared the passage: "Your trustee has read the evidence through, and, so far as he can see, there are no grounds for any further steps to be taken, and would recommend that the estate be closed." He made no inquiry into the value of the farms which were sold by Duminy. He was not aware that one was now valued at £15,000, and that the other had been sold for £4,000.

The Chief Justice said it was not clear what the relations of the parties were with regard to the farms.

Sir H. Juta said that Duminy had bought these farms, and Musters' case was that he had gone into partnership with Duminy as a speculator in buying the farms in question. Originally Duminy and Musters were in partnership, and they entered into contracts with the Imperial authorities, and accounts ran on for about eighteen months.

Cross-examination continued: If Musters' claim against Duminy had been a good one, he thought the insolvent would have been solvent. He saw Musters several times after his insolvency. The insolvent was very keen on the case being fought. He maintained that he was entitled to a share of the proceeds of the farms. Witness took steps to see if this action could be fought, but he came to the conclusion that no further steps should be taken.

Re-examined by Mr. Searle: At the time that witness made his report to the creditors, recommending that no further steps should be taken, Mr. Nash had not carried out his investigations into the books.

Maynard Nash, accountant, Cape Town, a member of the firm of Maynard Nash and Muirhead, said that on the 18th October last year he was instructed to investigate the books of the insolvent Musters, and prepare a report. On the 18th December he presented a report. As to the method of keeping the books, he found that they were well kept until the 30th June, 1901. After that date the books were hardly kept at all. He annexed to his report a balance-sheet, showing, according to the insolvent's own figures, on the 30th June, 1901, a deficiency of £792 odd. After that he made a balance-sheet up to the 31st August, when that deficiency, according to the books of the insolvent, was £1,127 10s. 2d. The assets, according to the insolvent's books, from which the figure was drawn, were not correctly stated. Insolvent in his balance-sheet set down sundry creditors, £48 4s. 10d. Witness could not see that any part of this was ever recovered. There was an item of furniture, £294. He ceded to his wife under the ante-nuptial contract furniture to the value of £250. There was also an item of £127 for options, which he could not trace. That referred apparently to some coal options. There was also an inventory, which figured out at £955. He could not tell exactly what the inventory was, but when the insolvent sold his property on the 31st August, he sold all moveables in the property to Mr. J. A. Reid. So far as he could trace, the genuine assets included £150 cash in hand, and possibly some of the furniture belonged to insolvent. He could not trace between August 31 and the insolvency that insolvent ever received any cash at all for any of the movables, beyond a small sum of £40 for a Cape cart and £20, evidently for a piano. On the 31st August his total liabilities to his creditors were £2,729. With regard to his claims against Duminy for a half-share in his farms, there was nothing referring thereto in his books or with regard to Furber's mules.

In cross-examination, witness said Musters' claim against the military authorities did not figure in the books. Witness only spoke from what he could find in the books, and they were not well kept.

The Chief Justice: If you add the £500 which was paid by the Government to his claim against Duminy, would he have been solvent?

Witness: He would have been insolvent.

Sir H. Juta: You know he claims against Duminy for a half-share in the farm Leovenstein?

Witness: No, I do not know.

Sir H. Juta: I put it to you, that if in September, 1901, Loevenstein was worth £10,000, and Musters had a half share, would he then be solvent?

Witness: Certainly.

Sir H. Juta: And very well solvent, too.

Francois Jean van Helslandt Duminy, jun., said he was a farmer, a Justice of the Peace, and formerly a member of the Cape Divisional Council. He was principal creditor in the estate of Musters. He lived at Fairfield, formerly part of the farm Loevenstein. Musters bought the farm Welgemoed from him, and lived there until about a year ago, and then he went to live at Kenilworth. Witness had a contract for grazing certain mules, and supplied certain forage. Musters entered into a contract with the Imperial Government in his own name. On that contract, witness advanced him a large sum of money. Musters himself acknowledged his indebtedness to him of £1,176, arising out of money advanced by him in connection with this contract. Musters kept the books of the venture, and witness from time to time supplied moneys. This was the contract under which Musters claimed compensation from the Imperial Government. The contract commenced between Musters and himself at the end of 1899, and terminated in August, 1900, when the mules and horses were taken away by the military authorities. After that Musters and he made up their accounts. He pressed Musters constantly for a settlement. Musters was unable to pay him, and the position he took up was that he would pay him when he got his money from the Imperial Government. On October 22, 1900, they both agreed that a certain Mr. Blake should look into the books, and arrive at the amount that was due. Witness claimed £1,369, and Musters put the sum at £1,302, and a balance was struck at the latter figure, witness agreeing to waive the difference. Musters made no claim then to a half-share in the farms Loevenstein and Zandgat. Witness bought those farms on June 5, 1900, nearly six months before the settlement, for £4,000. He bought them by public auction, through Mr. Baxter, a field-cornet. It was utterly false that it was suggested that he should buy in partnership with Musters. The first intimation he had that Musters claimed a share in the farms was on September 10, 1901, when he received a letter from Musters claiming an account of the farms. Witness raised a bond, and pledged other bonds, and so paid for the farms. He paid the transfer and all other expenses. He never asked Musters for any money, and he (Musters) never tendered any money in connection with the transaction. Shortly before this claim was made, he had issued a summons against Musters for the recovery of £1,176, which he acknowledged owing him on the 28th August. There was no document connected with the purchase of the farms showing any reference to Musters. Musters also claimed against him £1,087 in connection with Furber's mules. There was no foundation for that claim. Musters had nothing to do with the contract with Furber. In June and July witness's farm got very wet, and he asked Musters to allow the mules to graze higher up on his ground, and for this Musters received £41 16s. 6d. Witness had an option to get half the profits of the sale of mules over £25 each. Musters had no claim for that half-profit. He believed Musters and Furber were strangers. Musters claimed £1,097 on that account, and even on his own showing, supposing there had been such a contract, the amount would not have been correct.

Mr. Searle: He admitted when he was examined that he made a mistake of £300 in this amount.

Witness (continuing) said Musters promised to pay him £1,176 as soon as his claim was settled against the Government. The Government had to give certain notice before the animals could be removed, but owing to glanders breaking out amongst the horses the animals were removed without due notice. That was how the claim arose.

In cross-examination, witness said he sold Zandgat for £2,000 in September or October, 1901. He paid £4,000 for Zandgat and Loevenstein. He should estimate the value of the latter farm, with the improvements he had made, at £5,000 or £6,000. He would not say now that he would take £15,000 for it.

The Chief Justice: If there was a contract, we may take it Musters would be solvent.

Sir H. Juta: You know there was a contract. You know your father was bidding, and your father said he stopped bidding because he thought you and Musters were bidding in partnership?

Witness: I don't know what he said.

By the Court: Witness said he never heard Musters wanted to bid, and he did not think he would because he had no money left. If his father was bidding, it was for witness's brother Charlie, and not for Musters.

Geo. Milne Baxter said he was Field-cornet for the Durbanville Ward, and carried on the business of a wagon-builder. He bought the farm Zandgat for Duminy at public auction. Mr. Musters never instructed him, and he knew nothing about him in connection with the transaction.

Chas. Arthur Wells Blake, clerk in the employ of the Board of Executors for the last ten years, said he knew Mr. Musters and Mr. Duminy well In October, 1900, he was asked to go down to D'Urban-road to arrive at a settlement of accounts between the two. Mr Duminy claimed £1,389 12s 8d., and Mr. Musters only admitted £1,302 0s. 4d. Upon witness's suggestion, Mr. Duminy waived his claim to the difference, and Mr. Musters admitted indebtedness to the amount of £1,302. Afterwards sums of £25 and £100 were paid off. Musters did not give him to understand he had other claims against Duminy. He only heard of the counter-claim, and then from another source, just before the insolvency.

Geo. Montgomery Walker, of the firm of Walker and Jacobsohn, attorneys, Cape Town, said he acted as attorney for Mr. Duminy. This claim was first put into his hands about March, 1901. There was a meeting in his office on 10th April, 1901, of Musters and Duminy in order to come to a settlement. The parties settled the amount due to be £1,302, and Mr. Duming was to get a promissory note for that, with a security. He noted that down in the presence of both of them. Musters never raised at the interview a claim in re-convention, and witness only heard of it when the summons had been issued on 28th August. From what witness was told, the account was settled at his office as a final account. The amount proved against the estate was £1,176.

Cross-examined: When the case was postponed, Mr. Musters said he could not get his witnesses. The Court said the case would have to come on in February whether the witnesses were there or not.

Sir H. Juta: Do you know that he swore that in the conversation in the office of Walker and Jacobsohn he had mentioned his claim to a share in the farms?

Witness: I cannot recall that.

James Moore, accountant for the National Mutual Life Insurance Company, gave evidence of the surrender value of two life policies on Musters' life that were ceded to Miss Duminy.

This closed the plaintiff's case.

For the defence,

Mr. Benamin read the records in the case Musters v. Duminy.

Christopher Brady said he was an attorney, and acted for Musters before August, 1901, and continued to act until the following year. In the month of August he received £451 belonging to Musters, and paid it out to various creditors. Subsequent to that there was the arrangement between Musters and Van der Spuy, by which he received £467 0s. 8d. £205 of that was represented by a promissory note which had been made by Musters, and for which Van der Spuy had been security. The £451 were the proceeds of the sale of Musters' farm. Musters instructed witness in writing to pay the creditors. He paid Mrs. Musters £195, Messrs. Hall £52, the insolvent £24 14s., Hudson's note £100, and another creditor £18 14s. Subsequently the payment was made to Mr. Van der Spuy's attorney of £205. He acted as attorney for Musters throughout this action. In the month of November there was a postponement owing to the difficulty of Musters getting his witnesses. The defence was a bona fide one. Between November and February he (witness) made every endeavour to get the witnesses, and received certain moneys from Musters for the purposes of his case. The case was set down for the 7th February, and on the 5th Mr. Musters surrendered his estate. He (witness) was unable to get the witnesses ready for the 7th, though he made every possible effort. He understood the witnesses were in Pretoria, and he tried to get them. Musters was very unwilling to surrender. That seemed to witness to be the only course open to Mr. Musters at that time to enable the trustee or someone else to fight the action, or else judgment would go by default.

Cross-examined, witness said the papers in Musters' claim against the Imperial Government passed through his hands. In June the Government tendered £500 in settlement, after a cheque for £250 had been returned. This was done on the advice of counsel.

Mr. Searle: What were you going on in that contract against the Imperial Government? What was your case?

Witness: I did not go into the details.

You wrote some very strong letters to the Government, though. You did not satisfy yourself he had any case at all?—I was satisfied he had a substantial case, and he got a substantial amount. His claim was for £2,000. In consequence of the advice that we could not take proceedings here, I thought it was the best thing to do to accept the £500.

Mr. Searle read plaintiff's counsel's opinion that plaintiff would not have a chance of succeeding for breach of contract, afterwards remarking: You wrote these letters to the Imperial Government on the principle of "bluffing," I suppose?—I looked upon it as a principle of justice.

Upon what principle could he have succeeded?—He had a good claim at that time.

For what?—I cannot go into details. I dare say my chief clerk can tell. He had it in hand.

Of course, you put it on your chief clerk. Until he established his counterclaim, you knew he was hopelessly insolvent?—No, why should I know it? I am not acting in every affair he has got.

You are his attorney?—Yes, in one matter.

You knew he had nearly £3,000 debts apart from this? I did not know that.

You made no inquiry about it?—What business was it of mine? I should say not.

Did you ask him for any documents in order to satisfy yourself about this claim on Zandgat?—If I did not, my clerk did.

Did you ever see any document that would have supported his claim in reconvention?—I do not think I have—a written document. I took my client's instructions.

Did you ever see any document relating to his claim about Furber's mules? I do not think so.

You drew up the case for opinion of counsel?—With regard to this case, yes.

You naturally laid stress on the fact there was no tittle of documentary evidence to support the case? I satisfied myself he had a good case.

However, you did not succeed?—I don't know that.

You have only to read this (counsel's) opinion.

Frederic Benjamin Andrews, now an attorney of this Court, said that in 1901 he was chief clerk to Mr. Brady, and he had the case of Musters and Duminy in hand. He corroborated Mr. Brady in most details. There was a bona fide defence and claim in re-convention. Musters could not obtain his witnesses. He endeavoured between November and February to obtain the witnesses. The insolvent Musters was most unwilling to surrender his estate. The suggestion to surrender came from witness under the advice of Mr. Brady. Mr. Duminy was present when Musters was unwilling to surrender. As to the cheque for £451, that payment was made by Mr. Herholdt direct to Musters.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: He did not remember whether he drew up the case for counsel's opinion; if Mr. Brady did not, witness probably did draw up the case. In regard to the Furber contract, the military witnesses would have given evidence to show that the actions of the parties would tend to prove that Musters and Duminy were partners. He admitted the statements made in the case submitted to counsel as having been in his writing, and added that of course they did not put the case in the most favourable light that they could.

Mr. Searle: At any rate, you might have put it fairly.

Francois J. H. Duminy, father-in-law of Mr. Musters, and father of the plaintiff in the other action, said he remembered the surrender of Musters' estate. Musters said he was not insolvent, and that it would be a disgrace if he surrendered.

Cross-examined by Mr. Searle: Musters made the statement some time before he surrendered the estate.

By the Chief Justice: He was at the sale of the farms which his son bought. The purchase was made by Baxter for Mr. Duminy, he thought. Before that, he had had some communication with his son about the purchase. Two of the sons, John and Charlie, both wanted portions of the farm. One of his sons did not say he would like to buy it for Musters; Musters' name was not mentioned. Witness made a bid, but his son Charlie afterwards came up to him. His son did not say Musters had any interest in the purchase.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an action for undue preference. The undue preference alleged in this case consists in the payment to the defendant of the sum of £467 during the time when, undoubtedly, the assets of the insolvent were less than his liabilities were fairly calculated to be. By Sec. 8 of Act 38 of 1884, such being the case, the onus of showing that the insolvent did not contemplate the sequestration of his estate is thrown on defendant. If at the trial of any action brought for the purpose of setting aside any alleged undue preference it be proved that the preference forming such action was made within six months before the sequestration of the estate, and at a time when his liabilities were fairly calculated to be in excess of his assets, it may be presumed that insolvent at such time contemplated the sequestration of his estate, unless it is proved to the contrary by defendant himself. The evidence clearly proves that at the time when the payment was made to the defendant the insolvent's liabilities fairly calculated did exceed his assets. The evidence also shows that the payment was made within six months previous to the date of sequestration, and therefore, in the present case, it is clear that the plaintiff must succeed unless the defendant discharges the onus cast upon him by the Act. The question the Court has now to decide is has this been done? The defendant's counsel relies upon two circumstances as proof, one circumstance being that a few days before the defendant was paid the insolvent paid certain other claimants, and the other is that at the time these payments were made the insolvent honestly believed that he had a large claim against Duminy, who was really the creditor in the present case, and that if he succeeded in the claim he was not insolvent, and therefore he could not at that time have contemplated the sequestration of his estate. As regards the payments of creditors on the 31st August Mr. Brady was authorised to pay certain creditors. The Court cannot lose sight of the fact that this authority was given two days after the summons had been served on the insolvent at the suit of Duminy for a considerable sum. The creditors who were paid were insolvent's wife, the largest sum, £195, a certain sum paid to himself, and then a certain sum to the Mutual Insurance Company, to keep policies alive, and the only two bona-fide creditors who were paid were Hudson, who was paid on a promissory note falling due that day, and therefore this must be taken to be payment in the ordinary course of business and Messrs. Hall were paid £52. There was, therefore, not such a general payment of all creditors at that time as to justify the Court in allowing this payment to two creditors to override the presumption which has been raised by the eighth section of the Act 38 of 1884. Coming next to the claim which the insolvent alleged to have had against his brother-in-law, Duminy, there is really nothing substantial before the Court to show that any such claim ever existed. Mr. Duminy has himself been called, and he swore positively that there was no agreement at the time he purchased the two farms in question that the insolvent should share, and no other witness has been called to prove that there was any such understanding. I understood from the cross-examination that the father of Mr. Duminy would have been called to prove that there was such understanding, but far from proving it, he entirely disproved it by saying he himself had spoken to Duminy about the purchase, but not on behalf of the insolvent, but on behalf of his son, so that he at all events does not support the view that the insolvent had been led by Duminy to believe that he would be allowed to share in the profits of the purchase of the farms. Not a single document has been produced to show that there was ever such an understanding, and throughout the correspondence it is admitted that there was no such claim put forward until some time in September, when a letter, which has been produced, was written, and after the summons had been served upon the insolvent. Under these circumstances, it was of the greatest importance that the insolvent himself should be examined in order to give his version, and it was almost hopeless for defendant to expect that without some clear statement from the insolvent himself on oath before the Court that the Court would come to the conclusion that he himself believed that he had a bona fide claim to this extent. The court must now hold that he contemplated sequestration. In my opinion the defendant has not sufficiently discharged the onus; he has not proved—and the best proof would have been the evidence of insolvent himself— that the insolvent did nit contemplate the sequestration of his estate, and therefore the presumption raised by the eighth section of the Act does apply in the present case. It is said, there was no intention to prefer one creditor before another. If in the present case there was a contemplation of sequestration of the estate, the inference is clear that he must have intended to prefer one creditor to the others. If at the time when he made this payment he contemplated the sequestration of his estate, he must have known that the effect of the payment would be to deprive the other creditors of a portion of their debts and to give the defendant a considerable preference over his other creditors, and that his act arises necessarily from the contemplation of the sequestration. For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed, and judgment must be for the plaintiff, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

JONES v. JONES. { 1903. May 20th.

This was an action, instituted by Alfred Herbert Jones, of Cape Town, for divorce from his wife, Helena Maria Jones (born Adams), on the ground of her adultery with one Georgia, and plaintiff also asked for custody of the child of the marriage. Mr. Close appeared for the plaintiff, and the defendant was unrepresented.

Charles Wm. Henry Smith, clerk in charge of the marriage registers at the Colonial Office, produced evidence as to the marriage.

Alfred Herbert Jones, the plaintiff, said he was married in August, 1893, to the defendant at S. Paul's Church, Cape Town. For two years he lived ashore with his wife. Then he went away as a sailor on one of the coasting steamers. He left his wife with her mother; she was provided for. When he came back, her mother made a statement as to his wife's misconduct with another man. Witness forgave his wife, and they went to Johannesburg together, but afterwards returned to Cape Town, and took a house in Primrose-street, where they remained in 1897 and 1898, and then witness went as cook on a coaster. He left his wife in a house with sufficient money to meet her requirements. When he returned, he found that she had gone back to her mother, and a quarrel ensued between them. He endeavoured several times to induce her to return to him, but she declined. He then went to Natal, and on his return he found that his wife was living with the man Georgia. This was early in 1901. He instituted proceedings for a divorce, but the action collapsed, because he could not serve the papers on his wife, as she could not be traced. He again went to Natal, and took with him the little boy born of the marriage. In December last he discovered that his wife was again in Cape Town, and he made inquiries, with the result that he found that since 1898 she had given birth to three children, of whom the man Georgia was the father. When he told her that he would proceed against her for divorce, she said "Yes, you can go; here's the proof" (pointing to the children).

Rachel Combrinck gave corroborative evidence.

Decree of divorce granted, with custody of the child of the marriage to the plaintiff.

DAVIS BROS. AND BEEN V. DOYLE AND CO. } 1903. May 20th.

Sale and purchase—Latent defect—Redhibitory action.

The purchaser of certain gramophone slot machines accepted them and credited the seller with the price, but after keeping them for several weeks he claimed the right to return them on the ground that they were in a defective condition. The defect complained of was not latent, but could have been discerned on the slightest examination, and, moreover, the purchaser knew that the machines were sold because they did not work properly.

Held, that the purchaser was not entitled to succeed in the redhibitory action.

This was an action for breach of contract.

The declaration set out that the parties to the suit resided in Cape Town, that they entered into a verbal agreement on the 1st July, 1902, by which the plaintiffs were to be supplied by the defendants with six phonograph machines, which were to be delivered within two months, that that agreement was reduced to writing on the 21st July, but that this document omitted all reference to the period in which the machines were to be delivered; that the defendants, although repeatedly requested to deliver the said machines, had failed to do so, that plaintiff paid on deposit £8 in cash, that the parties afterwards agreed that the plaintiffs should return to the defendants two gramophone machines, that the said gramophone machines were returned on the 20th October, and that plaintiffs were entitled to £16 therefor, that plaintiffs had, by reason of the breach of contract in connection with the phonograph machines, lost the profits which they would have derived on the said machines, and they asked for judgment in the sums of £8, £16, and £100 damages; also, for alternative relief and costs of suit.

The defendants, in their plea, admitted that on the 1st July the parties entered into a verbal agreement, which was subsequently, on the 1st October, reduced to writing. In the said agreement it was arranged that the defendants should supply the plaintiffs with the said phonograph machines upon a deposit of £10, and a further sum of 30s. per week, until the purchase price of £82 was paid off, when the said machines should become the property of the plaintiffs. Defendants denied that they agreed to deliver the said machines to the plaintiffs within two months, or that the said written agreement was entered into about the middle of July; they also said that they tendered delivery of the said machines within a reasonable time after the said agreement was entered into, and that the plaintiffs refused to accept delivery. The said machines were still held at the disposal of the plaintiffs, and were hereby tendered. As to the gramophones, they were delivered to the defendant, but were not in good order, and were in a defective condition, and defendants denied that any sum of £16 was due to the plaintiffs. Defendants prayed that the plaintiffs' claim should be dismissed, with costs. The defendants also filed a claim in reconvention, in which they said that the plaintiffs only paid to them £8, and not £10, as alleged, and they claimed to be entitled to £2, in addition to the deposit already received on account of the plaintiffs' breach of contract, and also to £27, being the rent of the said machines from the 1st November, 1902, to the 28th March, 1903, at 30s. per week.

Plaintiffs, in their replication, said that the verbal agreement was entered into with the defendants on the 1st July, and that the phonographs were to be delivered within two months. They denied that they were indebted to the defendants in the sum of £27, and prayed that the claim in reconvention be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Rainsford for the plaintiffs; Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Alexander) for the defendants.

David Davis, one of the plaintiffs, said he saw the defendant Doyle in July last. Witness was accompanied by his partners. They gave him an order for six phonograph machines, and a deposit of £8 was paid. The arrangement was that the machines should be taken on the hire purchase system, with option to purchase. They agreed to pay £26. £8 was paid in cash. Mr. Doyle owed witness £2 at the time, and he agreed to accredit witness with the sum. The contract was not reduced to writing. The order was put in the book, and witness signed it. It was agreed between them that the machines should be delivered within two months.

Mr. Gardiner objected to evidence being led on this point, seeing that the contract between the parties was subsequently reduced to writing.

Mr. Rainsford urged that he was entitled to lead parole evidence, as long as it was not inconsistent with the written document.

The Chief Justice said he thought they might take it that two months was a reasonable time for delivery.

Mr. Rainsford called on the other side for the production of the order book.

Mr. Gardiner said he was instructed that there was no order book.

Witness, continuing, said he signed the document produced. At that time the blanks were not filled in. Doyle said he had not time then to fill in the blanks, but he would fill them in afterwards and send witness a copy. The contract was signed about the 1st July, and not in October. They agreed to take six phonograph machines of the value of £82 under this contract. Witness got a copy sent in to the Magistrate's Court. He had had previous business with Doyle. He called on Doyle about the end of August respecting the machines; he was accompanied by his two partners. Doyle showed him a letter, which stated that the machines could not be made in London, and that they would have to be made in New York, and that it would take a month longer to execute delivery.

By the Chief Justice: He signed the document two or three weeks after the 1st July, when the document was produced.

Witness, in further evidence, said he next went to see Doyle on the 1st October. Doyle was away, and he left a message with his manager, who said it would take another one or two days; they were expecting the machines. Witness did not get the machines. They called in every day two or three times a day, but he never delivered the machines, although he always said he would deliver them in a day or two. He had engaged places for the machines, and had lost the places, as he could not put in the machines by the 28th October. He sustained £100 damage in consequence. The machines were lying in Doyle's shop in Plein-street in October. He said he should want some time to fix up the machines. On the 28th October they again called, and witness told him to give him the reason why he did not want to let him have the machines. Doyle's manager said he did not want to let him have the machines, as he could sell them for cash every morning. Doyle agreed to credit him with £16 on the gramophone machines returned by witness to the defendant. Witness returned the gramophones to the defendant, who was still in possession of these machines. This was on the 24th October; the defendant gave them the receipt for £16. It was not until witness had instructed his attorney that the defendant wrote, complaining about the condition of the gramophones. Witness estimated his loss at £6 a week owing to the non-delivery of the machines. He had secured places in Long-street, Waterkant-street, and elsewhere. The receipts on the phonographs varied from 25s. to 35s. a week.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: The document was not signed in the presence of any witnesses. He considered that a reasonable time for delivery would be two months. On the previous order it might have taken two months and 14 days to carry out delivery; he did not remember exactly. That order was cabled, and witness paid the costs of the cable. In the present case the order was not cabled. The first machines which he received in November of the previous year came from America. The machines were similar in this case, and were ordered from the Edison Bell Company. He saw Byrne (defendant's manager) in October, and the latter told him he might take them. The machines were not fixed up. He told Byrne that he would go and look round for public-houses where he could put machines. He had had places arranged from the beginning of October. Witness and his partner called at the store, and fixed up the machines. He did not take them away, however, because Doyle "chucked out" witness and his partner. Doyle would not let them have the trumpets of the machines. Byrne was going to palm off old trumpets instead of new ones. It was not true that he refused to take the machines on the 20th, because he had no places to fix them in. Byrne said that they would have to order the trumpets specially. The £2 he referred to was commission on a sale of a machine to Fernando at five per cent. It was not a condition that he should receive his commission when Fernando paid the bill. The amount really due to witness was £2 10s. As to the gramophones, he sent one back in July, and the other in October. The machines were both in good working order. Witness was summoned in the Magistrate's Court for rent. Exception to jurisdiction was upheld.

Re-examined: There was no complaint before the 31st October as to the condition of the gramophones. He had had previous transactions with Doyle, and trumpets had in each case been supplied with the machines. Doyle was in London part of the time.

The gramophones in dispute were produced in Court and put before the witness for inspection. After he had made a close examination, witness said they were in good condition, practically the same as when he returned them to the defendant, except that the reproducer had been removed from one of the machines.

Barnard Davis, brother and partner of the last witness, and one of the plaintiffs, gave corroborative evidence regarding the terms on which the machines were engaged on July 1. The agreement he signed he alleged was blank, with the exception of the printed portion. The reason for this was that Doyle made the excuse that he was busy at the time, and he promised to give them a proper copy later, but he continually put them off. Witness detailed the various conversations they had with Byrne, the delay that took place in the delivery of the machines (one reason being Byrne's dissatisfaction with the payments), and their incompleteness. They had engaged places, he said, where the machines had to be delivered, but they lost the places in consequence of the non-delivery of the machines in time. Doyle had always given them trumpets with the machines, and a dozen records. The arrangement with the people who allowed the use of the machines on their premises was that they should receive a commission on the takings. Their (plaintiffs') profits would be at least £1 a week for each machine. When the machines were returned they were in good order, and plaintiffs received no complaint until after they had told Doyle they intended bringing an action.

Cross-examined: Witness said he had never signed an agreement in blank before.

Sam Been, one of the plaintiffs, gave evidence in support.

For the defence, Mr. Gardiner called

Dennis Doyle, the defendant, who said that when the plaintiffs ordered the machines on July 1, they paid £8. The agreement was signed on 1st October. The agreement was not blank, but was filled in when it was signed, and Byrne was present at the time. He agreed to take back certain gramophones, and credited the plaintiffs with £16. It was agreed that the machines were to be returned in good condition within ten days. When the two machines were returned they were in bad condition. The winding spring of one was defective, and in the other machine one wheel had cut through the other, so that the machine would not work. It was necessary to send to America for the machines, as they were not supplied in England. The machines were cabled for at plaintiffs' request, they agreeing to pay half the costs, and they were delivered in two months and fourteen days.

Cross-examined: He had previously supplied trumpets with the machines ordered by the plaintiffs. He was not aware that unless the machines were supplied by the 28th October, the plaintiffs would lose the places where it had been arranged to place them. He denied that in regard to the machines in question it was agreed to supply them with trumpets.

John Byrne said he was at present manager for Mr. Doyle in Port Elizabeth, and last year he was manager for him in Cape Town. He was present when the contract was signed, and at that time it was properly filled in. When the machines were delivered, he offered to lend plaintiffs six trumpets for them until trumpets arrived from England. Plaintiffs refused to take the trumpets, as two of them were second-hand. When he supplied trumpets, he charged an extra guinea. Trumpets were not indispensable; the machines could be used with ear tubes. He also described the manner in which the returned machines were damaged.

A machine was produced in Court, and witness explained that it could be used either with a horn or ear tubes. These articles were not supplied with the machines except at an extra charge. They were supplied by different firms to Edison, the manufacturers of the gramaphone.

The Chief Justice: It is no use without a horn or ear tubes?

Witness: It is just the same as buying a scale without weights.

Witness explained the working of the machine.

John William Dyer, bookkeeper to the defendant, gave evidence regarding the signing of the contract. When the machines were returned, he gave a receipt without examining the machines. He had no knowledge of gramophones.

Plaintiffs were re-called to state that when the two gramophones were returned the trumpets accompanied them.

Mr. Rainsford (for plaintiff): It is admitted that these six phonographs were originally ordered on July 1. Mr. Doyle has a printed form for these contracts, and if the contract was signed on the 1st of September, the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of this contract. The machine would be practically useless without the trumpet. Doyle admits that he often gave trumpets with machines, and the plaintiff would have been entitled to refuse acceptance of these machines unless the trumpets were sent with them. The defendant produces no order-book, and in questions of brokerage the custom is that the man who has introduced the business is at once entitled to his commission. It is not clear whether these machines were returned in July or in October, and there is nothing to show that they were in a damaged condition when they were returned. Doyle's evidence that phonographs should be returned within 15 days if not approved is simply incredible.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The Court is not satisfied that the gramophones were in good condition when delivered.]

Mr. Gardiner (for defendant): They may not be in a proper condition now. The one returned on October 24, would not work when produced in Court. I do not press as to the first point of our claim, but I must press our second point very strongly.

Mr. Rainsford in reply.

De Villiers, C. J.: The claim of the plaintiffs is three-fold. They claim, first of all, £8, a deposit which they made at the time when they ordered the phonograph machines from the defendant; secondly they claim the sum of £16, being the price of two gramophone slot machines, which had originally been purchased from the defendants by the plaintiff; and, thirdly, they claim damages for £100 for the defendant's breach of contract. The first and third of these claims must stand or fall together. The breach of contract alleged in the declaration is substantially this, that the machines were not delivered within the time agreed upon. There is a considerable conflict of evidence as to when this contract was really entered into, but the Court is satisfied after hearing witnesses on both sides, that the document purporting to have been executed on October 1 was executed on that date. By that document it is agreed that these phonographs should be delivered at a certain price, and the first clause in the agreement is to this effect: the hirer agrees to pay the owner on delivery a deposit of £10, and on the 1st of November and on each succeeding week a further sum of 30s., while this agreement remains in force or until the full sum of £82 has been paid. The first payment, therefore, has only to be made on November 1. If it be true, as the Court finds it to be true, that this contract was only executed on October 1, then whatever prior arrangement there may have been as to delivery, there was a waiver of this agreement, and the plaintiff now undertook to accept the phonographs under this agreement of the 1st October, and seeing that the first payment was only to be made on the 1st November, I take it that any delivery before the 1st November would be a reasonable time, and would be in terms of the contract. In point of fact, delivery was tendered before the 31st October, and therefore the statement that there was no delivery within the time agreed upon falls entirely to the ground, and the plaintiff must fail. But in the course of the trial a further issue has been raised as to whether the condition in which the phonographs were tendered was such as was agreed upon; but that, unfortunately, was not raised by the pleadings at all. If it had been raised, the defendant might have been prepared to give evidence as to what is usual in the sales of phonographs. The alleged defective condition consists in no trumpets nor ear-tubes having been delivered with these machines. Well, he might have been prepared with evidence to show what is usual in the case of these machines, whether a trumpet or ear-tube is an essential part of the machine, but that issue is not raised. The sole issue raised is whether the tender of the defendant was within a reasonable time, and on that point the Court is undoubtedly with the defendant, and the plaintiffs' must, therefore, fail on the first and third counts of the claim. In regard to the second count, however, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to succeed. It is admitted that the agreement was that the two gramophone slot machines were to be taken back at the price of £16. The defendant accepted these machines, and credited the plaintiff with the price; but after keeping them for several weeks he claimed the right to return them on the ground of their defective condition. The defect complained of could have been discovered on the slightest examination; it was certainly not a latent defect. He knew, moreover, before he bought that the machines were second-hand machines, and that the plaintiffs' sold them because they were not satisfied that they were working properly. Clearly, therefore, the defendant is not entitled to succeed in respect of these machines. But, on the other hand, the defendant by his claim in reconvention claims a sum of £27 for the amount which he would have received as the rent for the hire of these machines, and upon this claim the defendant is entitled to succeed. The phonograph machines were there ready for the defendant. He only now raises the question as to the trumpets, and even then the plaintiffs' were prepared to let him have the loan of trumpets, at all events, to use for these machines, and, seeing that this question of defective condition has not been raised at all, I think the defendant is entitled to claim his rent of £27 in terms of his claim in reconvention. The plaintiff in reconvention, therefore, succeeds to the extent of £27. The plaintiffs, in convention, succeed for £16. There is, therefore, a balance of £11 for the plaintiff in reconvention. Therefore, judgment will be given for the defendant for the sum of £11, and this judgment will have to carry costs.

Kotze, J., concurred in the judgment.

Mr. Gardiner: As to the small amount of £2?

De Villiers, C.J.: As to the £2, I think that commission is payable. The commission, I think, was earned when he brought the customer.

MILLMAN V. SOUTH AFRICAN MILLING COMPANY.

Mr. Searle, K.C., as a matter of urgency, applied for the appointment of a commissioner to take evidence on commission in the case of Thomas Francis Millman, of the British ship Crown of Denmark, v. the South African Milling Co. The action was brought by the plaintiff for the detention of his ship, which brought a cargo of wheat from Portland, Oregon. As the plaintiff was about to leave the country, Mr. Searle applied for his evidence to be taken on commission, and for Mr. Alexander to be appointed commissioner. There was a consent signed by defendants.

Application granted, costs to be cost in the cause.

TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD V. BLACK. {1903. May 20th. „ 22nd.

This was an action brought by the Table Bay Harbour Board against H. B Black, merchant, Cape Town, to recover £149 19s. 7d. on a bill of exchange, together with interest accrued and costs

The declaration set out that in August, 1901, a certain consignment of 400 bundles of iron standards of the value of £149 19s. 7d. were landed by the said Board from the Flensburg, shipped by one De Jong, that the said De Jong directed a bill of exchange to the Standard Bank for £149 19s. 7d. against the defendant, payable at sight; that the defendant did not honour or pay the said bill; that he wrongfully and unlawfully represented to the servants of the plaintiffs that he was entitled to the said standards, and that he had authority to remove them, that he wrongfully, unlawfully, and fraudulently directed that the said standards be delivered to White, Ryan, and Co.; that he caused the standards to be delivered to the said White, Ryan, and Co., and that as a consequence the plaintiffs wholly lost control and custody thereof; that the Standard Bank instituted proceedings in this Court against the Harbour Board to recover £149 19s. 7d., which defendant had not paid to the said bank, that the plaintiffs thereupon paid the said sum of £149 19s. 7d., with interest and costs to the said bank, and received from the said bank cession of all its right of action against the defendant in respect of such standards, also cession of the said bill of lading and exchange; that plaintiffs were entitled to demand redelivery of the said standards, defendant having neglected to pay the said sums or any part thereof. In the alternative the plaintiffs claimed £163 15s. 5d. by way of damages.

The defendant's plea set forth that the said De Jong was not entitled to draw a bill of exchange upon him as alleged. He said that 400 standards arrived by the Erna, that it was the duty of the plaintiffs to deliver the said standards to the defendant, or such persons as he might direct, and that he gave instructions that they were to be delivered to White, Ryan, and Co.; he also said he gave no instructions for the delivery of standards from the Flensburg, and that he did not receive the standards now in dispute either from the plaintiffs or any other persons; he denied that he gave false or fraudulent or unlawful directions. He asked that the claim be dismissed with costs.

Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. Alexander) for plaintiffs. The defendant in person.

De Villiers, C.J. (to the defendant): Why do you not have counsel to assist you?

Defendant said this matter had been dragging on for two years. He was recently given to understand that he should hear no more about it, but about a month ago he had a communication from Mr. Robb to make a deposit of £50 to cover certain fees, etc.

De Villiers, C.J.: What is your defence?

The defendant now said his defence was that he did not receive the standards in dispute, that all the standards that he did receive he paid for, and that he never instructed the plaintiffs to deliver the standards in dispute to anybody else. The only instruction he gave to the plaintiffs was with regard to the standards ex. the S.S. Erna.

Mr. Buchanan: I can show that he sold both consignments, and that he got payment for both.

Frank Robb, assistant general manager of the Harbour Board, said they received the cargo of standards to defendant by the Flensburg. They were found there when the Board took over the landing work in October, 1901. The goods had been lying at the Basin since August, 1901. The Flensburg discharged into lighters in the Bay. The standards were delivered to R. M. Ross and Co. by the general direction of the defendant. Defendant did not give any order to witness. They had no written order from the defendant. In November, 1901, the Board got another similar consignment for defendant by the sailing ship Erna; this boat came to the West Quay. The latter consignment was delivered to one of the military transports on the South Arm. The Erna came in on the 2nd November; the goods were not cleared until the 27th November. The consignment was delivered to the order of Joseph Black and Co., really authorised by Divine, Gates and Co., clearing agents to the Standard Bank.

De Villiers, C.J., said there was no need to go into the question of what the Erna delivered.

Witness, proceeding said that the Flensburg consignment was delivered to R. M. Ross and Co. The bank then produced the bill of exchange and lading, and claimed the amount of £149-19s. 7d. from the Harbour Board.

De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose this was done in the early part of the Board's taking over the work? I suppose they would not part with goods under similar circumstances now?

Witness: No. Continuing his evidence, witness spoke to a letter having been addressed to the defendant, pointing out that the claim of the Standard Bank had had to be paid, and that the bank had ceded all rights of action against defendant to the Board. It was not possible that there could have been confusion between the two consignments, because they would be off-loaded on different dates and from different parts of the Docks The tickets produced were those of the consignment delivered to R. M. Ross and Co. between the 6th and 13th November from the Basin. The Board had not been paid for these goods.

Cross-examined by defendant: It was not customary for the Board to deliver goods out of the Docks on a verbal message. He did not know whether defendant was importing large consignments of standards at that time, and that he had about 8,000 standards in the Docks. Defendant said that he had received the standards at his store from the Flensburg, and he sent them back again. He returned the goods to the Docks; he passed no entries.

Mr. Buchanan: We can prove that they were sent back again and accepted by the defendant.

Edwin George White, of the firm of White, Ryan and Co., said that his firm had a transaction with the defendant early in November in regard to 400 bundles of standards. His firm subsequently sold the goods to R. M. Ross and Co. At the time of the purchase defendant told them that they were on the traction engine trailers at the Docks. Defendant was paid for the goods on the 7th December, but they were placed to the defendant's credit on the 15th November. Witness did not remember that the defendant told them which vessel the goods came by. The goods were delivered between the 6th and 15th November. Defendant went down to the Docks and authorised delivery to witness's firm with their shipping clerk. R. M. Ross and Co. were pressing for delivery, and delivery was made thereafter.

Gilbert Richard Maltravers, of the Standard Bank, said that in August, 1901, De Jong had two bills against the defendant; one was received in July, and the other in August. Both bills were of exactly the same amount, and were payable at sight. The bills were presented to the defendant, but he had only paid the one representing the Erna shipment. When the Flensburg bill was presented to the defendant he said he would pay when the goods arrived. It was frequently presented to him afterwards, and he still said he would pay when the goods arrived. The Bank did not give the defendant any authority to remove the goods from the Flensburg.

Robert Thompson, quay superintendent, Victoria Basin, said he remembered standards being landed about August, 1901, from the Flensburg. They were marked either "H.B.," or "H.B.B." Mr. Black came down one afternoon with Mr. Leonard. Witness had nothing to do with the Erna standards at the West Quay. The defendant spoke to witness about the standards lying there, which he said were his. Witness next got an order from Mr. Leonard to deliver the goods to H. B. Black. Mr. Leonard was at that time assistant to the district superintendent. The goods were sent up, but were returned, and then Black asked that the goods should be sent up again, and this was done upon his payment of a fine of £9 for extra cartage. The goods were delivered to Ross and Co. Witness was quite sure that the standards in question had been consigned by the Flensburg.

Guy Leonard, clerk in the Harbour Board's employ at the Docks, said that defendant came and saw him at the pier head, to give him instructions to get some standards delivered to him that were at the Basin. He saw Mr. Thompson, and asked him to load up the standards, which were lying at the Basin. He gave his instructions verbally. Written instructions would be in the hands of the quay superintendent before delivery was allowed. He knew that the goods were sent to H. B. Black at Waterkant-street, that they were returned, and that a fine was paid for extra cartage.

Cross-examined by the defendant: He did not remember which ship the iron standards came by.

De Villiers, C.J., asked if duty was payable on the standards.

Mr. Buchanan: No, free entry.

De Villiers, C.J., said that there should surely be some note kept by the Customs.

Mr. Buchanan said that there was no record in the Customs.

Witness mentioned that supervision at the Docks was somewhat lax at the time.

Michael van Breda Albertyn produced the manifest of the S.S. Offenbach, and said that there were no standards conveyed by that boat for the defendant.

This concluded the evidence for the plaintiffs.

Defendant said that he received one cargo, for which he met the draft.

George Hopkinson, defendant's storeman, said he remembered a lot of standards coming up to the store about two years ago. They were sent back to the Docks. Defendant told the man who was by that the standards did not belong to him.

Defendant then went into the box, and said that he never received the alleged cargo from the Flensburg. He had been told by several people that the standards in question had been delivered to a firm of engineers.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He had transactions with De Jong for more than two years. He bought 12,000 standards from De Jong. He only had one invoice, and one bill of lading from De Jong in November, 1901. The Bank only presented one bill of exchange up to November; that was for the Erna. The question of the bill from the Flensburg was not brought under his notice until December.

De Villiers, C.J., asked the defendant if, in the event of the case being postponed, he would be able to show by what vessel the 400 bundles which were sold to White, Ryan and Co., and delivered to Ross and Co., arrived.

The Defendant: Yes; I shall be able to do that.

De Villiers, C.J.: The case will be adjourned until Friday morning, so that you can bring that evidence.

Potsea, May 22.

The defendant went into the box, and stated that he had been unable to trace the bill of lading. He had been absent in England, and his business was discontinued for eighteen months. He had been unable to find any bills of lading which went back beyond July of last year, and the consignment in question was alleged to have been delivered in November, 1901.

De Villiers, C.J. (to defendant): Surely you have something to prove this simple question. There were certain standards sold by you to White, Ryan and Co., and subsequently delivered to R. M. Ross and Co. What the Court wants you to show is what boat did these standards came by.

Defendant: Unfortunately, I am not able to give it. I may say I sold not one or two lots, but several to White Ryan and Co.

De Villiers, C.J., remarked that the defendant's evidence was unsatisfactory, and that the Harbour Board ought to have brought stronger proof than they had adduced. The case was as incomplete on the one side as on the other. Here they had the document as to the delivery of the standards to R. M. Ross and Co., which said that the standards came from the Offenbach and not from the Flensburg.

Mr. Buchanan: Yes, but I explained that.

De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, explained it in a way. The manner in which the Harbour Board did their work is incomprehensible There is no document to show how these things were delivered, nothing to show how they got through the Customs to R. M. Ross and Co.'s, and there surely ought to be some official documents by which the goods delivered to R. M. Ross and Co. may be identified. At present they cannot be identified. I think the case should stand over for further evidence on both sides. The plaintiffs will then have an opportunity of fortifying their case. There ought to be something to enable you to trace the goods from the Flensburg into the stores of R. M. Ross and Co. You must try and get something. At present the matter is too vague.

Mr. Buchanan: The defendant must be bound down to some statement of his case. He has thrown over his plea, and has given three or four versions.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is now reduced to a very simple issue—whether the goods which came from the Flensburg were the goods which were delivered to R. M. Voss and Co., and it ought to be as easy for the plaintiff as for the defendant to prove this. The matter will therefore stand over.

NEDERLANDSCHE BANK V. WILSON AND ANOTHER.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £1,000 in favour of one Caisse.

Mr. Buchanan read the affidavit of one of the defendant (Mallet), which stated that, although the promissory note was for £1,000, defendants had only received benefit to the extent of £400—£250 in cash and £150 in goods. The bank had sequestrated Caisse's estate, and obtained judgment against him for £1,325, amongst which was the note for £1,000. Defendants stated that if the claim was only pressed so far as the benefit received was concerned, namely, £400, they would be solvent. Deponent also stated that the plaintiffs had agreed that payment under the note should not be enforced until Caisse's estate had been finally liquidated and distributed.

Mr. Van Zyl read the plaintiffs' affidavit, which denied that such a promise was made.

Provisional sentence granted, with costs.

Mr. Buchanan moved for provisional sentence under certain articles of sale for £2,900, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. from the 1st December, 1902, in connection with the purchase of a certain piece of land and buildings situate in Cape Town. ALHEIT'S CASE.
MICHAU'S CASE.
BAILEY'S CASE. { 1903. May 22nd.

Registration of Voters—Qualification—Occupation.

Actual occupation of the requisite premises during the whole of the qualifying period is sufficient to entitle the occupier to be registered as a voter even if he was only a tenant at will. Where the alleged occupier has been absent from the premises during a portion of the qualifying period and it is proved that during such absence he was lawfully excluded from the premises, he cannot be legally regarded as having been in actual occupation during the whole of the qualifying period.

Where, however, there has been no break in the right of occupation, the absence of the occupier during a portion of the qualifying period does not legally constitute a break in his actual occupation, provided that there has been personal occupation for such a portion of the qualifying period as would fairly entitle him to be regarded as one of the inhabitants of the division.

These were arguments on the claims of J. J. Michau, Abram Bailey, and C. W. Alheit, to be registered as Parliamentary voters.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., for the appellant, J. J. Michau, whose application to be placed on the roll of registered voters for the division of Stellenbosch had been refused, said he understood that in this case no one appeared to oppose. Mr. Michau was an attorney practising in Cape Town, and he resided for the greater part of the year at Rondebosch. He, however, had considerable property at Hottentots' Holland, and he was also the owner of four houses at Somerset West. One of these houses, he claimed, gave him qualification under the occupation clause. Mr. Michau was the Mayor of Somerset West Strand, and he stated that he went down there three times each month. He had been removed, on his own application, from the list for the Cape Division, and he now asked to be enrolled on the Stellenbosch list. Counsel submitted that the claim was a good one, and that Mr. Michau had a sufficient qualification within the meaning of the eighth section of the Constitution Ordinance. Counsel contended that occupation within the meaning of the Act did not necessarily imply permanent residence, and he urged that, so far as Somerset Strand was concerned, the claimant was the bona fide occupier of the house in question.

De Villiers, C.J., intimated that the Court would take time to consider its decision.

Mr. Schreiner, K.C., also appeared for the appellant, Abram Bailey.

Mr. Burton said that he appeared for the other side, but he had no objection that he wished to press.

Mr. Schreiner said that the applicant was the owner of a farm in the district of Colesberg, but the farm was in the care of his manager. The applicant had a bedroom solely reserved for his use, in respect of which he claimed that he was entitled to be placed on the voters' roll. Counsel argued the case at some length, and said that an important point to be remembered was that the house formed no part of the manager's emoluments, and that if he wished to be registered, it would have to be under the salary qualification. Counsel also stated that applicant had occupied the bedroom from forty to fifty days since 1899.

De Villiers, C.J., intimated that in this case also the Court would take time to consider its decision.

In the case of C. W. Alheit, Mr. Burton was for the claimant, and Mr. Benjamin was for the objector.

Mr. Burton said that the appellant resided with 108 other students at an establishment called The Home, at Stellenbosch, which was under the superintendence of Professor De Vos. The first question raised appeared to be as to the power of the superintendent to transfer the occupiers from one room to another at his discretion. The facts found by the Civil Commissioner, as the Registering Officer, was that Alheit had got in this Home the sole use of a room worth £100. The value, then, was within the requirement of the law as to qualification. He paid £100 for board and lodging. He paid £9 a quarter for the use of the room. The first question that presented itself was whether the fact that the superintendent had power to transfer him from one room to another could do away with his right bona fide to claim a vote for such room.

De Villiers, C.J., said the important question was whether the fact that the superintendent had the power to exclude the appellant from the rooms for certain months of the year during the long vacation disqualified him?

Mr. Burton said he would deal with that point. During the long vacation, from the middle of December to the end of January, the room had to be locked up. In this matter he had to take his stand upon the same contention that had been raised by his learned friend (Mr. Schreiner) in the two previous cases, viz., that what was required under our law for the purpose of being registered in respect to property was occupation, and that occupation, under our law, did not imply residence. He was bound to admit, upon the authority which he should refer to, if residence were required from the students, if it were necessary that he should prove that these students resided in this place for twelve months, he should have no case. But if it were the case that our law required, in respect to the property qualification, occupation, and that occupation did not imply residence, then he submitted that the fact that he was subject to a rule during certain months of the year that the room should be locked up, and that he must not reside there, he submitted that it did not deprive him of occupation. If the term occupation implied residence, then three-fourths of the merchants of Cape Town would be disqualified from voting in respect of their business premises. Thousands in a large city like Cape Town would be disqualified.

De Villiers, C.J.: Do you mean that a man living in England, and having a place of business here, would be entitled to be registered as a voter here?

Mr. Burton: It may seem very unsatisfactory that it should be so, but I submit that it is the law.

De Villiers, C.J.: You must read all the Acts together, and take the spirit of the Acts, and not quote particular sections merely.

Mr. Burton said that what he did rely upon was the enacting sections of the Constitution Ordinance. He submitted that the distinction to be drawn was as between mere occupation and inhabitance. A constructive occupation might be urged on behalf of a man who owned a house somewhere, but who made no use of that house. Occupation referred to under our law, he contended, meant the bona fide use in some respect or another of premises of the required value. He claimed that Mr. Alheit was in bona fide occupation of his room in the quarter, and that the fact that he held that room under a condition that he, in common with everybody else, was only to reside there during a certain period, whatever effect it may have had on his residence had no effect upon his occupation. Counsel contended that the break of residence during the period of twelve months could not affect Mr. Alheit's bona fide occupation of the room during that period.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is not necessary to hear Mr. Benjamin on behalf of the objector to Alheit's claim. The occupation which entitles a person to be registered as a voter must be an "actual occupation" in terms of the last proviso to the 8th section of the Constitution Ordinance. Whatever these terms might mean in other statutes, there are many indications in the Ordinance and in the Acts relating to registration that occupation in order to be "actual" requires the personal presence of the occupier. For instance, the notice to be given to claimants under the 14th section of the Ordinance assumes that only persons who are "inhabitants" can claim to have their names inserted in the voters' list. By the Act 9 of 1892, which imposes the education test, but reserves the existing rights of persons then already registered, such reservation is confined, under the 3rd section, to persons who "continue to reside in the division" in which they were so registered. Again, the 7th section of Act 48 of 1899 imposes on the registering officer the duty of inserting in the list framed by him the names of all persons in the existing register, except, among others, the names of those who do not reside or earn salary or wages in the field-cornetcy, and further, to insert the names of all persons not on the existing register who possess the necessary qualifications, and (a) reside within his field-cornetcy (b) earn salary or wages within his field-cornetcy. Reliance, however, has been placed by the claimant on the 3rd section of the Act of 1899, which requires residence in the case of persons claiming the wages or salary qualification, but is silent as to such residence in regard to the occupation qualification. The reason of such silence appears to me that, as the occupation required is an actual occupation, it was deemed unnecessary to refer to the residence of the occupier, and this view is confirmed by the proviso to the section which refers to both classes of voters in the following terms: "Provided that a person who is qualified to be registered as a voter on the day on which any registration of voters shall commence shall not cease to be qualified by reason that such person shall take up his residence in another electoral division after such day." In view of these and other indications of the intention of the Legislature I cannot accede to the view that a person residing elsewhere, say in England, but owning a place of business in this colony, is entitled to be registered as a voter in the division where the business premises are situated by virtue of his constructive occupation of such premises. His personal presence may not be required for every day of the year, but he must have been in personal occupation of the premises for a sufficient time during the requisite period immediately preceding the registration as to satisfy the registering or revising officer as to his actual and bona fide occupation. If during the qualifying period there is a break not only in his actual occupation, but also in his right of occupation, the 3rd section of Act 48 of 1899 is not complied with, and registration cannot be allowed. In the case of Alheit there clearly was such a break. During the greater part of the year preceding the registration he occupied jointly with other students a dwelling-house of sufficient value, but during the long vacation, which lasts from the middle of December to the end of January, all the students have to leave (unless special permission to stay is given by the conductors of the establishment) and the place is locked up. This rule appears to me to to be fatal to Alheit's claim to be registered. If he had remained in personal occupation during the preceding vacation he would, notwithstanding the existence of the rule, have been entitled to be registered, for, as has already been decided, a person may be registered even if he has occupied at the will of the owner provided only there had been actual occupation. So also, if no rule had existed preventing his access during the vacation, his occupation would have been regarded as continuous, and he would have been entitled to registration notwithstanding his voluntary absence during vacation. But where the alleged occupier has been absent during a portion of the qualifiying period, and it is proved that during such absence he was lawfully excluded from the premises it is impossible to hold that there has been a legal occupation during the requisite period. The claim of Alheit must therefore be disallowed.

MICHAU'S CASE.

In regard to Michau, he owns property of the required value at Somerset West, and, during the qualifiying period, has from time to time occupied the premises either by himself or along with his family. The objection to his registration has been withdrawn, and it may therefore be assumed that he has not, during any of his periods of absence, let the premises to anyone else. If he had so let them there would have been a break in his right of occupation, and there would consequently have been such an interruption of his actual occupation as would have disentitled him from being registered. It would be difficult to lay down any general rule as to the number of days during which the personal presence of the occupier is required to establish his actual and bona fide occupation. An occasional presence merely for the purpose of giving colour to the claim for registration would not be enough, but there should be a personal occupation for such a period as would fairly entitle the occupier to be regarded as one of the inhabitants of the electoral division. Mr. Michau may be fairly so regarded, for not only does he for a few months in the year reside together with his family at Somerset West, but he is a Mayor of the place, and frequently visits it in order to attend to his duties as member of the Municipal Council. His claim must, therefore, be allowed.

A. BAILEY'S CASE.

The case of Bailey appears to me to be of a much more doubtful nature, and if the objection to his claim had not been withdrawn I should have found some difficulty in upholding his claim. The property, by virtue of which he claims his qualification, is of sufficient value, but it would appear that from 1899 to 1903 he has only resided on the premises for forty or fifty days. The Revising Officer must have found that the greater part of that period of personal occupation occurred during the year immediately preceding the registration, for otherwise it is difficult to conceive how the claim could have been admitted The finding is upon a question of fact, and the Court will not disturb it, more especially in view of the circumstances that the objector at the Revising Court has practically withdrawn his objections in this Court. The claim will, therefore, be allowed.

J. Maasdorp concurred.

Kotze, J.: I concur in the judgments which have just been delivered, and for the same reasons. The first point to be decided is what is the meaning of the words "actual occupation" occurring in the Acts. There may be such a thing as constructive occupation," and by that I understand a real occupation, where the personal or residential element must come in during the statutory period. Now, in the case of Alheit, it is candidly admitted by Mr. Burton that there is an interruption of actual occupation, there is no free access, the claimant Alheit cannot go there at any time and say, "I insist on occupying this room," the professor who conducts the home has a right to say that during certain periods he will not allow him to occupy the room. The case, therefore, falls within the decision cited from 16, Q.B.D., 231. With reference to the other two cases, we find that, in that of Mr. Michau, he for some three months of the year off and on resides at Somerset West Strand, in the electoral division of Stellenbosch, and, therefore, I think, seeing that a person can only now have one vote, he has substantiated his claim. There does not appear to be anything to show that while he is not at Somerset West with his family somebody else is in actual occupation of the premises. We must assume that he has free control of and access to the premises at all times during the year. I therefore think he has proved his claim. In regard to the claim of Bailey, there the case may not be quite so strong, but still Bailey claims to be registered as a voter, and it is also stated that since 1899 he has resided for 40 days on his farm. I think, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, and the objections not being pressed that were raised before the Revising Officer, and no one appearing in support of them, we must take it that the Revising Officer satisfied himself that Bailey was properly qualified, i.e., that he has bona fide resided on the farm for some portion of the previous twelve months. His name has been placed on the Register, and should, upon the case stated, remain there.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte FATTAAR. { 1903. May 22nd.

Mr. Alexander, as a matter of urgency, moved for a writ of attachment against the husband of the petitioner, who, it was declared, had sailed for Bombay in the Burgermeister from Cape Town, on Tuesday last, and who, the petitioner had reason to believe, did not intend to return to this country. The husband of petitioner had left her and the children unprovided for. It was proposed that the writ should be executed against defendant when the boat called at East London, on Saturday, the 23rd inst.

Writ of attachment granted as prayed.

Ex parte HOFMEYR.

Mr. McGregor moved for an order authorising the Master to issue a certain certificate.

It appeared that petitioner was married in community of property, and his wife died in January, 1900, there being three children (still minors) of the marriage. A joint will had been executed, under which, in the event of the testatrix dying first, and testator wishing to contract a second marriage, he would be bound to distribute amongst the children the money which testatrix had inherited—a sum of £1,505, which petitioner had paid into the guardians' fund. Petitioner had asked to be granted a certificate to enable him to enter into a second marriage, but the Master had refused to comply, contending that under the will there was a massing of the estate, and that he could not grant a certificate until petitioner had given security of the payment of five-sixths of the estate, to which the children would eventually be entitled. Petitioner asked for an order authorising the Master to grant a certificate.

In reply to the Court, Mr. McGregor said petitioner was prepared to give security for the material portion of the estate.

Order granted, on condition that security be given by petitioner for 15-48ths of the estate for the benefit of the children of the marriage.

Ex parte VAN DER VYVER.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for a rule nisi under the Derelict Lands Act to be made absolute.

Order granted as prayed.

VAN ONSELEN V. LANDMAN AND ANOTHER. { 1903. May 22nd.

Order of Court—Contempt.

This was an application upon notice to respondents to show cause why an order for personal attachment should not be granted against each of them for contempt of court by their refusing to comply with the terms of a certain award which had been made a Rule of Court.

Mr. Burton was for applicant, and Sir H. Juta, K.C., for respondents.

Mr. Burton read an affidavit by applicant, which set forth that he and respondents were co-proprietors of the farm Hartebeestefontein, 200 morgen in extent, in the division of Humansdorp. The farm was divided by arbitrators, and conditions made for fencing in the lands, the award being made an Order of Court. There was a dam on the farm, which the award laid down should be considered as belonging to all the proprietors, and be open to them for the watering of cattle. Further, the gardens and cultivated land were to be enclosed by proper fences, especially the gardens adjoining the dam, to prevent fowls, pigs, etc., gaining access to the farm. It was alleged that respondents had neglected to properly fence their lands, and applicant had consequently been put to a lot of unnecessary trouble in watering cattle, as he must always have somebody in charge of them.

Sir H. Juta read affidavits from respondents, in which they stated that they had obeyed the order of the Court, and that applicant was in no way interfered with in the free and undisturbed use of the dam.

In a replying affidavit applicant maintained that poultry and pigs could get through the fences, which were made of wire and bushes, while in places there was no fence.

Maasdorp, J.: I do not think there is any question between applicant and respondents as to the meaning of the award, because according to the affidavits of the respondents they interpret the award as it is interpreted by applicant, but they say they have really carried out the intentions so expressed. It appears there is a certain watering-place which is reserved for the use of all the proprietors who participated in the award, and the roads to this watering-place must be kept open. Consequently, the proprietors had the right to drive their animals to water by all these roads, but it was necessary to make provision to prevent animals getting into the gardens, and consequently the burden of enclosing the ground was thrown upon the proprietors of the gardens. In order to keep poultry, pigs, and fowls out of the gardens, the proprietor of the farm was ordered to make a proper fence. The only question is not as to the intention expressed in the award, but as to whether a proper fence was made. Respondents say they have made a proper fence, and they give some description of it, but it must be of a very unsatisfactory character. They have a wire fence adjacent to the watering-place, and they have put bushes against the fence. A fence so constructed seems to me to be likely to be ineffectual in keeping pigs and fowls out of the gardens. We have the evidence of witnesses who say that the fence is utterly inadequate for the purpose. If that is so it must be apparent to respondents that they have not carried out the intention of the award as they understood it. Under these circumstances, as the award was made a Rule of Court, as the order contained therein is one they are expected to obey, and as they have up to the present made no attempt to comply with the terms of the award in that respect, the Court must now make an order which will compel them to set about performing the terms of the award. It was contended that there may be some difference of opinion between the parties as to whether the fence is a proper fence or not, but I am rather inclined to think respondents refrained from putting up a proper fence, well knowing that the fence was not a proper one. The Court must therefore give an order against respondents, but I think the purpose of this application will be served if the Court merely now orders that respondents shall pay the costs of this application, and give them further opportunity, as they allege there was some misunderstanding, to comply with this portion of the award. If they neglect in the future to carry out the award, a further application can be made, but there can be no difference of opinion as to the meaning of this award. No order of attachment will, however, be made.

Kotze, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

TREVOR v. CHETTY. { 1903. May 23rd.

Sale and purchase—Broker's note—Mutual mistake of seller and purchaser.

T. purchased from C. certain cottages. C. subsequently alleged that certain two cottages had been included in his broker's note by mistake. T. now sued C. for a pro rata return of the price already paid in respect of these two cottages.

Held, that as the evidence disclosed that defendant's broker had led plaintiff to believe that he was buying the two cottages in question, defendant's mistake could not be set up as a defence against plaintiff's claim.

Semble: Had the mistake of plaintiff and defendant been mutual the latter would have had a good defence.

This was an action for the transfer of certain property at Salt River, the alternative claim being £1,500 damages, and interest a tempore morae.

The defendant was absent on account of sickness, but counsel offering no objection the Court decided to proceed with the case.

The declaration set forth that both parties to the suit were resident in Cape Town. On or about November 20, 1902, the defendant (Sababadae Sockalinga Chetty) sold to the plaintiff, through the former's broker, Ernest Reading, certain land and buildings at Salt River, described in the broker's note as follows: "Certain block of buildings and ground, being properties Nos. 1 to 19 (odd), Alfred-street, Salt River, and certain house adjoining, situated in Maitland-road; also certain two houses in Alfred-street, being Nos. 2 and 4 (even); also shop and eight houses, situated in Maitland-road. All as per diagrams for the sum of £11,000 sterling. Possession and transfer to be given on the 15th December, 1902. £500 being given as deposit, balance to be paid on day of transfer." The defendant duly paid the purchase price to defendant, who, on December 25 caused transfer to be passed to plaintiff of certain land, which he represented to be a transfer of the land and buildings purchased. Thereafter plaintiff discovered that certain land sold (i.e., that upon which the properties Nos. 17 and 15, Alfred-street, Salt River, were built) was not included in the said transfer; and the defendant had failed to effect such transfer. Defendant's plea admitted the sale, but alleged that the terms of the contract of sale were incorrectly stated in the broker's note referred to, and that properties Nos. 17 and 19 were not included in the contract of sale.

Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Buchanan) for plaintiff; Mr. Alexander for defendant.

The plaintiff, Edward Gapper Trevor, stated that he purchased the property from the defendant, according to the broker's note, and he went out to see it in the company of the plaintiff's broker, one Reading. The houses Nos. 1 to 19 (odd), in Alfred-street, were under one roof; houses Nos. 17 and 19 were similar to some of the others. Later, he took out a valuator named Phillips, who made a valuation of all the properties included in the broker's note, and he (plaintiff) subsequently agreed to buy the property, through Reading, for £11,000. The broker's note was drawn up in the defendant's shop, and signed by both plaintiff and defendant. Phillips was also present. After he had closed the bargain, he entered into negotiations with the South African Association for a loan upon the property. Transfer was obtained by the South African Association, as his agents, on December 29, a loan was raised, and a bond was passed. At the time the broker's note was signed, plaintiff agreed with the defendant that they should share the rents for December, he (plaintiff) having to get possession on the 15th of that month. The rents were collected for the month, including those of Nos. 17 and 19. About the end of January he ascertained from the South African Association that the properties Nos. 17 and 19 belonged to one James Short, and that they were not on his (plaintiff's) diagram. Short claimed the rent that had been collected for Nos. 17 and 19. Plaintiff demanded transfer of Nos. 17 and 19 from defendant, but he refused. For houses of the same value as Nos. 17 and 19, plaintiff received £3 5s. per month for each, but he had contemplated raising the rent. Rents were going up everywhere.

By Mr. Alexander: He first went out to see the property on November 20 or 21, accompanied by defendant's broker. The broker was not acting for both parties in the transaction, but he (plaintiff) looked upon him as his own agent for the time. The defendant never pointed out Nos. 17 and 19 as part of the property. Plaintiff was led to believe so by his brother.

By the Court: Defendant was not present when his brother spoke to plaintiff.

Cross-examination (continued): He had met Mr. Reading only once or twice before the transaction; he arranged with Reading to buy the property before he saw defendant. There was a delay with the transfer, because the papers were not ready, the solicitors not having received instructions to get the papers by the 15th.

Mr. Alexander: At the time when the sale was concluded, it was distinctly understood between you that you were purchasing what Chetty bought from Cosay, and the transfer to be given by Cosay would be given by you?

Sir H. Juta objected to the question, on the ground that it was seeking to vary a contract by oral evidence.

Mr. Alexander contended that it was one of those cases where oral evidence was admissible, because the pleadings raised a mutual mistake.

The Court held that the pleadings did raise a case of mutual mistake, and that if the defendant could prove this, he was entitled to succeed. The evidence would, therefore, be admissible.

Continuing, plaintiff replied to the question with a decided negative. He distinctly understood he was buying the whole block, otherwise he would not have entered into the transaction. Cosay's name might have been mentioned amongst the tenants of the property, but not as the owner of Nos. 17 and 19. Plaintiff admitted there were discrepancies in the broker's note; the "certain two houses" in Alfred-street (Nos. 2 and 4) consisted of one house, with two front doors. If shops were counted as separate properties, there would be twenty-one altogether. He did not obtain a list from Cosay before he bought the property, but he saw a list of what Chetty thought of raising them to. The list handed him (list produced) was not what he saw before the sale. In that list he noticed certain discrepancies; in some cases, the prices were raised. When it was shown him, he did not say at once that Nos. 17 and 19 were not included; he gave it only a very cursory glance. He asked for a statement of rents before the sale was concluded. The owner wanted £1,000 for the two houses; similar houses brought in £3 5s. per month, but the house next to it only £2 17s. 6d. Neither the defendant nor his broker told plaintiff that the property had been bought from Cosay. He might or might not have heard it from the tenants. The broker's note was an exact copy of the rough copy. He knew now that Chetty paid Cosay £9,500 for the property, but he did not know it at the time. Mr. Reading said he thought the figure was £10,000 or £10,500. That was for the property as pointed out on the spot by Mr. Reading—the whole block. His words were: "It is right up to where the new buildings are going up."

Re-examined: Reading pointed out Nos. 17 and 19 to him; they were both under the same roof as the other houses. Witness would not have bought the property unless he was having the whole block. When he went to raise a bond on the property, and when he gave authority to increase rents, he included Nos 17 and 19.

By Maasdorp, J.: Witness had no personal negotiations with defendant until after the broker's note was signed.

By Kotze, J.: When witness told the S.A. Association to collect the rents he did not specially mention Nos. 17 and 19, but gave instructions regarding the property as a whole.

William Henry Phillips, auctioneer, stated that he went out with Trevor to value the property. He included Nos. 17 and 19 in the valuation, and valued the two at £350 each.

Mr. Buchanan read the evidence, taken on commission, of Mr. Reading, who stated that S. M. Chetty, defendant's brother, took him out to see the property in November last. At that time witness was fully under the impression that S. M. Chetty was the owner of the property, as he had received all instructions from him. Chetty's instructions were that he had twenty houses and two shops for sale at Salt River, the houses in Alfred-street were, witness was instructed, the odd numbers from 1 to 19 inclusive. When Chetty showed him the property he (Chetty) walked along the terrace to No. 19, after pointing out No. 1. Witness met Trevor the next day and pointed him out the property in exactly the same way as Chetty had previously pointed it out to him. Witness valued Nos. 17 and 19 at £1,250 the pair. He did not hear the name of Cosay until after the broker's note was signed. Witness sold solely and wholly according to what was pointed out to him, and not according to diagrams.

This closed plaintiff's case.

Mr. Alexander called

Sabba M. Chetty, defendant's brother, who stated that in November last his brother owned certain property at Salt River, which he had bought from Cosay in September previous. Witness went with Reading to Salt River, and showed him the property saying simply, "This block and T block," but he did not indicate each particular house. He never pointed out Nos. 17 and 19. Reading and plaintiff afterwards came to defendant's shop, and witness gave Reading a rent list, which he had obtained from Cosay. That list contained the numbers of all the houses they had to sell, but it did not include Nos. 17 and 19, which never belonged to defendant. Defendant paid Cosay £9,500 for the property.

By Maasdorp, J.: Witness's brother asked him to carry through the business for him with Reading.

Peter Carl Schroder, assistant in defendant's shop, said that he remembered Trevor coming to the shop and having a conversation with defendant regarding the property, in the course of which the diagram was mentioned, and also Cosay's name.

Jacob Cosay deposed that he sold the property in question on behalf of his wife to defendant. Nos. 17 and 19, which were painted in a different manner to the other houses in the terrace, were not included in the transaction.

Mr. Alexander explained that he was unable to call the defendant, he being unwell.

Sir H. Juta said plaintiff was quite prepared to cancel the sale and have his money back.

Mr. Alexander having been heard in argument, on the evidence,

Maasdorp, J.: In this case plaintiff claims the transfer of certain two properties, which he alleges he purchased from defendant, or in the alternative he claims damages in the sum of £1,500 for breach of contract. Plaintiff sets up a claim, and bases it upon a broker's note, which has been put in, and on the face of that note it would appear—if the note is correct—that plaintiff purchased these two properties, and would now be entitled to transfer. If plaintiff succeeds in proving that this property was sold by defendant to him he would be entitled to transfer whatever mistake might have been made by defendant himself in the transaction. But it would be a different matter if it was proved that there was a mutual mistake in the acceptance of the broker's note by these two parties. The question was raised whether the point that a mutual mistake was made was raised on the pleadings, and it seems to me that it is raised there, because there is an allegation on defendant's plea that the properties were not included in the contract of purchase and sale. That I take to mean this, that neither plaintiff nor defendant intended to include in that contract the two properties in question but subsequently, when they came to make a written agreement, they both made a mistake in accepting the broker's note, in which the properties were included. The Court has now to decide whether there was a mutual mistake by virtue of which defendant is entitled to escape from the terms of this contract. We have the very strongest evidence given by the broker in this case, who acted during the greater part of the negotiations as agent for the seller, that he was instructed by the seller's brother—who was appointed by the seller to negotiate for him—to sell these two properties to plaintiff. The broker alleges that the sale was completed by his instrumentality on the instructions of the defendant's brother. If we accept the evidence given by the broker, the case for the plaintiff is proved, because if representation was made by the broker that he was selling Nos. 17 and 19, then no mistake was made by the plaintiff when he accepted the broker's note, including the two properties, as the true contract. I think the evidence is strong that plaintiff was induced to purchase in consequence of representations made by defendant's agent that he was selling these properties, and defendant has failed in proving that there was any mistake made by plaintiff. If it is once decided that plaintiff bought the property on representations made by defendant, then he is entitled to recover, because no mistake made by defendant can be set up as a defence against plaintiff's claim. If plaintiff intended to purchase all the properties, including Nos. 17 and 19, then he paid a price which covered all of them, and he is entitled to recover the price paid for the properties not transferred. He may recover a pro rata sum, in the shape of a proportionate reduction of the purchase price paid by him for all the properties, or he may have been entitled to damages in consequence of the failure on the part of defendant to complete his contract, but in this case plaintiff is satisfied with merely recovering the proportionate value of these properties, as proved in the evidence. He claims nothing further, and I think he is certainly entitled to at least that. Having paid £11,000 for the properties, including these two houses, and it appearing that the value of these two houses amounts to £700, plaintiff is entitled to recover £700. Judgment will therefore be given for plaintiff for £700 with costs.

Kotze, J., concurred.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D., and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

THE LIQUIDATOR OF CONTAT'S COLLIERIES v. CONTAT. 1903. May 26th July 2nd. ,, 3rd.

Company—Winding up—Liquidator—General bond—Preferent claim.

In the winding up of a mining company the defendant claimed to be ranked as a preferent creditor in respect of a general bond against the company passed in his favour by two life governors, of whom he was one, to secure advances alleged to have been made or to be made by him to the company. Held, that the liquidator was justified in refusing to admit the preferent claim in competition with other creditors of the company without clear proof of the money claimed having been actually advanced.

This was an action brought by the liquidator of Contat's Collieries Estate and Railway Co. against J. E. Contat, now of East London, to recover £2,250, balance of the purchase price of certain properties sold by the company to defendant.

The plaintiff's declaration set out that he had been appointed official liquidator of the company, and that the defendant resided at East London; that the plaintiff, as the duly-authorised agent, held on the 22nd April, 1901, a public auction, and he sold two certain properties upon which the company had leases—portion of a certain farm Zevenfontein, in the district of Albert, and another farm Stewart's Post, in the district of Molteno—for £3,000, payable as to half forthwith and the balance within three months of the date of sale, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date of sale; the defendant on the 24th April, 1901, paid £750, and had failed to pay any further sum; plaintiff prayed for judgment in the sum of £2,250, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum as to £750 from the 22nd April, 1901, and as to £1,500 from the 22nd July, plaintiff, in his capacity of liquidator, tendering the lease and rights in the said property.

Defendant, in his plea, admitted certain of the allegations as to the sale and the amount paid, but said that the company was, prior to the said sale, and still was, subject to a set-off of £3,000 and more, by virtue of a certain mortgage bond, duly passed by the said company in favour of the defendant. He had claimed against the said company in liquidation, and urged that he was entitled to preference. The said claim was the sole preference claim against the company. It was agreed in the conditions of sale that defendant should pay in cash a portion of the purchase price sufficient for the liquidation expenses of the said company, and that the balance of the said purchase price should be set off pro temp against the amount of the said claim. The defendant duly paid in cash, and the plaintiff accepted £750, being the estimated amount of the said liquidation expenses. He admitted that the said lease of the farm Stewart's Post had been cancelled, but denied that the said lease had been cancelled through any default of his. Defendant prayed for the dismissal of the claim, with costs. In his claim in reconvention, the defendant, now the plaintiff, craved leave to refer the Court to the foregoing allegations in the declaration. The plaintiff, now defendant, had not within reasonable time given him the use of the said farm Stewart's Post and the transfer of the said lease and rights. The defendant refused to put plaintiff in possession of the said farms.

The defendant had wrongfully and unlawfully failed and refused to pay the prescribed rent under the lease of the farm Stewart's Post, and the said lease had been cancelled by the lessor of the farm. The defendant, now plaintiff, had lost the benefit of the said farm Stewart's Post, and had been deprived for many months of the use of the said farms, and had sustained damages in the sum of £9,500. Plaintiff claimed the rights and leases of the farm Stewart's Post, and a due and proper liquidation account, and failing compliance with the terms of prayer: (a) £9,500 damages; (b) alternative relief; and (c) costs of suit.

In his replication, plaintiff took exception to the suit by the defendant against him in his individual capacity, and prayed that such part of the claim in reconvention should be dismissed, with costs. The defendant was not entitled, plaintiff said, to the transfer of the rights and leases until he had paid the balance of the purchase price. The plaintiff denied that the lease had been cancelled through his default and neglect. He denied that the defendant was entitled to damages in the sum of £9,500, or any other amount. He admitted that he was not prepared to file a liquidation account. He said that he would be prepared to file an account as soon as the issues in this suit were decided.

The defendant's rejoinder was general.

Mr. Benjamin (with him Mr. Buchanan) for plaintiff; Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Alexander) for defendant.

Mr. Benjamin, in opening the case, said that this was an action to recover £2,250, being the purchase price of certain assets of Contat's Collieries Estate and Railway Co., in liquidation, that were sold by the liquidator, plaintiff in the present action, on the 22nd April, 1901. The conditions of sale stipulated that the purchase price should be paid as to half in cash on the day of sale, and the remaining half of the purchase price three months from date, together with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. The defendant contended that there was an agreement prior to the sale, and subsequently repeated, wherein conditions were signed that he should be entitled to set off a bond of the amount which he claimed. The plaintiff denied that there was this agreement, so that the first point would be as to whether or not there was this agreement, and whether or not this agreement was admissible to vary a written contract, the conditions of sale being signed by the defendant and signed by the auctioneer on behalf of the plaintiff. The second point in the case was with regard to the lapse of one of the interests that were sold by the liquidator in the farms Zevenfontein and Stewart's Post. These leases were held under certain rents by Contat's Collieries, and were sold by the plaintiff as liquidator. The rentals were paid up to a certain day subsequent to the sale by the liquidator, but he did not pay the rentals after that date. In consequence of the non-payment of the rentals after that date, which plaintiff contended should be paid by the defendant, inasmuch as he was the purchaser, the lease of Stewart's Post lapsed. The defendant said plaintiff should have continued to pay the rent of Stewart's Post, so as to keep alive the lease, and that, having failed to do so, he was liable for damages. The defendant likewise said that the plaintiff failed to give him possession and transfer of these two interests, and in consequence of that he had been kept out of these properties all this time, and that he (defendant) was entitled to damages in respect thereto. The second point in the case was as to whether there was any duty on the part of the plaintiff to keep alive this lease, and whether he had, as a matter of fact, which he denied, kept defendant out of the beneficial user of these interests. The third point in the case was that the defendant contended the plaintiff was in default, in not having previously filed a liquidation account. The plaintiff said he had not filed such account, because he had been awaiting the balance of the purchase price, which should have been paid to him, of £2,250, and that until that sum was paid, he could not file his liquidation account.

De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Benjamin): What is the amount of the mortgage?

Mr. Benjamin: It was a general covering bond for £5,000. The amount claimed under this action is £3,000 odd. Counsel submitted that the onus probandi was upon the defendant.

Mr. Upington said that, as far as the pleadings went, there was a great deal in the declaration that the defendant did not admit. As a matter of fact, the plaintiff admitted that he had not tendered to the defendant transfer of the whole of the property. He submitted that it lay upon the plaintiff to show why he had not.

[De Villiers, C.J.: It is more convenient that the plaintiff should go on with his case.]

The plaintiff, John William Robert Edward Pooley, said he was the official liquidator of Contat's Collieries under appointment of the High Court of 1899. Previously to that time there was a voluntary liquidation, which, however, came to naught, and application was made by Mrs. Field and other creditors for an official liquidator. The defendant applied to be appointed official liquidator, but witness was selected. Witness investigated the affairs of the company as far as he could from the books and papers in Kimberley, and after that he made a personal inspection of the properties in situ. He found certain leases of the properties Zevenfontein and Stewart's Post originally granted to Contat himself, and subsequently ceded by him to Contat's Collieries. At the time of his appointment he found that the lease of Stewart's Post had lapsed through failure to pay rent due at the proper date, but witness afterwards succeeded on payment of £150 in reviving the lease in August of the following year. He obtained a lease for 94 years, subject to certain periodical payments, and the right remaining in the lessor to cancel on failure to pay the rent on due dates. Witness had no funds in hand to pay the £150, but he managed to raise the necessary money to revive the lease. The defendant had sent a claim to him as official liquidator, which witness refused to recognise because the claim was incorrect in that he endeavoured to bring within the operation of the bond matters which belonged to J. Contat, father of the defendant in this case, and other matters which he could not as official liquidator recognise as being proper claims under the bond.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Had he no cession from his father of his father's claim?]

Witness: Not that I am aware of. From time to time he demanded that an account should be filed, supported by vouchers. No such account, however, had been filed. Defendant, in one of his letters, referred witness to Mr. Wright, who was secretary to the voluntary liquidators, but witness could get no vouchers from Mr. Wright. The sale of the property was, owing to the siege of Kimberley and other causes, deferred until April 15, 1901, and it was purchased by a Mr. Meyers, who, however, did not carry out the purchase. Witness, in consequence, re-advertised the property for sale on the 22nd April, and in so doing he had the concurrence of the defendant's father, J. Contat. He received a letter from the defendant, authorising him to bid up to £4,000. In a letter defendant said he might bid up to £4,000 against the bond for himself. He asked witness whether, under the circumstances of the country, he intended to give the property away, or he wanted to get a bargain for somebody else. He gave notice to witness that in the event of his not being able to be present at the sale he might bid up to £4,000 against the bond of himself. He added that if he were present at the sale the letter would, of course, become null and void. Witness produced the conditions of sale, which set out that the purchaser should pay one half of the purchase price on the day of sale and the balance in three months, the balance to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. It was stated at the sale that the plant and bridge and other moveables of the liquidated company were not offered, the question of whether these belonged to the defendant having been discussed. The property was knocked down to the defendant for £3,000. On the 24th April he paid £750, and witness gave him a receipt for this amount, "being on account of cash instalments of purchase price, without prejudice to the conditions of sale." Witness demanded the full half of the purchase price, but the defendant went to the bank, and on his return he said he could not obtain more than £750 at present. Witness took this sum in order to have cash in hand. After the sale he did not refuse defendant possession of the property; he had never turned the defendant off. In 1901 the High Court appointed the Master to make an inquiry into the affairs of Contat's Collieries under the provisions of the winding-up clause. Witness understood that a letter had been written on behalf of the defendant to the liquidators of the Cape Collieries, asking them to make arrangements to complete the necessary connection with the siding.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has the acount of the liquidators been framed?]

Witness: No, my Lord. I have been unable to do so owing to the refusal or want of knowledge on the part of the defendant in not giving me a proper account I sent the claim back; I could not recognise it in the form in which it was presented.

In further examination by Mr. Benjamin, the witness said the company was considerably involved at the time when the bond was passed. Witness worked up the books in connection with the examination before the Master. The witness produced a balance-sheet made up to the 30th November, 1898, in which the loss of the company was shown to be £9,256 12s. 9d.; and also a balance-sheet made up to the 30th September, 1897, before the bond was passed, this showing the company's indebtedness to be £1,942 11s. 4d. It was in a hopeless state both before and after the passing of the bond. The proof of debt filed by witness was in respect to the debt filed by J. E. Contat. The account brought up a general balance, without giving details From time to time defendant was credited with various amounts as life governor. The rent of Zevenfontein was paid up to the 20th June, 1901, and of Steward's Post up to the 3rd August, 1901. Witness contended that after the sale defendant was liable for the subsequently accruing rents.

By Mr. Upington: Witness raised objection to the first proof of debt. Possibly his objection was that as regards the shortage of plant he knew nothing about it. He had not then the full knowledge he obtained later when he got hold of the books. On August 15, 1899, witness got certain directions from creditors. He advised Mr. Contat by letter that it had been resolved that the official liquidator should take counsel's advice or take other steps to contest the bond of J. E. Contat. He did not take steps to contest the bond. He wrote to Joseph Contat, pointing out that the claim was not in order, as a full detailed account was required. This was the only ground of objection stated in the letter. The company's books showed the details of the claim. The claim was not accepted from the company's books, but from the claimant's books. That was the custom of the High Court. Contat wrote, explaining that the vouchers had been handed in to the company for comparison and audit. On the 21st August, 1899, Contat wrote an amended account, withdrawing certain claims respecting the shortage of tools.

Mr. Upington asked the witness whether, in a certain interview before the sale, Mr. Cochran did not ask witness if, in the event of Contat bidding at the sale, the amount of the purchase price would be set off against the amount of his indebtedness under the bond.

Mr. Benjamin objected that this evidence was irrelevant.

After argument, the Court held that this evidence was inconsistent with the subsequent written documents.

In reply to the Court, the witness said he had rejected the claim.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Would it not be possible for an accountant to go into the matter, and ascertain what was really the amount at issue?]

Mr. Upington said he thought this would be the best plan.

Mr. Benjamin said he was prepared to agree to this, providing that the balance still due was paid into Court. He submitted that, apart from this agreement which the parties set up, there was really no set-off in this case.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But at the same time the Court has often in cases where there are cross-claims as against the plaintiff, ordered the claim in convention to stand over until it has decided as to the claim in reconvention. It is not a case for a set-off, it is clear, but it doesn't follow that the Court is bound to give judgment on the claim in convention if it is reasonably clear that there is a counter-claim in excess of or equivalent to the amount of the claim in convention. His Lordship further pointed out that the plaintiff had objected to the defendant's claim. Application was now made to compel him to admit that claim, and the defendant proposed to produce evidence to show that the amount is due. Supposing the Court found a certain amount of the defendant's claim due, did the plaintiff wished to dispute that on the ground of undue preference?]

Mr. Benjamin: Portion of it he would be obliged to contest on that ground.

De Villiers, C.J., pointed out that the point of undue preference was not raised by plaintiff. In his replication the plaintiff said he admitted that the defendant had filed the claim against the company in liquidation, but contended that the said claim had not been admitted by him (plaintiff) as valid. The point was whether on the issue raised in the pleadings the Court could not go into the question of whether the claim was a valid one, quite apart from whether it was an undue preference. Here were two definite proofs of debt, stating how the claim was arrived at, and the plaintiff said he denied the validity of it. Here was an issue raised, and the plaintiff should surely be prepared to meet it. Upon the pleadings, the Court could not prevent the defendant from leading evidence to show that the claim was valid.

After further argument on the facts, the Chief Justice said the Court was of opinion that defendant would be entitled under the claim in reconvention to prove that his claim was a valid one, and, if necessary, to have the claim amended by referring to proofs, which, however, were referred to by plaintiff in his replication.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to Mr. Benjamin): Is your case that there is nothing whatever owing under the bond?]

There may be something owing under the bond, but there are several items in the account which we intend to challenge if your lordship is not going into the account.

The witness Pooley, in answer to the Chief Justice and counsel, said that if the accounts were gone into, it would be found that the defendant owed the company something, but not quite independently of the question of undue preference. Setting aside the question of undue preference, he should object to the amount of defendant's claim, the said claim being up to about £5,000, he believed. In any case, there was nothing owing by the company to the defendant. The defendant's claim was for £4,000 odd; witness had taken out what he considered the objectionable items. He thought an accountant would, from the information supplied, be able to find out the real position between the parties.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The amounts objected to appeared in the company's books. The books were kept by a bookkeeper practically under Mr. Contat's superintendence. Mr. J. Contat was a life governor and a director, and he did everything from beginning to end. He had never heard of a balance sheets book. There were balance sheets. The books of the company were at present in Court, he believed. The balance sheets book having been produced, witness was asked to look at pages 55, 56, and 57. He saw an amount to Joseph Contat of £1,223 8s. 2d. It was not really a balance sheet, but simply trial balances. On page 58 there was the first balance sheet, dated the 23rd October, 1897. On the profit and loss account there was an item of salaries, life governor, directors, etc., to the amount of £2,199 15s. 6d. There were two other preference claims against the estate besides the defendants, both relating to salaries. He did not say he objected to all the items of the defendant's claim. He objected to the first alleged to be paid in by J. Contat. One class of objections was to items in the cash book, alleged to be paid in by J. Contat, and placed to the credit of J. E. Contat. These were not all the items, however, to which he objected which he said were not incurred. He did not know how many directors there were, but the principal names were J. Contat and J. E. Contat. Witness detailed other items to which he took exception. He submitted that there had been undue preference shown by the defendant.

By the Court: The company owed nothing at the time the bond was passed. The governor's fees amounted to about £2,000 or £3,000. The company started with only £200 subscribed capital.

By Mr. Benjamin: Joseph Contat seemed to act as though he held a power of attorney from the company to do everything. J. E. Contat was a young man, and had been a printer in Natal, and a typewriter and shorthand writer in East London. In December, 1897, the immovable assets of the company were sold by J. Contat as life governor to J. E. Contat, £1,375 being the purchase price. This seemed, as did most other transactions, to have been done by J and J. E. Contat without reference to the company. The witness read the record in the minutes relating to the resolution sanctioning the passing of the bond first to J. E. Contat and afterwards to J. J. Moore. The latter guaranteed to the bank, and witness understood that the original bond would be ceded to him.

Counsel for the plaintiff read the evidence, taken on commission, of Mrs.

Field, wife of the late Charles Field, who traded as J. J. Moore. She deposed to having seen a guarantee given by her husband to the African Banking Corporation, in respect of advances to be made to Contat's Collieries. After the death of witness's husband, witness was asked to take over the guarantee, the bond being offered as security. Witness had paid up over £2,000 on the guarantee.

Henry Francis Ford, Registrar and Master of the High Court, said he was appointed to hold an inquiry into the affairs of the company. Witness presented a report to the Court. He held an inquiry on the 18th January, 1902. Witness handed in the report.

Mr. Benjamin put in the record of defendant's evidence before the Master, and closed his case.

Mr. Upington called

Joseph Contat, who said he resided on the farm Zevenfontein. He was the father of the defendant, who was chief clerk to the Town Council at East London. Witness had acted as attorney for his son since 1893, the latter being then a compositor, working for himself. Everything done in connection with this business was carried on by witness on defendant's behalf. In 1892 witness acquired the leases of the two farms for his son. In 1893 witness was forced to surrender his own estate. The lease of Stewart's Post lapsed, but witness reacquired it for his son in 1894. Witness had no capital, but disposed of certain shares, and did certain work on the property, sinking shafts, and otherwise developing the property until it was floated in 1896. Witness and his son obtained 80,000 shares, 20,000 were held in reserve, and 10,000 were left for public subscription, only about 150 or 200, however, being taken. The company was in a sound position then. In order to keep the property going, witness had to sell some of his son's vendor's shares, and he advanced the money accruing from the sale to the company. In 1897 a balance-sheet was drawn up. This was audited and passed at a meeting of the shareholders. The company gradually lost ground, owing to want of capital and want of transport facilities, in consequence of rinderpest. Witness and his son were by articles of association appointed life governors, and became entitled to certain fees. They did not take these fees out; they credited themselves with it. The overdraft at the bank increased, and at about the end of 1896 the bank called upon the company to give security, and some of the directors—Forsyth, Campbell, witness and Moore—stood as guarantors. In May, 1897, Moore died, and in August his executors gave notice to the bank that the overdraft would have to stop. Witness continued to advance to the company money, which he raised by selling shares belonging to his son. In December, 1897, the company were indebted to defendant to the extent of about £1,300. Witness did not feel himself justified in making further advances. Matters were discussed between witness, the directors, and the superintendent, and it was arranged to sell the plant to the defendant, and debit him with the amount. He was accordingly debited with the £1,325 which Mr. Pooley had objected to. After August, 1897, when the overdraft was stopped, an account was opened at the bank in the name of J. E. Contat, ordinary account. This was done with the knowledge of the directors. J. E. Contat had a special account also. To finance the company, witness drew cheques from the special account, and transferred it to the company's account. This was done until May, 1898, when the cheques which he had lodged as security were actually paid into the company's account to pay debts. They amounted to £900 odd. In February, 1898, the bond in question was passed. It was not passed for the purpose of being ceded as security to J. J. Moore. The bond was not ceded to Moore, but witness did propose to cede it after it was passed. He had offered to cede it to Mrs. Moore. He had endeavoured on behalf of the company to raise money on the bond. Witness had sold about 18,000 or 19,000 shares—not at par—and had paid the money into the account of the company. Witness had ceded his life governor's fees to the defendant. J. E. Contat's account had been credited with this. Witness was not a bookkeeper, and in a matter such as this, he would be guided by the bookkeeper. Witness submitted a claim upon the estate in May, 1899, and a supplementary claim later on. In both these claims there appeared an item, balance of account rendered, £2,442. This was taken from the company's ledger up to May, 1898, and the particulars were shown in the ledger. The vouchers were sent when the company's books were being audited. There was no truth in the suggestion that the entries in the various books were made collusively by witness and Martin (the bookkeeper). No question of his bond being an undue preference was ever brought before him. The items shown on the accounts proved were correct. The leases were a valuable property, and were paying before the cession to the company. Witness had used every endeavour to get the plaintiff to file an account.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He had received payments by cheques and cash. He paid the money into the company to the man in charge of the books—first Campbell, then Posnean, and Adams and Martin. He had not subpœned any of these men. The books were in bad order when Mr. Martin came in 1897, and Mr. Martin wrote them up under witness's instructions as managing director. Witness was sorry to say he was not only managing director, but also financier of the company. He transferred the moneys due to him from time to time to his son. It was all for his son. He was supporting himself out of a share belonging to his son. His own estate had been sequestrated. It was not a fact that the money was his own; he made a present of it to his son. They floated the company in £130,000. They held 100,000 vendors' shares. There were 10,000 shares left to be subscribed by the public; only £150 was subscribed by the public, as a matter of fact. In February, 1897, he supposed that the indebtedness of the company was as stated in the books. Then the bond was passed, and the indebtedness of the company was six months afterwards over £9,000. He and his son formed the quorum at the directors' meeting. He or his son proposed the resolutions; the resolutions were seconded in due form. Witness was chairman.

Mr. Benjamin: This is a solemn farce you went through on each occasion at the offices of the company's solicitor?

Witness: I was forced to do that.

Mr. Benjamin: You and your son went through the form of selling the assets of the company to your son?

Witness: No, it was done with Mr. Stanley; it was to save the company. Further cross-examined: He did not ask Mrs. Field to advance £1,700. He tried to pay everybody off to whom the company owed money.

Mr. Benjamin: Yes, including your son, and you took good care to help your son as much as possible.

Witness said he was left alone with all the troubles of the company on his shoulders. Replying to further questions, witness said that his son saved an asset to the company of the value of £20,000. They acquired a right-of-way from the Cape Collieries. For this he was to receive £100 a year. They also claimed his fees as life governor, amounting to £200 a year. His son was also paid for additional work. The lease of Stewart's Post had already lapsed when he received a letter giving him notice about it. The liquidator threw every obstacle in his way that he could. His son was born in 1876, so that in 1894, when they acquired the concessions, he was a minor, but he was working on his own account. Witness had a power of attorney from him.

Joseph Ernest Contat, the defendant, said he had been a compositor in Natal. In 1893 his father obtained general power of attorney from him. His father obtained certain cessions and leases on his behalf. He had no funds under his individual control. He was now Chief Clerk in the Town Council Offices of East London.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He was not acquainted with the books. He was present at some of the transactions. He negotiated the asset from the Cape Collieries. As a matter of fact, his father did everything in connection with the estate. He held a meeting with his father, and passed a resolution to strengthen the position of the company as regarded the asset.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is that all the service you rendered?]

I consider it a very important service, as we could not get the Kimberley directors together. Replying to Mr. Benjamin, he said he paid £40 of his own moneys to his father.

This concluded the evidence.

Postea (July 2nd): Counsel were heard in argument.

Mr. Benjamin (for plaintiffs): This action is instituted for the recovery of £2,250, being the purchase price of assets in Contats' Collieries, which were sold by the liquidator and purchased by the defendant. The purchase price was £3,000. The defendant paid on account £750, leaving a balance owing of £2,250, for which this action has been instituted. The defence pleads first of all that there was an express agreement at the time of sale with regard to the payment of the purchase price, that the defendant should be allowed to pay a certain amount to meet liquidation expenses in the estate, and that, with regard to the balance of the purchase price, that should be an amount set off against the claim which he alleged he had against the company. The pleadings go on to say that, quite apart from the agreement, the defendant was entitled to set off his claim under his bond against the purchase price. In reconvention, he claims a sum of damages by reason of the fact that he was not given possession, and cession of the property on due day. In addition to that, he also claims damages by reason of the fact that the lease of one of the properties, Stewart's Farm—the rents of which, he says, should have been paid by the plaintiff, but were not paid by him—was forfeited and so lost to him. In the third place, he claims in reconvention that the plaintiff, now the defendant, should be compelled to file a liquidation account, in which liquidation account he should be compelled to bring up as preferent this claim under the mortgage bond. The point is whether the defendant is or is not entitled to set off his claim under the bond.

[De Villiers, C.J.: As far as I remember, the really important question to decide is: Is there any money owing at all?]

Yes. With regard to that, the onus of proof is really upon the defendant. He gives no evidence showing that any money was owing to him.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The son was a minor, and while he was a minor certain moneys were laid out by his father.]

Mr. Upington (for the defendants) said he agreed that the essential point in this case was whether or not there was a sum of money owing by the company to the defendant. He left out of question altogether the validity or otherwise of the bond, in regard to which the Court had had certain evidence. so that the question really was whether any sum of money was owing under the bond. With regard to the claim which had been put in by the defendant in the liquidation account, there were certain points that he should like to deal with before coming to the special items to which the liquidator in his evidence took objection. The liquidator admitted that these amounts appeared in the company's books, but he took exception to them on various grounds. The defendant sent in an account showing his claim against the company as early as May 31, 1899.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Before you go into that, the first point that strikes me is this: there were two life governors, father and son, who transacted all the business for the company. These two life governors come together and say, "We must pass a bond in favour of the son," and the bond is passed in favour of the son. Then subsequently the father transferred his debts to the son. The real intention of this was to secure Moore, who financed this company. This company was perfectly insolvent all the time, but we can not enter into that question now. I want to put it to you, Mr. Upington, whether these facts do not make it incumbent on you to prove that this amount was owing under the bond?]

In the first place, there has been voluminous correspondence between May, 1889, and May, 1902, between the defendant's father and the liquidator, and during the whole of that period the question which cropped up in the course of the case now, i.e., that this bond was passed for the purpose of securing the estate of J. J. Moore, was never raised. Again, Mrs. Moore would not accept the security. The son explained that his money was under the control of his father, who held his power of attorney.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The father simply was acting, and the son was the dummy?)

If that were so, if your lordship is going to say that J. E. Contat had no money, that all that was brought under the bond was J. E. Contat——

[De Villiers, C.J.: I don't wish to say anything of the kind. I only ask, does the evidence show it?]

But I say, if your lordships do say that, then of course it knocks a very big hole into my client's case; but I submit that the evidence does not show that.

[De Villiers, C. J.: There is the very last passage of J. E. Contat's evidence before the Commissioner: "I was not in a position to make advances to the company if I had been applied to."]

J. E. Contat explained that statement to the Court by saying that he had no money under his own private control at that time. That was perfectly clear, but the evidence went to show that in February, 1898, there was a large amount standing to his credit in the bank. He thought, apart from directors' and life governors' fees, there were advances made to the company of two other kinds. In the first place, J. E. Contat said he sold shares of his, and paid the amounts received therefor into the company from the beginning. In addition to that, J. E. Contat's special account, which was J. E. Contat's private account, financed the account of the company, which was the ordinary account, to the extent of over £1,000.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The two life governors, who had the whole control, were buying the assets of the company in favour of one of them. Can such a transaction be upheld?]

I will show that the amount of J. E. Contat's indebtedness was brought before the directors as late as September, 1898.

[De Villiers, C.J.; Was not the whole thing left to Contat, senior? Was it not Contat, senior, alone who managed the whole concern?]

I will refer your lordships to the minute books on that point. At a meeting of the directors on the 17th January, 1898, a resolution was passed: "That the Board consent to the passing of a bond up to £5,000 in favour of J. E. Contat, and afterwards in favour of the estate of J. J. Moore." The meeting was attended, not only by Contat, but also by other directors—Fischer and Forsyth. There was another directors' meeting in May, at which it was agreed that the three directors present (J. Contat, W. Forsyth, and W. Lawrence) should sign a guarantee to the bank for the overdraft, which would relieve the estate of Moore from its liability. Mr. Contat, it was stated further, undertook to transfer the bond of £5,000 which he held over the company's assets as collateral security to the bank, and indemnify Forsyth and Lawrence.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The original does not show that. You had better look at the minute book yourself to see if there is anything to suggest the interpolation?]

At any rate, the book shows that the two life governors did not come together and pass the bond privately. The directors knew that a bond was going to be passed before it was actually passed, and they knew on the 4th of May that it had been passed.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, because they knew that the debt was owing to Moore. But why should they have this bond passed afterwards in favour of Moore if that debt was really owing to Contat? Do you say there was anything owing to J. E. Contat when this bond was passed?]

It is very difficult to tell from the books whether there is or not. My contention is that they may have considered that there may have been something owing to Contat, but when the bond was passed, it was to cover, not alone past indebtedness, but future indebtedness. On the 15th August the liquidator looked upon Contat as a bond-holder, and he called upon him for the production of certain vouchers, and also to make an affidavit.

[De Villiers, C.J.: In 1897 it was discovered that Contat owed his son £1,300, and he then, in his capacity as life governor, transferred all the plant to his son, and that plant was still there, and then the son had this security of the bond of 1898.]

In regard to the plant, there was this to be said, that on the 29th October, 1898, there was a resolution passed that ownership should be resumed by the company at the cost price of £1,325. The money has never been paid to Contat. In his account he did not credit himself with £1,325, although, strangely enough, at the end of the company's ledger, there was an entry, a most extraordinary entry, crediting Contat with £1,325.

[Kotzé, J.: Yes, but that is said to be a mistake.]

Yes, that is a mistake, but it looks extraordinary when read in conjunction with this minute, because the liquidator was going to take over this plant at cost price, and then this entry appears in the books, crediting Contat with £1,325. Of course, that does not appear in his claim.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Yes, but in point of fact did the liquidator take over the plant?]

He did not, as a matter of fact; Contat still has it.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There is no evidence how that £1,325 became due to the son.]

I will come to that afterwards. My point at present is that the liquidator recognised that sale on the 19th October, 1898. The absence of any vouchers for these amounts, all of which appeared in the company's books, is not a reasonable ground for refusing to recognise the whole claim when the vouchers have been furnished to a proper official of the company for the purpose of the accounts of the company being audited.

[De Villiers, C.J.: What were the assets for distribution in the company's estate?]

Practically these rights.

[De Villiers, C.J.: And Moore has not been paid?]

No.

[De Villiers, C.J.: So that the result of giving the defendant preference would be to give him practically the whole of the money to the exclusion of Moore's estate?]

That is so. Moore's not being a preferent claim. There is, I think, another preferent claim for rent, amounting to about £250.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Do you seriously contend that a life governor's fees should enter into competition with a creditor like Moore—a bona fide creditor who has advanced money to keep the thing afloat for a time?]

There is a bond to cover all indebtedness.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Can a director pass a bond in his own favour?]

The company could.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I think there is no power; it is entirely ultra vires.]

Then they ought to have raised that point; but, so far from doing so, they admit that the bond was passed by the company. Life governors' fees and directors' fees comprised rather more than half the claim, but, in addition to these items, there were actual advances to the amount of over £1,000, which were vouched for by the cheques. Counsel argued at some length to show that the £2,000, with which the special account was opened on behalf of the company by J. E. Contat, was distinct from the £2,500 paid by Moore to cover the overdraft. The defendant had heard nothing of these wholesale objections until the liquidator came into the box. On the contrary, the liquidator had written in May that he would admit Contat's claim provided the amounts due to J. E. Contat were separated from those due to J. Contat. Further, there were instances in which the liquidator had accepted the credit items, but had refused to take the corresponding debit entries.

I am able to inform your lordships, from information which has come to me, that the debts of the company amounted to £994 at least, so that it was placing a false position before the Court to ask that the credits should be struck out, without at the same time striking out the whole of the debits, which were in a corresponding position. This is only another instance of the careless and cursory way in which the liquidator has gone into the books, and has objected to items without the slightest foundation for objecting to them. Those items amount to a considerable sum, and the position of the defendant is that those credits should not be taken into consideration, unless the debits, which are in precisely the same position, were also taken into consideration. I am informed that a pencil mark has been made in the book opposite the debit items. Another item is the £700 which the liquidator stated had been underpaid by J. E. Contat on the value of buildings possessed by the company. The liquidator informed the Court that J. E. Contat took these buildings over for £270, and that these very buildings stood in the books at about £1,100. An examination of the books reveals the fact that no one but the most careless person could possibly have fallen into such an error as that of the liquidator. The great majority of items in the property account were, doubtless, for buildings, and to the plant account the sum of £811 was credited. The liquidator did not point out in the box where the buildings set down at £1,100 were. The item of £1,325 was brought up in the balance-sheet when the company went into liquidation; the liquidators' attention was drawn to that very item, and they said that Mr. Contat had taken over the buildings and plant of the company at cost price, and that the company again took them over upon the same terms. During the course of the voluminous correspondence, no objection was raised, and now the liquidator went through the items in the box in a most reckless manner.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The liquidator was simply doing his duty.]

I know that, my lord.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There was no recklessness at all.]

Mr. Upington said that he submitted that the most cursory examination must have revealed the fact that there were large debits on the other side in the same position. He would merely draw attention to the main items, and endeavour to show that the claims were well founded. He would submit that, with regard to the item of £1,325, beyond vague allegations that the buildings stood in the books at £1,100, there was no proof to that effect. The item of £585 was, according to Mr. Contat's explanation, the cost price of the mining material, buildings, etc., and all these items were brought up in the balance-sheet. Then there was the item due from the company to Posneau, and taken over by Contat. Contat might, instead of discharging Posneau's liability, have paid the money into the company for the purpose of Posneau's liability being discharged, and the company might then have issued a cheque to Posneau. Could there have been any objeciton to that coming under the bond?

[De Villiers, C.J.: Certainly. The bond is passed for the purpose of enabling Contat to keep this company going; it is not passed for the purpose of enabling Contat to pay the debts of the company, and thus securing a prefence for himself.]

My point is that, instead of transferring this amount from Posneau's credit to his own credit, Contat might have paid his own cheque into the company, that would have been an advance, the company would then have paid out Posneau's liability, and the result would have been that Contat was a creditor. There could be no ..fference at all, except from the point of view, perhaps, of vouching the payment. But the effect was exactly the same if, instead of passing cheques, the amounts were transferred from one name to the other.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The question of undue preference is not raised here, unfortunately. If it had been raised the case, possibly, would have taken quite a different turn. At the same time, if you wish to reply on preference by the bond you must show that the money was advanced under the bond, but if you show that Posneau's account appears as part of your claim, then you must show that Posneau also was entitled to that preference which you now give under the bond.]

The amount was due from the company to Posneau as wages.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I suppose you would also say that Contat would be entitled to preference on life governor's fees.]

I don't know that, but he has had a salary as managing director. I would submit that, in the first place, Posneau's claim was a claim for wages, and, therefore, it would not have been an undue preference. I submit that there could have been no difference in the two courses of action, and in that case the defendant would have been entitled to bring the amount under his bond. Counsel proceeded to deal with the liquidator's objection to an item of £1,738. This item, he observed, appeared to have been transferred by the bookkeeper Martin, under the instructions of J. Contat, to the account of J. E. Contat. J. Contat received £200 a year as life governor under the articles of association, and £600 a year as managing director. He contended, taking first the £600 a year, that that was a salary, whether Contat were a director or a manager of the company, and there was no question that Contat did a lot of work in and about the affairs of the company. As the liquidator himself said, "He was the beginning and the end of the company." It was not disputed that his salary was owing, or that the life governor's fees were owing. Contat in order not to embarrass the company, appeared to have left his salary and life governor's fees in the assets of the company, instead of drawing them out from time to time, and it is said that he had no right to transfer those sums so due as salary and fees to the credit of his son. I will admit at once that, if that were done collusively in order that Contat might get the benefit of a preference under his son's bond, whilst retaining the right to his salary and the fees, then there might be a great deal to be said for striking out that item as far as the bond is concerned. The entry shows that £1.738 was transferred from the account of Jos. Contat to the account of J. E. Contat. As to managing director's salary, surely J. Contat was entitled to payment for his services just as any other servant of the company would be, and the payment of such sal ary would not be an undue preference. Surely, if he was entitled to a salary he could say, "Don't pay the salary over to me; pay it over to my son."

[De Villiers, C.J.: How can you place his salary on a different footing to the fees? The thing is exactly the same, though it is called by another name.]

Oh no, it is work that would otherwise have to be done by a paid manager.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There are still fees; I don't see how his salary can be placed on a different footing to fees. No remuneration in any shape or orm can be given to a director, except what is authorised by the constitution of the company. The Companies Act provides for directors' fees to be paid only out of profits. A director cannot legally claim a sum as servant of a company. A company is a partnership, and for a director to enter into competition with the creditors, and set up a preference claim against them, such a thing is unheard of.]

The creditors had notice of the arti les of association and of the bond.

[Kotzé, J., asked where the money of the private account came from?]

I have no evidence, but I am informed that Contat sold on behalf of J. Contat certain other mining rights. Mr. Contat speculated considerably, and that was not the only property he was concerned about. At the present time he is working the remainder of the Zevenfontein Mine. The balance sheet up to September, 1898, shows that J. E. Contat is secured by bond to the amount of £3,145 17s. 6d., and I submit that settles all question of a possible collusion. With regard to the claim against the defendant. I submit, they were not put into proper occupation, as according to the advertisement the company tendered not only their mining leases, but all the rights the company might possess.

Mr. Benjamin in reply,

De Villiers, C. J.: The plaintiff, as liquidator of the Contats' claims from the defendant certain rights over and certain leases of certain property sold by him as liquidator. The amount claimed is £2,250. The defendant, by his claim in reconvention, sets up a bond which was passed in his favour on the 21st February, 1898, and he alleges there was an agreement between the liquidator and himself that the amount claimed under this bond should be set off as against the purchase price of the property. But quite independently of any agreement to set off the defendant claims that he has the right to prove as a preferent creditor in competition with the other creditors of the company for any amounts which may be found owing to him. The agreement to set off has not, in my opinion, been proved, and as the purchase by the defendant has been admitted, the only question to be decided is whether he has established his right to claim as a preferent creditor under the bond. Let me briefly state the circumstances under which the claim in reconvention is made. We find that when this company was first started the defendant was made by his father, Joseph Contat, one of the life governors of this company. At that time the defendant seems to have been a boy of about seventeen years of age. He was a compositor, I think, at Durban, and he was made a life governor with his father of a company carrying on mining operations in Molteno, and in respect of that life governorship he was to be entitled to £200 a year as life governor, while the father, under the trust deed, was also to have £200 a year, and in addition to that he was to have £600 a year as a special remuneration as managing director. It is quite clear from the evidence that the company really never was a success, and that it was entirely a losing concern. Then some time at the end of 1897 it appeared there was alleged to be a certain sum of £1,300 owing to the son, on whose behalf the father was acting, and then as security for this amount alleged to have been due there seems to have been given a bill of sale to the son. Then shortly afterwards it is alleged that there was a still further sum owing, and a bond was passed by the company in favour of the defendant as security for this amount. When we refer to the books of the company we find that they are kept in, to say the least of it, a very slovenly manner. It is quite clear from the evidence that the soul of the whole undertaking was the father; that the whole company was entirely under his control and management, and that the bookkeepers and all the other officials of the company were entirely under his control. As to what functions the other directors performed it is very difficult to ascertain. They seem also to have been in the hands of Joseph Contat. We find also that before this bond was passed, there was a meeting of directors to authorise the bond. There were present on the 17th January, 1898, Joseph Contat, Fischer, and Forsyth, and it was resolved "that the board consent to the passing of a bond up to £5,000 in favour of J. E. Contat, and afterwards in favour of the estate of J. J. Moore. Joseph Contat is positive in his evidence that the words "and afterwards in favour of the estate of J. J. Moore" were not in the original. I am satisfied that he is wrong. The whole appearance of the minute shows that there was a continuous entry made at the time, and in the same ink, and there is no evidence whatever of any interpollation being made. On the contrary, we are satisfied that there was no interpollation, and that these words were there originally. What was really meant by that it is very difficult to know. It may be that a fresh bond was to be passed in favour of J. J. Moore, or it may be that this bond itself was to be ceded to J. J. Moore, but whatever the true meaning is, the circumstances under which the bond was passed justify the Court, and indeed compel the Court, to scrutinise most carefully this account, which is now presented to the liquidator as an account showing what is due to this defendant under the bond. It is a case of competition between the life governors and the bona fide creditors of the company. The creditor, J. J. Moore, does not appear yet to have been satisfied, and it is quite clear that if the Court were now to allow these amounts which the defendant claims under the bond as preferent claims, it will sweep away all the assets of the estate, and leave nothing for the bona fide creditors of the estate, who have had nothing to do with the management of this company, and who certainly on every principle ought to have preference as against the members of the company, and as against the directors. A considerable portion of the claim, coming under the bond, consists of fees owing to the defendant and his father as life governors. And even if there is to be a competition, that competition should not be a preferent one. such as the one in the present case. It is not necessary to go into all the items, but of this I am satisfied, that where a life governor or a director claims a preference of this kind under a bond passed under circumstances under which this bond was passed, he must clearly establish his claim. He must produce his vouchers. He must satisfy the Court that the amount is owing. He must produce vouchers showing in what manner these claims arose. The father, who really managed the whole business on behalf of the son, was pressed about these vouchers. All he could say was that he delivered them to the secretary, and that they ought to be with the papers, but the liquidator did not find them amongst the papers, and the presumption would be that the vouchers, if given to the secretary, would have been delivered by him to the liquidator. No such vouchers have been produced, and I am of opinion that the liquidator was quite justified in refusing to admit that claim. It lay upon the defendant to produce these vouchers, and if he could not have got the originals, at all events he could have applied to the different persons he had dealt with for duplicates. He could have furnished the next best evidence of payments made by the son on behalf of the company. But nothing of of the sort is produced, and, in my opinion, the liquidator is quite justified in saying, "You must, under the circumstances, bring clear proof of the account, and you have failed to do so"; and what the liquidator is justified in saying, the Court is also entitled to say: that the defendant should leave no doubt whatever on the minds of the Court as to the existence of the debt,

At present, I must say I am not satisfied that there is anything—possibly there may be something—owe-ing. It is the defendant's own fault if he does not satisfy the Court. He should have produced the requisite evi-dence, and he has not done so. At the same time I do not think the defendant should be debarred hereafter from pro-ducing such evidence as he may have, and proving his case, and in that case it will be competent to raise the question as to undue preference. There will be opportunity then of raising this question, which I am surprised was not raised in this case. As the case stands now, there should be judgment for the plaintiff for the amount claimed, but upon the claim in reconvention, there must be absolu-tion from the instance, leaving the de-fendant to proceed with a fresh claim.

Kotze, J., said he was of the same opinion. He thought the circum-stances were such that the Court ought to require the very strongest proof in regard to the claim in reconvention.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

SCHRODER v. BENTLEY. { 1903. May 26th.

Sir Henry Juta, K.C., applied on be-half of the plaintiff for judgment in terms of consent declaring the plaintiff a necessary witness in a recent libel action against the defendant.

Order granted as prayed.

WILSON v. WILSON.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, John Edmund Wilson, against the defendant, his wife, Harriet Ann Wilson, for restoration of conjugal rights, failing which, a decree of divorce.

The declaration set forth that the par-ties reside at Kenilworth, and were mar-ried in community of property at Clare-mont on the 9th November last. On the 27th February the defendant deserted the plaintiff, and had not since re-turned to him. The defendant person-ally filed a plea, in which she denied that she unlawfully deserted him, or that she ill-treated him. On the 23rd December two men called about a house, and because she had spoken to them for some time, the plaintiff sharpened his knife that night, and on December 26th the parties agreed to apply for a separation order. On the 26th February the plaintiff threatened to bash her face in, and next day she was compelled to leave him, as she was in danger of her life.

Mr. Close for plaintiff; defendant in person.

Mr. Close called the plaintiff. He stated he was married at Claremont in November last. At present he was living with his son. He had ample means to provide for the defendant. For some time he lived on most affectionate terms with his wife, in fact, he thought it would never come to this. The trouble commenced on Christmas Eve. They came to Cape Town to see the "Cave," and when he called to see the defendant's brother, he was treated very coolly. When he returned home he told his mother-in-law that he wished he had never called to see his brother-in-law. Witness gave his brother-in-law a Christmas pre-sent, which he returned. The present was left on the stoep, and accompanied with insulting remarks. The defendant then left with her brother, and went to Muizenberg. For three days she slept with her mother. Later on, she said she didn't feel comfortable. When he told defendant, she said that she would like a deed of separation. Questioned by the plaintiff as to her indifferent man-ner, she told him that he had very funny ways with him. Witness was 50 years of age, and the defendant was well aware of his age before the marriage. On the night of the 26th February they were as happy as could be, and when plaintiff touched the kitten on the morning of the 27th, the defendant came out with shocking language, and said, "You old brute, I'll chuck you out." That night she was very reticent, and she left the room and told her mother that the plaintiff was going to murder her. After consultation with a law agent, he came to the conclusion that he would have a better time if his mother-in-law was out of the house. The mother-in-law was given notice to leave, and his brother-in-law was also given notice to leave a house of plaintiff's, which he was occupying at reduced rent. Another sister came in on the 26th February, and said to his mother-in-law: "Mother, don't leave the house until Hettie leaves. I'll knock his old false teeth down his throat." The defendant and her mother left the house, and plaintiff had made several unsuccessful attempts to induce her to return. The defendant had obtained an order for £50 through the Court to proceed with an action for judicial separation, but the case was withdrawn. He never on any occasion threatened her with a revolver, nor did he use abusive language. The defendant had a free hand with the rents, and she got plenty of money. The mother-in-law made up the match, and got the plaintiff to make a will in the defendant's favour. Witness had been 22 years in Wynberg, and no one there ever saw him in a public-house. The defendant at times took some liquor, and got very crafty.

Cross-examined by the defendant: He did not catch her by the throat on the night of the 26th February, but the defendant caught hold of him and tore his singlet. He never used abusive language. The occasion of the revolver was when he heard someone outside endeavouring to break into the house, and he jumped up to defend his wife.

For the defence, the defendant called her mother, Harriet Maria Rogers. She had heard the plaintiff use bad language on several occasions. She had seen the marks on the defendant's neck. She remembered the quarrelling on the night of the 26th February, but she was so deaf that she could not remember the language. She left the house on account of the notice sent by the plaintiff.

David Roland, called, stated that he could scarcely find a name for the way in which the parties lived. Witness brought the defendant down from Port Elizabeth, but the plaintiff wanted the banns published before her arrival. The plaintiff wanted the wedding carried through secretly and witness proceeded to the church at Claremont in the course of a few days. The plaintiff virtually dragged them up the front of the church, and witness said, "I have a good mind to go home." Plaintiff declared his age at 48, and inside of four months he gave his age as 50. Witness then proceeded to give corroborative evidence of the abusive language to the defendant. Witness remembered seeing the marks on the defendant's throat.

Maasdorp, J: In this case the paintiff alleges in his declaration that the defendant maliciously deserted him, and he claims restitution of conjugal rights. It is necessary for the plaintiff to prove malicious desertion, and if it appears from the evidence that in consequence of the plaintiff's conduct the defendant was justified in leaving the house, then her leaving would not constitute a malicious desertion. The defendant has stated in the plea that, in consequence of the violent nature of the conduct of the plaintiff, it is unsafe for her to return to live with him, and that she left the house in consequence of that conduct. Now it certainly appeared from the manner in which the plaintiff gave his evidence in court that he was of a very eccentric and peculiar disposition, and it was said by the Rev. Mr. Vine-Hall that he was very talkative, and it appeared that when once he began to talk it was very difficult for him to control himself. It is not very difficult to believe under the circumstances, that when he got irritated, he would use language over which he would have little control. Defendant has called witnesses to prove that on various ocasions he used to her abusive and insulting language, and that on one occasion he went so far when a dispute took place that he committed an assault upon her. I am satisfied that on the 26th February the disputes they had had some days before culminated in violence on his part against her, and she showed signs of the assault on his part upon her. There may be some evidence that the defendant herself irritated him at times, but that would not justify the personal violence which it has been proved he committed on the night in question. It seems to me from the evidence that life under the circumstance, if the plaintiff continues to behave in the same way as he carried on during the first few months of their marriage, life would be unbearable. Under these circumstances, the Court cannot possibly grant an order for the restitution of conjugal rights, and compel her to return and live with the plaintiff. Judgment must be for the defendant, with costs. There is some suggestion of redress for the defendant, but there is no claim in the reconvention for separation, and if she wishes at any time to institute an action, she will have to do so in proper form.

GOUS AND ANOTHER V. VAN DER HOFF. { 1903. May 26th.

Transfer of land—Option of purchase—Withdrawal of option—Damages for breach of contract—Consideration.

H. had given to G. an option of purchase of certain land to be exercised by a given date. Before that date arrived, G., not having availed himself of this option, H. withdrew it. G. now sued H. for transfer, or, in the alternative, for damages.

Held, that had G. exercised the option before it was withdrawn, a contract of sale and purchase binding on both parties would have been concluded, but that no consideration having been given by G. for the option, H. was at any time previous to its acceptance by G. at liberty to withdraw it.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs for an order on defendant to give transfer of certain plots of ground at Somerset Strand, failing which, £1,000 damages for breach of contract.

The declaration set forth that on the 8th January, at Somerset Strand, the defendant, purporting to act on behalf of himself, gave option in writing to the plaintiffs to purchase forty-eight plots of ground at Somerset Strand, the time expiring on the 12th January. On the same day another option was given on a further certain sixty-four plots of ground situated at the same place. Plaintiff gave notice on the 10th January of his intention to exercise his options, and subsequently the defendant informed Gous that the options were no longer binding. On the 7th February plaintiff issued summons against the defendant, and an interdict was granted restraining the defendant from disposing of the land. Lochner, who was the owner with the defendant, made an affidavit, in which he stated that Van der Hoff had no right to transfer the land.

Mr. Searle, K.C. (with him Mr. J. E. de Villiers), for plaintiff. Sir H. Juta, K.C. (with him Mr. Gardiner), for defendant.

Mr. Searle called the first plaintiff, Peter Cornelius Gous, who stated that he resided at Somerset West Strand. He obtained the options from Van der Hoff on the 8th January last, at Somerset Strand. Mr. Van der Hoff called at witness's house, and witness informed him that a certain Mr. Myburg, from the Paarl, had called during the defendant's absence about the land Witness saw the plan of the ground, and pointed out forty-eight plots, which Van der Hoff said he would put down at £25 a plot, if witness could see a chance of selling them. Witness again had an interview that evening with Van der Hoff, who suggested disposing of more of his ground at that price. The defendant drew up a contract, but before he did so witness asked him what terms he would give. Within forty days witness was to mention his purchaser, who would put down £100 or £200 in cash, paying the remainder within fifteen months with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. Two documents were written out, as witness wanted a little more time on the second lot. The defendant agreed to give witness two plots of ground when he disposed of the lot. On the stoep the defendant suggested that as he had been away in all probability Mr. Cillie had sold some of the property. Next morning witness saw Mr. Cillie and learned that certain ground of Lochner and Van der Hoff's, on the hard road, was still open for sale. When witness told Cillie that he had bought the ground, on refusal, from Van der Hoff, he turned a bit white. Cillie then said that Lochner might do the same thing in town, and hoped that witness was not buying the ground for Michau. Witness subsequently met Cillie, who asked for an appointment about Nulty's ground. In Mr. Michau's office Cillie handed witness a document, withdrawing, on the part of Lochner and Van der Hoff, the option on the plots. Michau said that was nonsense, as they had the option on the ground, and Mr. Cillie replied that he hoped the plaintiffs would not blame him, as he was merely acting on instructions. Michau then showed Cillie a copy of the letter that had been posted, stating that the plaintiffs intended exercising their rights. Witness personally delivered a letter at Van der Hoff's house. In reply to correspondence from the defendant's attorneys, Messrs. Michau and De Villiers, wrote on behalf of the plaintiffs, enclosing £200, being the first instalment on the plots. The cheque for £200 was returned on the 31st January by the defendant's attorneys, who absolutely denied, on behalf of his clients, any agreement being in existence. On the 7th February summons was issued and later on the rule nisi was granted and subsequently made absolute pending the action.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: When Mr. Cillie came into the office witness had the letter in his pocket. When Mr. Michau said that the letter was posted witness took it to be as good as posted. He did not think it necessary to make any mention in the affidavits of the remark he passed to Mr. Cillie that Mr. Michau and he had decided to have the ground.

Johan Johan Michau, member of the firm of Michau and De Villiers, attorneys, Cape Town, said that when Gous called at his office on the morning of the 10th January, he agreed to go halves in the deal over the option. Mr. Cillie called at the office about 11 o'clock. Gous told Cillie that witness and he had decided to buy the ground, and that witness had written a letter to that effect. Cillie then handed Gous the notice of withdrawal, and witness remarked that it was absurd, as they had already accepted the ground. The plots would be worth very nearly £50 each at the present time. Witness had since had an offer of the ground in question, along with some other ground, consisting in all of 450 plots at £12,500.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: It was quite correct that Gous had received the letter to deliver personally to Van der Hoff, and there could be no question of its having been posted. He believed that Cillie was the agent of Van der Hoff, but as the letter was addressed to the principals, he probably thought the letter might as well go there.

After counsel had been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiffs sue the defendant for the transfer of one hundred and twelve plots of ground, tendering to pay the purchase price amounting to £2,800, or, in the alternative, for £1,000, being damages for breach of contract. The action is based upon a contract contained in two documents, upon the precise terms of which the case must be determined. It seems that some confusion has been introduced into the case by some negotiations which preceded the agreement, when the intention of the parties was different from that which was ultimately expressed in the documents. There was at that time a wish on the part of the defendants that the plaintiff should sell the property for them, and should, in consideration of his services, receive two erven. This would have been a contract of agency, and the consequences would have been different from those arising in the present case. That intention was not carried out in the written agreement which was afterwards executed. It appears from the documents that the defendant gave to Gous an option of purchasing the property, which was to be exercised by noon on Monday, and if it were exercised a contract upon the terms contained in the documents would have been concluded. The defendant pleads that the option was withdrawn before it was exercised by Gous. The question arises whether the agreement was binding upon the defendant for the stipulated time, or whether he could withdraw from it within the time. There is no consideration for the option mentioned in the documents, and no consideration has been proved in evidence. I think it is quite clear that a person suing upon a contract such as this must prove that he has given valuable consideration, otherwise there would be no mutuality, seeing that the contract would be binding upon the defendant for the stipulated time, whilst the plaintiff, who has given no consideration, could withdraw at any time. In my opinion, in the absence of proof of consideration passing from the plaintiff to the defendant, the promise made by the defendant has no binding force in law. It was argued that, under the clause in the documents, requiring Gous to disclose his principal within a certain time, he might have disposed of the property to some third person, and so bound himself to his own detriment and that would constitute a consideration. That is a mistake, because, until the option was exercised, no contract binding upon any of the parties could be concluded. Having disposed of the option as a contract binding upon the parties until Monday, it still continues in the form of an offer by the defendant to sell the property to Gous, and if that offer had been accepted by Gous before it was withdrawn a binding contract of sale between the parties would have resulted. The main question therefore arises whether the offer was accepted by Gous before it was withdrawn by the defendant. The circumstances under which it is contended that the option was exercised, or the offer was accepted, are those which took place at Mr. Michau's office. It is necessary to decide whether the person with whom Mr. Michau and Mr. Jones then dealt was the agent of the defendant for the purpose. It is clear that during the early part of the negotiations Cilliers was the agent of Van der Hoff, because Van der Hoff had placed the selling of these lots in his hands. The question still remains whether he was agent at the time when the alleged acceptance was communicated to him. It is of importance to refer to the document, which has been put in to ascertain the position of Cilliers when he arrived at Michau's office. He came there with a letter, which amounted in substance to a communication to Gous that Van der Hoff had withdrawn the option. It would follow that Cilliers had already been instructed by Van der Hoff not to sell the property to Gous, consequently his authority to deal with Gous for the sale of the property had come to an end. When he arrived at Michau's office he had no right as the defendant's agent to accept the communication of the decision on the part of Gous to purchase the property. I therefore come to the conclusion that the offer made by Van der Hoff to sell the property to Gous was withdrawn before it was accepted by the latter. Upon the whole, I come to the conclusion that, in the absence of consideration, the promise of an option to remain open until Monday was not binding on the defendant, and that, in so far as it amounted to an offer to sell the property, the offer was withdrawn before it was accepted by the plaintiffs, and consequently no sale of the property was ever concluded between the parties. Under these circumstances, there must be judgment for the defendant, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice, the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.]

ESTATE VAN DER LITH V. CONRADIE AND ESTATE KOORTZ. } 1903. May 27th.

Executor—Specific bequest—Sale of land bequeathed—Minor—Sureties.

An executor is not justified in selling any property specifically bequeathed unless the sale is necessary for the payment of the debts of the estate.

A sale is not necessary where there are sufficient assets not specifically bequeathed or where the legatee is ready and willing to pay the executor a sufficient sum for the payment of the debts and costs of administration.

Where it has become necessary to sell property specifically bequeathed the legatee is entitled to the surplus of the proceeds after payment of the debts.

Where a debtor obtains restitution on the ground of a real defect in the obligation itself, such as fraud or mistake, the rescission of the obligation discharges the sureties, but if the rescission is founded upon reasons personal to the principal debtor, as for instance his minority, the obligation of the sureties remains in force.

Where, however, an executor held a sale by auction of land specifically bequeathed to a minor who bought the land after protesting against the sale and offering to pay all the debts of the estate,

Held, that as there were no creditors interested in enforcing the conditions of sale as against the sureties for the minor, the executor, who failed in his action for enforcing conditions of sale against the minor, as principal debtor, was not entitled to enforce them against the sureties for the minor.

Held further, that if the executor had been guilty of any mala fides he would not have been entitled to any fees, but that as he had acted in good faith he should receive such fees as he would have been entitled to if he had acted on the offer of the minor.

This was an action to recover the purchase price of certain immovable property.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was the executor dative in the estate of the late Maria Elizabeth Margaretha van der Lith, and her predeceased husband, Andries van der Lith, and that he sued in that capacity. The defendants were George Conradie, a minor, Johannes Marthinus Conradie, sued in his capacity as father and natural guardian of the said minor, Pieter Jacobus Nel, Marthinus Johannes Koortz, and Cornelius Wouter Cloete, the two last named in their capacity as executors testamentary of the estate of the late Marthinus Johannes Koortz, senior. On or about the 25th February the plaintiff sold in his said capacity, and the second defendant for and on behalf of the said minor purchased by public auction a certain portion of the farm Riet Vlei, in the Klein Swarteborg, district of Prince Albert, known as Dwaars River, for the sum of £1,530. The second defendant, in his said capacity, and by his duly authorised agents, Messrs. Greeff and Walters, signed the conditions of sale as purchaser, and the defendant, Pieter Jacobus Nel, and the said Marthinus Johannes Koortz, senior, now deceased bound themselves as co-principal and securities in solidum for the due payment of the said purchase price, and signed the conditions of sale as such. The plaintiff had tendered and hereby again tendered transfer of the property, but the defendants neglected and refused to pay the purchase price. On or about the 18th December, 1902, the plaintiff sued the defendants, save and except the first named defendant, in the Supreme Court for provisional sentence on the said conditions of sale for the sum of £1,530, interest thereon at 6 per cent from the 25th February, 1902, and costs of suit, but this Court ordered the plaintiff to go into the principal case. The plaintiff claimed judgment against the defendants, the one paying the others to be absolved, for: (a) payment of £1,530; (b) interest thereon at 6 per cent. from the 25th February, 1902; (c) costs of suit, including the costs of the claim for provisional sentence.

Defendants in their plea said that the land referred to in the declaration was specially bequeathed to the first defendant, who was also made sole heir of the joint estate. The debts of the joint estate amounted to £500, the said debts being secured by mortgage on the said landed property, and, besides the heir and the mortgages, there were no persons interested in the said estate save in so far as plaintiff was interested in respect of any amounts which might be claimable by him as fees for acting as executor or as the auctioneer who held the sale referred to in the declaration. Defendants alleged that plaintiff gave little notification of the sale, and said that the two first-named defendants did not become aware thereof till the 20th February, 1902. The second defendant gave notice on the 20th February, on behalf of the first defendant through Messrs Greeff and Walters, that he protested against the sale taking place, but the plaintiff refused to withdraw, whereupon the said agents tendered a cheque for £500 for payment of all the debts of the estate. This the plaintiff refused to accept, and on his proceeding with the said sale the agents made protest against the sale as illegal, invalid, and unnecessary. Thereafter the said agents did, under protest, bid provisionally for the land, which was knocked down to them for £1,530, on behalf of the first defendant. The conditions of sale and the security bonds were provisionally signed by the defendants. The defendants said that the sale was null and void in that the sale effected provisionally under protest was to the first-named defendant of his own property. The defendants prayed that the plaintiff's claim should be dismissed with costs, such costs to be paid by him de bonis propriis. In reconvention, the defendants, now plaintiffs, alleged that the defendant had been guilty of misconduct and breach of duty in his capacity as executor as aforesaid, both in respect of the manner of advertising the sale and in respect of his wrongfully, mala fide, and maliciously going on with the sale under the circumstances aforesaid. They stated that in consequence they had incurred loss or damages in the sum of £75, especially in respect of travelling expenses, agents' fees, and otherwise. They claimed: (a) an order declaring the said sale null and void; (b) an order declaring that defendant had forfeited rights to any fee or commission as executor or auctioneer aforesaid; (c) judgment for £75 damages, as aforesaid; (d) alternative relief; (e) costs de bonis propriis, including attorney and client costs. As a further claim, the plaintiffs claimed £100 as damages for decrease in the value of the estate, caused by the difference of payment in transfer dues and other estate dues which the estate owed the Government.

In his replication and plea in reconvention, the plaintiff denied that the debts were £500, and said they amounted to £800, as also that there were no assets other than the landed property sufficient to satisfy the debts. He denied that the agents bid provisionally or under protest, and he also denied that the first two defendants had sustained any damage for which he was liable.

In their rejoinder, the defendants joined issue, and prayed that plaintiff's claim might be dismissed, with costs.

Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Alexander) was for the plaintiff, and Mr. Close (with him Mr. Bisset) was for the defendants.

Frederick Wm. Baynes Wilmot, law agent, said he was appointed executor dative in the estate of Van der Lith. Debts were proved amounting to £800 against the estate. Other expenses were incurred for printing, advertisements, and six months' interest due on a bond to Fairbridge, Arderne and Lawton. He valued the assets in the estate at £880, being the value of fixed and movable property. He decided to sell the landed property, and had the sale advertised in the "Government Gazette" and by handbills. The sale was, as a consequence, well known throughout the district. He saw the minor Conradie in January, 1902, about the position of the estate. He told Conradie if he wanted the farm he should get someone to help him, either to pay the debts or buy the farm. There were two preferent creditors besides the ordinary creditors. He held a sale. He received no notification from the defendants until immediately before the sale, when Mr. Walters read a protest embodied in a letter of the 20th February on behalf of the minor Conradie. The letter said that they would be prepared to pay such amount as might appear to witness to be due, and insinuated that the sale was being held for but one reason, viz., his own benefit. He told Mr. Walters in reply that he had had ample time before wherein to object, and witness could not consent to stop the sale at the eleventh hour. They did not make any offer to him. He denied that a cheque for £500 was tendered to him in payment of the debts. The conditions were read after the protest. The document was signed by Mr. Walters and also signed by Koortz and Nel as sureties. He sued for provisional sentence on the conditions, and the Court ordered that the principal case should be gone into. No appearance was entered on behalf of the defendant.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Is the defendant the sole heir?]

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, my lord.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Is he still prepared to pay all the debts?]

Yes, he is.

[De Villiers, C. J.: It is a pity, under the circumstances, that they could not fix up their differences.]

The case turns upon what took place at the sale. The proceedings were under protest, and there was a clear proof that the tender was definitely refused by Mr. Wilmot.

We are still prepared to settle the matter if the defendant would pay all the debts.

[De Villiers, C. J.: So far as I can judge, the only question will be one of costs.]

There are certain debts which have been incurred since the sale that might be objected to.

[De Villiers, C J.:· You had better proceed with your case.]

Witness (cross-examined by Mr. Close): Witness told the minor. Conradie, before the sale what the position of the estate was. The reason why he did not advertise in any of the newspapers was on account of martial law. The general newspapers were not allowed to circulate through the post. So far as he was aware, the "Cape Times" was only allowed to come by train. At every shop in the village the sale was advertised. The handbills were sent to Ladismith, Kalitzdorp, Oudtshoorn, and elsewhere. Mr. Walters accepted the situation. He denied that Mr. Walters produced a cheque-book, and said that he would pay the debts of the estate if they amounted to £1,000. Mr. Walters did not produce a cheque for £500, and say that it was counter-signed by the manager of the Standard Bank. He did not hear Mr. Walters say that they were going to keep the estate if it cost £5,000. The bidding went up to £1,530. He did not go on raising the bids against Mr. Walters after £1,000 had been reached. They adjourned to a dining-room in an outside house to sign the conditions. Basson was present, as well as the sureties, and Mr. Walters and himself. Not one word was said about the protest at that time. Mr. Walters did not say he was signing subject to his protest. As to the lapse of time between the sale and demand for the purchase price, he saw Mr. Walters, who said that he had the money, but he was afraid that he would not be able to get his costs from Conradie, senior. Conradie was that character of a man that he was sorry he had had anything to do with him. He had not the slightest recollection of receiving a letter from Mr. Walters under date the 15th July. He did not go over to Mr. Walters, and propose to him that he should let him have a formal cheque for £1,530, just to satisfy the Master of the Supreme Court. The movable property realised about £50 or £60. He thought the principal buyer at the sale of movables was the minor, Conradie. Three of the notices of the sale of Van der Lith's estate were sent to Bartenafontein, which was a post office, and the minor Conradie resided there.

Re-examined by Mr. Alexander: All the bids over £1,000 were quite genuine, and if the property had been sold to someone else, the heir would have had the benefit.

By De Villiers, C.J.: The reason why he did not make any arrangement was that the whole thing was sprung upon him, and as a matter of fact the minor's agent had been there all day.

Pieter Nicolas Basson, farmer, Laingsburg, said that the plaintiff gave him handbills to distribute for the sale. There were other sales mentioned on the bills, besides Van der Lith's. He saw the minor on his way out. In conversation they spoke about the sale of the farm. The minor said there would be a lot for him to pay if he had to buy in the property, as there were a lot of debts. Witness was present at the sale. He saw no cheque produced. He did not see Walters produce a cheque-book. He was close to the auctioneer all the time. When Mr. Wilmot refused to accept the protest, Mr. Walters did not say anything further. He saw the conditions signed. He did not hear Mr. Walters raise any further protest.

Cross-examined by Mr. Close: He was not particularly anxious to buy the property. He would have been quite willing to pay more than £1,000. He did not see Mr. Walters offer anything to Mr. Wilmot. He held the vendu roll for Mr. Wilmot. He was present when the conditions were signed.

By Mr. Gardiner: Witness bid up to £1,529.

Johannes Krantz, farmer, said he was at the sale. The sale was well advertised by handbills. Walters came to the sale at about nine o'clock in the morning. When the sale of Van der Lith's land was put up, Walters took a paper from his pocket, and read it to the auctioneer. This was in the form of a protest. Witness did not see a cheque. Walters said that the heir was able to pay. After the property was knocked down to Walters, witness heard no protest. Witness had a conversation with George Conradie before the sale. He did not see Walters produce a cheque-book. He was close to the auctioneer.

George L. H. de Beer, farmer, deposed to being present at the sale. He corroborated the statements of the last witness as to what occurred there.

Mr. Gardiner closed his case.

Mr. Close called

Johannes Martinus Conradie, the second defendant in the suit, who said his son was the heir to the Van der Lith estate. The Van der Lith's had adopted his son, who was about 19 at the time of the sale. Witness heard of the sale about ten days before the sale from Mr. Walters. Witness and his son had seen Mr. Wilmot previously, and asked him what the debt of the estate was, and he replied he had no time then to go into particulars. Witness told Wilmot he wanted to ascertain in order to pay off the debt. This was before witness heard of the sale. When Walters told him of the sale, witness said they must find some plan to stop it. Witness took a letter to Wilmot's office, but the latter was not in. Witness then agreed to go with his son and Walters to the sale. When the estate property came up, Walters took a letter from his pocket—the one witness instructed him to write—and read it. Walters told the people he protested against the sale as illegal. Walters took a cheque from his pocket, and told Wilmot it was a cheque for £500, endorsed by the bank manager. He asked Wilmot to let him know if the debt was more, and he would pay. Wilmot would not take the cheque. Walters said he would bid for the property under protest. He bid up to £1,529. Witness believed the then value was about £1,000. The Municipal valuation was £750, and the sworn appraisement £800. Witness saw no one bidding at the sale afterwards. Wilmot never came to witness in regard to the debts, nor did he write. In November last witness received a demand. He put the matter in the hands of Mr. Walters. At about Christmas time witness received a summons. He gave instructions for Walters to defend the case. As far as witness knew, there was no hurry to pay Koortz's bond at the time of the sale; no notice had been given.

By Mr. Gardiner: Witness did not see any handbills in connection with the sale. The highest bid, other than that of witness's son, was £1,000.

George R. Conradie, one of the defendants in the case, said he would be 21 years of age next month. He was adopted when a baby by the Van der Liths, and lived with them as their son. He had for the last few years managed the farm, and knew its capabilities. Wilmot never came to witness and told him what the debts on the estate were. Witness did not tell Krantz it was impossible for him (witness) to pay the debts. Witness first heard of the intended sale about four days before it took place. Witness corroborated his father's evidence as to going to Wilmot's office before the sale, and as to what occurred at the sale.

By Mr. Gardiner: Wilmot never said a word to witness about what the debts were. Basson did not tell witness about the sale. Witness did not talk to Krantz about the sale. Witness knew the bond amounted to £550.

Petrus Jacobus Nel, another of the defendants, gave similar evidence concerning the action of Walters at the sale. Walters said he had a cheque for £500, and that any amounts above that he would pay. Basson was not present when the conditions of sale were signed. When the signing took place Walters asked witness to sign as security under protest. Witness did so, as also did Koortz.

John Orlando Walters, agent-at-law, gave evidence in confirmation of that of the previous witnesses. Before the sale witness took the letter of protest to Wilmot's office together with the cheque, but Wilmot had already gone to the sale. He also took the cheque-book containing the cheque for £500. After the cheque was refused witness destroyed it. He now produced the book of counterfoils of the cheque-book showing a record of this cheque. Witness wrote to Wilmot after the sale, and the latter came to witness's office in consequence. Witness told Wilmot he would not pay the amount of the purchase money, as he had at all times been willing to pay the amounts of the debts, as they existed at the time of the sale, and had tendered to do so. The value of the farm at the time of the sale was from £800 to £1,000. Witness sent a letter to Wilmot in July, and afterwards had an interview with Wilmot, at which the latter suggested that witness should give him a formal cheque for £1,530. The next thing he heard about the matter was with regard to the application for provisional sentence. He had no time to instruct counsel. He went to plaintiff's attorneys, and explained the position of affairs to Mr. Pearson, telling him that they were still prepared to settle the case by paying all the debts due against the estate.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He saw the notice in the "Gazette." He was press censor at the time of the sale being advertised. He did not see the advertisement of the sale in the "Gazette" until February 20, although it appeared in the "Gazette" of the 4th February. He did not apply for an interdict against the sale because he thought that if he tendered money to pay all the debts, Mr. Wilmot would be willing to abandon the sale. He tendered the cheque to Wilmot, and he afterwards destroyed it. He only had the counterfoil. He heard no other bids against him after £1.000 had been reached, except by Mr. Wilmot. He did not see Mr. Basson bidding. He did not know when Mr. Basson signed the conditions of sale as witness. He did not suggest that the protest should be entered upon the conditions, but he said to Mr. Wilmot that he was signing under protest. He was certain he had an interview with Mr. Wilmot in July. Mr. Wilmot wanted the formal cheque to show to the Master, so that he could get his commission. He did not know what the amount of the debts was. All he knew was that the mortgages were £500. He asked Mr. Pearson if he would accept a cheque for the amount of the debts, but Mr. Pearson said that the matter had already gone too far, and must come before the Court. He did not tell Mr. Wilmot that he was afraid he should not get his costs from Conradie, senior.

By De Villiers, C.J.: He had a cheque counter-signed by the manager of the Standard Bank for £500. He did not ask for more than that sum. He could have found money to the amount of £800 if necessary.

Herbert Pope said in February, 1902, he was manager of the Standard Bank at Laingsburg. The firm of Greeff and Walters was a client of the bank. On the 22nd February, Mr. Walters came to him with his cheque-book, and asked him to initial a cheque for £500. Witness produced transcript of entry in the ledger of the bank. The cheque was good for payment in 14 days, and was for £500. It was made payable to the executor of the Estate Van der Lith. At that time Greeff and Walters were perfectly good to meet their engagements. He would have been prepared to meet a cheque of theirs up to £1,000.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: As to whether it would have been necessary to give an overdraft, witness thought that was a matter between banker and client, and unless the Court directed he did not think he should disclose the account.

Pieter Nicolas Koortz said he had a bond on the Van der Lith's estate for £200. He had a conversation with Mr. Wilmot after the meeting of those interested in the estate in November, 1901, and he agreed that the bond should remain on the estate. He saw Mr. Walters offer Mr. Wilmot a cheque for £500 at the sale. He was two paces away from Mr. Walters.

Cross-examined by Mr. Gardiner: He was quite sure that he saw Mr. Walters tender the cheque.

Johannes P. Nel, storekeeper, in the Laingsburg district, corroborated the last witness as to what took place at the sale.

This concluded the evidence.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

De Villiers, C.J.: It has been correctly stated from the bar that it is the duty of an executor to realise and liquidate the estate administered by him, and that if the estate owes any debts, it is his duty to pay those debts out of the moneys realised by him. But it is no part of an executor's duty to sell any property specifically bequeathed if there are other assets to meet the debts of the estate. Even if there are no other assets to meet such debts, the executor is not justified in selling any property specifically bequeathed, whether it be moveable or immoveable, if the legatee is prepared to pay him the amount of the debts himself. The defendant Conradie is the sole legatee of the farm now in question. On the day of the sale he was present, and his agent Walters read a public protest against the sale, and offered to pay the debts of the estate on behalf of Conradie. Notwithstanding such protest and offer, the plaintiff, as executor, proceeded with the sale, and the defendant's father—the defendant being a minor—purchased the farm on behalf of the defendant Conradie. Conditions of sale were drawn up, and they were signed by the defendant Conradie's father as natural guardian, and by the two other defendants as sureties. The present action is brought to enforce those conditions of sale. Subsequently to the sale repeated offers were made by the defendants to pay the amount of the debts in lieu of carrying out the conditions of sale, but the offers were refused by the plaintiff. In my opinion he committed a grave error of judgment in refusing the offers. He was quite justified in protecting the interests of the creditors, but he exceeded his duty in insisting upon a wholly unnecessary sale. The only person entitled to the proceeds of the sale after payment of the debts was the defendant Conradie, and if he was prepared to pay the debts himself there could be no object in effecting a sale to him of property, which under the will was bequeathed to him. I am of opinion, therefore, that the plaintiff should fail in his action against Conradie. The next question is, should the plaintiff succeed in his action against the sureties? The general principle is that when the principal debtor obtains a restitution on the ground of a real defect in the obligation, such as fraud or mistake, the rescission of the principal obligation discharges the sureties. If, however, the restitution is founded upon reasons personal to the principal debtor, as, for instance, his minority, the obligation of the sureties remains in force. If, therefore, there had been a rescission of the sale to Conradie on the ground of his minority, and there had been no special circumstances to relieve the sureties from liability the Court would have been bound to give judgment against them. But it is clear that even if it had become necessary to sell the farm the only person entitled to the proceeds of the sale after payment of the debts of the estate would have been Conradie himself. The creditors had no interest in the farm realising more than the amount owing to them by the estate, and this amount Conradie was ready and willing to pay to the plaintiff, as executor, acting on their behalf. The question, therefore, whether the conditions of sale should be enforced as against the sureties is really a question between them and Conradie as principal debtor. He is willing to pay the debts of the estate, and, as there is no creditor entitled to take advantage of the suretyship, the plaintiff, as executor, has no right to enforce the claim against the sureties. The defendants by their claim in reconvention have made serious charges of misconduct, malice, and mala fides against the plaintiff, and they claim that he should not be allowed to draw any fees for anything done by him in connection with the administration of the estate. I am bound, however, to say that although there has been a grave error of judgment on the part of the plaintiff there is no ground for the serious charges brought against him. He honestly believed that it was his duty to proceed with the sale, notwithstanding the defendants' protest and offer, and he did everything in his power to obtain a good price for the property. He should not, however, receive more fees than he would have received if he had transferred the farm to Conradie upon payment to him of the amount of the debts. The debts amounted to £800, and the fees would have been 1½ per cent. on that amount. The moveables realised £62, and on that amount he is entitled to 5 per cent., but he will not be allowed any commission as auctioneer in the sale of the property. In regard to the costs of the action, if I had thought that there was any want of bona fides on the plaintiff's part I should certainly have ordered him to pay the costs de bonis propriis but under all the circumstances, the costs will be paid out of the estate.

BOLD V. BOUTELLIER.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on certain promissory notes for £167 5s. 1d., with interest accrued.

Order granted as prayed.

LITHMAN AND CO. V. GOODMAN.

This case, in which Mr. Close appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Searle, K.C., for the defendant, was allowed to stand over until Saturday, counsel for the plaintiff stating that the matter had just been placed in his hands, and he had had no opportunity of examining the affidavits.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

REID V. EFROIKEN.

Mr. Close said that this matter had been set down for judgment by default, but as a matter of some urgency defendant was anxious to have the case heard this term. Plaintiff was willing to consent to the case being heard, and defendant being allowed to plead, and, if possible, for the case to be heard this term if their lordships would fix a date.

[De Villiers, C.J.: I am afraid there is no possible chance of its being heard this term.]

Mr. Gardiner (for the defendant) said that they had received a letter from the other side consenting to the filing of the plea, and the removal of the bar for that purpose, defendant to go to trial this term and to pay wasted costs. Plaintiff claimed the purchase price of certain oathay, and the defence was that only a portion had been delivered, and a claim was set up in reconvention for damages for breach of contract in not delivering the said oathay.

The Court granted leave to plead, wasted costs to be paid by the defendant, the case to come on for hearing on the 26th June.

WOODHEAD, PLANT AND CO. V. HAYWARD.

Mr. Pyemont moved for judgment under rule 329d for £64 10s., on account of goods sold and delivered, interest a tempore morae, and costs of suit.

PETERSON V. BLAKE.

Mr. Burton moved for judgment for the amount of plaintiff's claim for professional services rendered, nursing, and maintenance of a patient at the expense of the defendant.

Mr. Close (for the defendant) said that the papers had only just been placed in his hands, and he asked that the case should be allowed to stand over until later in the day. Affidavits were read to the effect that defendant had a valid defence to the claim.

Mr. Burton read a letter from defendant's attorneys on the 19th May, tendering £24, with costs to date, for the maintenance, and asking for indulgence in the matter of doctor's fees.

De Villiers, C. J.: What the Court will do is to grant judgment as if by default, and to leave it to defendant to take further steps. The case will be treated as if there were no appearance for the defendant now.

MARAIS V. BASSON.

Mr. Van Zyl moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for £162 19s., for goods sold and delivered, with interest thereon, from the 7th May, 1903, and costs.

Judgment as prayed.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

OOSTHUYSEN V. OOSTHUYSEN. { 1903. May 28th.

Mr. Russell applied for an order declaring the defendant, Marthinus Jacobus Oosthuysen, of unsound mind, and appointing a curator to his person and property.

Mr. Gardiner watched the proceedings on behalf of the curator ad litem.

Mr. Russell read the affidavits of the defendant's wife and eldest son, and two medical practitioners sworn before Mr. C. J. Roux, R.M. of Riversdale, the effect of their statements being that defendant had for some time been very strange in his manner, that he had not clothed himself properly, that he refused food, that he was of unsound mind, and mentally unfit to manage his own affairs.

The report of the curator ad litem stated that the defendant was of unsound mind, and suggested that his eldest son, Gerhardus Johannes Oosthuysen, would be a fit and proper person to be appointed his curator.

Mr. Gardiner pointed out that the affidavit of the eldest son said that he did not feel himself competent to manage his father's affairs.

The Court granted an order declaring the defendant of unsound mind, and appointing Gerhardus Johannes Oosthuysen curator of his person, and Dirk Versfeld curator of his property, costs to come out of the estate.

ATKINS V. DELPONTE.

Mr. Russell, on behalf of the applicant, moved as a matter of urgency for the appointment of a commission to examine the defendant's witness, Rene Modrie, who was compelled to leave for Bulawayo that day to take up a situation.

Application granted, Mr. Van Zyl to act as commissioner.

Mr. Gardiner, at a later stage, mentioned this matter, stating that there had been no appearance for the plaintiff to the suit, owing to the fact that notice was only served upon them at half-past ten that morning. Plaintiff was at present in Johannesburg, and no opportunity would be afforded of cross-examining the witness if the commission took evidence that day. The case, counsel added, referred to rent that the plaintiff was suing for.

The Court directed that the order already given should stand, reserving to the plaintiff the right to apply for a commissioner to cross-examine the witness.

TRIAL CAUSES.

ADAMS V. CLARKE. { 1903. May 28th

Collision—Negligence—Motor car.

A cart and horse belonging to the defendant were standing in a public road on the proper side when the plaintiff's motor car came from behind and frightened the horse, which began to swerve from side to side. The coachman was a skilful driver and did everything he could to pacify the horse, but the motor continued on its course and endeavoured to pass just as the horse was nearly across the road. In so doing the motor struck the shoulder of the horse, causing damage to the motor as well as to the horse.

Held, that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, that the defendant was not guilty of negligence or contributory negligence, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover damages for injury to the motor, but that the defendant was entitled to damages for injury to the horse.

Held further, that if the driver of a motor car sees or ought to see that an animal is frightened by the motion or noise of the motor, and that a collision is likely to result unless he slackens speed or stops altogether, he is guilty of negligence if he does not regulate his speed accordingly.

This was an action brought by Sidney Harry Adams, of Cape Town, against Dr. Clarke, of Simon's Town, to recover £40 damages caused to his motor-car in a collision with the defendant's horse and cart, owing to the alleged negligence of the defendant or his servant.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff resided at Kenilworth, and that the defendant was a medical practitioner, residing at Simon's Town. On or about the 7th March, 1903, plaintiff was proceeding to Simon's Town in his motor-car when, in passing the lower North Battery, he met a horse and cart, belonging to the defendant, and then in charge of the defendant or his servant. The plaintiff alleged that the said horse, owing to the neglect and want of proper care of the defendant or his servant, jumped on to the plaintiff's said car, causing the car and cart to collide, and thereby causing certain injuries to plaintiff's car. Plaintiff claimed £40 damages.

Defendant, in his plea, denied the neglect alleged by the plaintiff, and said that while the horse and cart were lawfully standing on the side of the main road at Simon's Town, the motor-car approached the said horse and cart behind at an excessive speed, and the said motor-car was driven up against the said horse and cart, and cut and seriously injured the said horse and damaged the said cart. Defendant counter-claimed, by reason of the neglect alleged in the plea, for damages to the horse and cart in the sum of £30.

Mr. Burton for plaintiff; Mr. Upington for defendant.

Mr. Burton said that the whole matter came down to this: It was clear that the horse and cart and the motor-car collided. The defendant said it was the fault of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff said it was the fault of the defendant. That was the issued to be decided.

Evidence was then called.

The plaintiff, Sidney Harry Adams, said he was general manager in South Africa of Rudge-Whitworth Coy. (Ltd.). On the 7th March last he drove out from Cape Town in a motor-car. They started from the City Club. He was accompanied by Mr. Hitchin, architect, Mr. Johnson (of Pauling's), and his mechanician. The car was capable of carrying five. At Muizenberg Mr. Johnson got out and witness's wife joined the car. They left Muizenberg for Simon's Town about four o'clock. Witness was driving and had charge of the steering-gear on the right. His mechanician was on his left. It was a very wet day. The weather affected their travelling, and they had to go very slowly. The road was muddy beyond Fishhoek. He estimated the rate of speed at from six to eight miles an hour. The gear provided for three rates of speed, and one reverse. The lowest rate was five miles, the second sixteen, and the third twenty-eight. He fixed the speed by the speed lever. Witness explained how the different gears were put into operation. He said he had the motor-car on the second rate of speed between Fishhoek and Simon's Town, but he modified that by the adjustment of the governors and air valves. In driving along, he approached the North Battery in Simon's Town. Near the point marked "C" on the plans there were soldiers playing football, some on the road, and some on the camp ground. He had to reduce the speed almost to dead slow. Then they had to turn a corner. He came round the corner marked "C," and sounded his hooter. He saw a cart and horse standing ahead near the main gate of the battery, the horse facing towards Simon's Town. He did not alter his speed in driving between the point "C" and the main gate; he just let the car go along slowly. There was ample room to pass the cart. He again sounded his horn. He did not notice any signs of restiveness on the part of the horse, or he should have stopped. There was a man in the cart. When he had heard their signal, the man pulled himself up and caught hold of the reins. When they were passing, the horse reared up and jumped on to the front of the car. The horse swerved right on to them.

[De Villiers, C.J. (to witness): Do you think the driver did something to make the horse jump?]

Witness: I did not see it, but I cannot imagine how the horse could have got there without. As a general rule, we find that if a horse is frightened it will either bolt forward or back, but not jump into danger.

[De Villiers, C.J.: That is the suggestion. You don't blame the horse; you blame the man?]

Witness: I blame the man. In further evidence witness said the horse came with its off-foreleg on the front of the car, and witness was pinned in his stomach against the pillow. The wheel of the car was locked. The horse was slightly injured. The car ran right on to the battery railings. If they had been travelling at a high speed the car would have been completely wrecked, and his mechanician and himself would have been killed. The horse bolted after it had got free from the car. The fact that the engine was not smashed, or the frame broken, or the wheels buckled, showed that they were not travelling at a high rate of speed. He denied entirely that he drove into the horse. The woodwork at the front of the car was damaged, the two front lamps were smashed, one of the side-lamps was ripped up, and the tyres were damaged through quick braking, the total damage done to the car being £40. He had frequently driven cars, especially in England.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The Lanchester was a new car. He should say he had driven this particular car about eight times. The Lanchester was different from other cars. The steering was such as he was accustomed to. He saw men playing on the green but he did not see men at the point marked "C." The speed at which he turned the corner did not exceed six to eight miles an hour. He denied that the horse was jumping about the road when he turned the corner. The hood of the cart was open. He did not suggest that the boy was asleep; he was lying back in the cart. It was a skeleton hood that was on the cart. It was impossible for people on the road to estimate the speed at which a car travelled. Only the driver could tell the speed by his gear. He did not see the slightest reason to pull up. He could pull up his car within ten yards on a wet road. After the accident, he sent a letter to the defendant, in which he stated that when he saw the horse jumping on to the car, he had to turn the car aside owing to the horse and cart being interlocked with the car. He took every measure to avoid a bad accident and had he not succeeded in pulling up, a very serious fatality might have occurred. There was no panic on the car when the accident occurred, although they all received a shock.

John Sander, mechanical engineer, in the employ of the Rudge-Whitworth Co., said he had had experience of motor-cars since 1900. He agreed with the last witness generally as to what took place between Muizenberg and the battery. He should estimate the rate at which they were travelling at from six to eight miles an hour. After they passed the corner, he saw no signs of restiveness on the part of the horse. The boy in the cart seemed to be either reclining or sitting back. They had got the front wheels of the car level with the wheels of the cart, and without any warning the horse swerved, and half-reared, and came down on the front of the car. The car weighed above a ton when loaded, and if they had been going at a high speed, they would probably have gone right through, or half-way through, the battery railings.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: As far as he could see, the horse was not restive when they had turned the corner. He considered that there was no necessity to pull up. They did not strike the horse by trying to cut past it; as a matter of fact, the horse struck the car.

Thomas Henry Hitchin, architect, Cape Town, one of the passengers in the car, said they had slowed down to pass the soldiers on the road. He estimated their speed at the time at about six miles an hour. They did not increase the speed when they passed the corner. When they were a little distance from the horse, about twenty yards, the animal moved its head up and down, as if aware of the approach of the car, but there was no jumping about. There was no reason whatever to indicate that they could not safely pass the horse and cart. He denied that the car ran into the horse, and declared that the horse ran into the car.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: He was accustomed to motors. He denied that they were travelling at a high speed after they passed the corner. The horse was not already across the road when they tried to pass it. If the horse had been across the road they would have pulled up.

Jas. Kingston, a gunner in the Royal Garrison Artillery, stationed at the North Battery, said he was inside the main gate when the collision occurred. The horse was under the charge of a coloured "boy." The animal was of restive habits. He had seen it shy before. The car seemed to be travelling a little faster than an ordinary horse. It was nonsense to say that it was travelling as fast as a railway train. The horse was shaking its head as the car drew towards it. Witness corroborated the previous witnesses as to the horse swerving and jumping on to the car.

This was all the evidence for the plaintiff.

The defendant, Dr. Clarke, district surgeon of Simon's Town, said he had driven to the Lower North Battery at Simon's Town on the afternoon in question. He left the cart in charge of a native named David, who was a good, reliable driver. He was about 10 to 15 yards from the cart when he heard a hooter being sounded. He was talking to Major Bushe inside the railings. He noticed that the horse was frightened before he heard the hooter. Then the horse gave a jump forward. He saw his man, who was seated in the cart, take hold of the reins. He ran to the gate, and then when he got there he saw the car flash past the battery. Then he saw the motor dash into the horse. The horse afterwards bolted. The horse was badly cut about the off shoulder. Witness did not remember seeing the last witness there. He did not see the actual collision. The horse was exchanged with one that cost £50, The animal was now blemished, and could not safely be driven. It was still dangerous to drive, and was now being used by Mr. Albertyn.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: The horse was perfectly quiet before the collision, and inclined to be lazy. It might be that the horse had been seen to shy before. As a matter of fact, it had shied before. He had no opportunity of signalling to the motor car to stop; he could not see the car. The car was travelling very fast. He only saw it pass the gate. He would not be able to estimate the rate of speed. The car was going past the gate twice as fast as a horse that trotted past there.

Re-examined by Mr. Upington: He produced a brass pin of the shaft of his cart, taken off shortly after the accident. The pin showed where the horse was struck. He considered that this was the only thing that locked his cart to the car. He had examined his cart, and this was the only mark.

Major Francis Bushe, R.A., said they were encamped at Simon's Town on the date named. He heard the hooter. He saw that the horse immediately became frightened, and it jumped about in the road. The boy was handling the horse skilfully, and in a minute more he would, in witness's opinion, have got it quiet again. He estimated the speed at which the car passed the gate as ten to twelve miles an hour. He was certain that the horse did not rear up and jump on to the motor car. He saw the collision. By the impact of the car with the railings, the rails of the fort were considerably bent. The whole thing lasted a very short time; he supposed not more than ten seconds would elapse between the last sound of the hooter and the collision. He heard plaintiff say that he had to turn into the rails or he should have had to kill the horse. He did not remember the exact words, but that was the effect. The horse was wounded in two or three places.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He was talking with Dr. Clarke about twenty yards from the gate. Witness remained there, and Dr. Clarke went away. He did not notice the gunner Kingston there at the time. He saw the horse jumping about the road before the car reached it. The animal was swaying about as if it were trying to bolt, and the groom was doing his utmost to hold it in. He thought if there was any mistake in his calculation of the speed of the car, it would be that he had underestimated it.

By De Villiers, C.J.: The horse seemed to be startled by the hooter, and it was kept up perhaps by the rattle of the car. He thought if the driver had had another quarter of a minute he would have got the horse quiet again.

J. Leach, gunner in the 56th Co. Royal Garrison Artillery, said he was sentry at the Lower North Battery on the date named. Before the accident, he saw the car coming at not less than 12 miles an hour. The horse was restive, and was trying to bolt. The motor-man did not slacken speed, but came on at a good rate, and tried to cut past the horse. The car struck the horse, and dashed into the rails.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: There was scarcely room for the car to pass between the horse and ditch. The car actually ran into the ditch. The horse was across the road.

Thomas James Wilson, corporal in the 56th Co. Royal Garrison Artillery, said the horse was moving about when the car came round the corner, and it became more restive as the car approached, and when the car was opposite the wicket-gate the horse was almost diagonally across the road. The motor-man tried to pass the horse on the front, but struck it, and then ran into the ditch. Witness was a cyclist, and he certainly should not have tried to pass the horse in the position in which it was.

David Slemah, a native coachman, in the employ of Dr. Clarke, said that on the afternoon of the accident he was waiting at the gate of the Lower North Battery. A little before the accident he noticed that the horse was frightened, and that it was jumping about. He tried to quieten it. The horse was struck by the motor. The horse did not jump on to the car. The horse and cart were drawn by the car to the battery railings.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: He had driven the horse since the accident. The animal shied more now than it did before. He only heard the hooter once, and then it was just before the collision. He had not been asleep in the cart.

Casper Pieter Albertyn, of Simon's Town, said that Dr. Clarke exchanged a gelding valued at between £45 and £50 for the pony that he let defendant have. He frequently drove the horse before the accident. It was then quiet and good mannered. The horse was now very dangerous to drive. It seemed to be very nervous. He should not like to give more than £25 for the pony now.

Mr. Upington read the affidavit of Patrick Burke, of the 56th Company Royal Garrison Artillery, who said that the motor travelled at a very fast rate towards the defendant's horse and cart. He saw the horse plunging to and fro in the road when the car was 70 yards away. The speed of the car did not slacken until it struck the horse. The car passed like lightning, and faster than a train anyway. The boy on the cart held the reins when the car gave the alarm. The horse was high spirited. The car struck the horse, and not the horse the car.

Counsel for the plaintiff having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: I quite agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiff that a motor-car has as much right to be upon a public road as any other vehicle, but this general statement must be taken with some qualification. It should not be forgotten that motoring is an entirely novel mode of locomotion, and that there are many horses which have the greatest repugnance to passing a motor-car, or being passed by a motor-car. It is, therefore, the duty of the person who is in charge of the motor-car, when he observes that he is about to pass an animal which shows signs of restiveness or fright, to do everything in his power to prevent an accident. If he sees, or has an opportunity of seeing, that a collision is likely to result unless he slackens speed or stops altogether, he is clearly guilty of negligence if he does not regulate his speed accordingly. The time may come when all animals on the roads will become used to seeing and hearing motor-cars pass, but until the practice of motoring becomes much more universal than it is at present, the owner of an animal cannot be regarded as guilty of negligence if the animal in swerving through fright causes a collision. In the present case the plaintiff's own witnesses are not agreed as to the conduct of the horse when the plaintiff's cart was approaching the cart. According to the plaintiff himself he saw no signs of restiveness on the part of the horse, Sander also says he saw no signs of restiveness, and yet the gentleman who accompanied them, Mr. Hitchin, who was sitting behind with another member of the party in the car, did observe signs of restiveness. Now, if he did observe signs of restiveness they must have been very clearly marked, and, therefore, it is clear that the man who was driving the motor-car must have been somewhat unobservant in not seeing that this horse was restive, a point which was observable to a man who was sitting behind him in the car. Then there are other witnesses who stood much nearer. There is Major Bushe, who saw clearly that the horse was restive. There were intervening between him and the cart some railings, and therefore he would not perhaps be able to see most distinctly everything that passed, but he saw the horse moving from side to side, and he is perfectly satisfied that the driver of the cart was careful and cautious, and that he did everything that a careful driver could do to prevent the horse from bolting, or from doing anything in the nature of an injury. But then there were other witnesses who were in an even better position to observe what passed, viz., Wilson and Burke. With regard to Burke's evidence, some ridicule has been bestowed on his statements because his language is somewhat exaggerated, and I have no doubt that he does somewhat exaggerate the facts of the case, as witnesses of that class are apt to do. They repeat what has happened, and they school themselves for giving evidence, and ultimately when they do give their evidence, it is in a somewhat exaggerated form. But it does not follow that everything they say is to be taken as untrue. He speaks, for instance, of this car as passing at lightning speed. Well, it was not going at lightning speed. Then he speaks of the car as passing as fast as a train. Perhaps he meant the trains as they usually passed at that particular point. But whatever the speed was, it is clear that the car must have been going at a somewhat fast speed when the collision occurred. Major Bushe, whose ordinary avocations enable him to measure speed—he knows the speed at which the artillery have to pass at reviews—he is perfectly satisfied that the speed was fully between ten and twelve miles an hour, and he says further, in cross-examination, if he is mistaken at all he is mistaken in putting the speed at too low a rate rather than too high a rate. The mistake which the plaintiff made, in my opinion, was that when it was observable that there was a horse, a restive horse, standing on the right side of the road, swerving from side to side, he did not stop or even materially slacken his speed, but endeavoured to pass between the horse and the right side of the road. The consequence was that the car caught the horse on the side, and caused the injury to the horse, I cannot believe that the accident could have happened in the way stated by the plaintiff without much more serious consequences to the horse. The plaintiff's case is that he was coming very quietly, that the horse suddenly swerved and jumped on the motor-car. That seems to be such an extremely improbable thing that if there are other credible witnesses who oppose this view altogether, I feel bound to adopt the view of the other witnesses. If it had happened as the plaintiff alleges, I should think that there would have been injuries not only to the shoulders of the horse, but also to the lower part of its leg. We only find that the injury was on the shoulder. In my opinion, therefore, so far from there being any negligence on the part of the defendant, there was negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The accident, I think, would not have occurred if the plaintiff had, when he observed the restiveness of the horse, stopped for a moment and given the man a chance to pacify the horse. According to the evidence, this man was a skilful driver. There is no evidence, as there is so often in these cases, to show that the man has ever had an accident before. It is suggested that he was asleep. It is a mere suggestion, and counsel for the plaintiff said that the chief evidence in his favour was that of the driver of the horse himself. Certainly, if that is his chief evidence, the rest of the evidence must be very weak indeed. So far as the plaintiff's evidence went, there was no evidence whatever of neglect on the part of the defendant's driver. Unfortunately he failed in pacifying the horse, and the question is, who must bear the loss that has resulted? In my opinion the plaintiff alone is responsible, and must bear the loss. The defendant has claimed in reconvention, and the counsel has candidly stated that the question of damages must be left to the Court. The only independent witness who has given evidence upon this question of damages is Mr. Albertyn. According to him, the horse was worth £45 to £50 at the time it was exchanged to the defendant. After the accident, he says, he would not pay £25 for it. That would show at all events £20 damages. The judgment of the Court must, therefore, be for the defendant on the claim in convention, and upon the claim in reconvention the defendant must have judgment for £20 damages, and the plaintiff must pay the costs of the action.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and a Jury.]

S. A. FISHERIES v. KAMP. { 1903. May 28th, „ 29th.

This was an action for the recovery of the sum of £2,970 4s. 4d., as damages alleged to have been caused to plaintiffs by the negligence or default of the defendant.

The plaintiffs' declaration was as follows:

1. Plaintiffs are a duly incorporated company, carrying on business at Cape Town, and defendant was, at the time of the occurrences herein referred to, the owner of certain cold storage premises situated at Woodstock.

2. Defendant is indebted to plaintiffs in the sum of £125 2s. 7d., in respect of fish supplied at various times between the months of August, 1900, and May, 1902, both months inclusive, as will appear from the accounts rendered to defendant.

3. Plaintiffs are likewise entitled to claim from defendant the sum of £10, being the value of packing cases, the property of plaintiffs, which were wrongfully and unlawfully removed by defendant, and which have not been restored.

4. During the years 1900, 1901, and 1902, plaintiffs occupied certain space or accommodation in defendant's cold storage premises.

5. Owing to the defectiveness of machinery and other causes, defendant failed to uniformly maintain the said space at the proper temperature, and the said space was from time to time inundated with water partly escaping from the machinery employed, and partly running in, owing to the carelessness and negligence of defendant's servants.

6. From time to time plaintiffs were compelled to destroy large quantities of fish stored in the said space, which had turned bad owing to the rises of temperature and inundations of water referred to in the preceding paragraph.

7. The value of the fish so destroyed amounted in all to the sum of £2,970 4s. 4d., as will appear from the account hereunto annexed, which sum plaintiffs are entitled to claim from defendant.

Wherefore plaintiffs pray:

(a) Judgment for the sums of £125 2s. 7d., £10, and £2,970 4s. 4d.

(b) Interest a tempore morœ.

(c) Alternative relief.

(d) Costs of suit.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded as follows:

1. Paragraph 1 of the declaration is admitted.

2. Defendant admits that he is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of £108 6s. 9d. for fish supplied, but says that the plaintiffs are indebted to him in a larger sum. Save as excepted defendant denies paragraph 2.

3. Defendant denies paragraph 3, and says that the plaintiffs left certain packing cases of no value on his premises without his consent, that plaintiffs wrongfully and unlawfully refused to remove them, although called upon by the defendant so to do, and the defendant thereupon removed the same as he was entitled to do. The defendant has not got the same, nor has he made use of them.

4. Defendant says that during the years 1900, 1901, and 1902 the plaintiffs were his tenants of certain space or room in his cold storage premises, and that the plaintiffs had the sole control and key thereof, it was the duty of the plaintiffs while such tenants to keep such room properly closed and clean, and to store and pack the fish placed therein by them in a proper and cleanly manner.

5 The defendant denies all the allegations in paragraph 5, and says that the plaintiffs neglecting their duty in that behalf did not keep the door of the room properly closed, but frequently and negligently left the same open, thereby interfering with the temperature, did not lay out their fish in a proper and cleanly manner, but negligently threw the fish down in heaps, thereby preventing the percolation of air, and the plaintiffs negligently allowed old bags to be about and rot in the said room, thereby causing a certain amount of heat to be generated.

6. The defendant had no knowledge of the allegations in paragraph 6 of the declaration, while the plaintiffs were his tenants, and denies that the fish turned bad through any fault or default of his or of his servants, and say that on or about the 23rd of June, 1901, he gave the plaintiffs legal notice to quit, and give up possession of the said room by the end of July, 1901, but the plaintiffs, notwithstanding, continued to remain in occupation of the same. If the plaintiffs were compelled to destroy fish stored in the said room, it was owing to their own negligent conduct as aforesaid; no claim therefore was made by the plaintiffs or any notice thereof given until August, 1902.

7. The defendant denies the allegations in paragraph 7.

8. The defendant further says that it was a condition of the occupation by the plaintiffs of the said space or room, and the storage of fish by them therein that the defendant was not to be held responsible either for damage or loss by fire or otherwise to goods stored therein.

Wherefore he prays that the plaintiffs's claim may be dismissed with costs.

For a claim in reconvention the defendant says:

1 He begs to refer this Honourable Court to paragraphs 4, 5, and 6 of his plea in convention.

2. The said room was lined with successive layers of wood packed with material termed insulation.

3. It was the duty of the plaintiffs to give up possession of the said room in the same good order and condition that they received same, but the plaintiffs in breach of their duty and by reason of their negligent conduct aforesaid so used the said room that when they gave up possession the said woodwork and insulation were rendered useless, and the defendant in order to use the said room was compelled to restore the said woodwork and insulation. The cost thereof was £100, and while it was being restored the defendant was unable to use the said room or let it, and thereby further suffered damage to the extent of £500 for both of which sums the plaintiffs are indebted to the defendant.

Wherefore the defendant claims:

(a) The sums of £100 and £500 as aforesaid; (b) alternate relief; (c) costs of suit.

For a replication the plaintiff says that save in so far as the plea admits the allegations in the declaration he joins issue thereon, and again prays for judgment, with costs.

And for a plea in reconvention he says:

1. He craves leave to refer to the allegations in the decalaration and replication in convention.

2. He admits the allegations in paragraph 2 of the claim in reconvention.

3. He denies each and every the allegations in paragraph 3 of the claim in reconvention, and specially says that if the woodwork and insulation were rendered useless (which he does not admit), it was not due to any fault or neglect on his part, and he is not liable therefor.

Wherefore he prays that the claim may be dismissed with costs.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for plaintiff. Mr. Benjamin for defendant.

C. C. K. Ericksen, managing director of the plaintiff company, was called, and gave evidence in support of the allegations contained in the declaration. He stated that the water came into the chamber from the room above, and lay in liquid state in the chamber used by the company. There were thermometers in the storage, and witness had noticed the temperature at 25 degrees (the lowest), and the highest at 75, which represented three degrees of heat. The temperature was not there to freeze the water lying about. It was almost impossible to get the proper temperature when liquid water was there, as water was a heat conductor. It was practicable to do so by using heavy machinery, but if this were done, it would not pay. Witness had frequently seen the machinery standing still; during portions of the time he was in occupation. This happened once through want of coal. This occurred on several occasions during a certain week. Another cause of stoppage was the breaking down of the feeding pump. This was some time during Easter, 1901. The company claimed £2,970 4s. 4d. Witness was examined in regard to the correspondence. The first letter was dated the 21st June 1900, and was written by witness's partner, Mr. E. Wadner. This was before the concern was floated into a limited liability company. In this letter, defendant was asked the terms upon which he could supply accommodation for cold storage of fish. Defendant replied on the 11th July giving the following terms: For 1,000, £12 10s. a month; 2,000, £20. 3,000, £25. The letter stated: "Should you require fish frozen, then I am prepared to let you have the whole of one room, if empty, until the fish can be packed together, without making any extra charge." Witness understood the letter referred to his wanting to put fresh fish frozen in the room. Witness saw Mr. Kamp personally before he went into occupation. The agreement was to put in frozen fish. The question of rent had been settled by arbitration. It was never agreed that it was to be a condition of occupation and storage of fish that defendant was not to be held liable either for damage or loss by fire, or otherwise, to goods stored there. Defendant wrote in November, 1900, to say that the present system of storage of fish and the manner in which fish was stored was unsatisfactory. He (defendant) considered that fish in the first instance should be put in proper state, or frozen in small quantities before stacked. The letter concluded: "You must not be surprised if in the course of a few days some tons of fish may have to be thrown away." Continuing, witness said that the fish were frozen before being stored; they only required to be kept frozen. In January, 1901, witness wrote to defendant, drawing attention to the state of the chamber, and stating that the temperature had repeatedly been considerably above freezing point, and that large quantities of water were covering the floor. In February witness wrote a similar complaint. On the 8th March Kamp wrote, stating that he could not understand why the temperature of the room should be lower than it originally was. During the time witness was in possession, he occupied one chamber. Witness had used another chamber in order to remove the fish to have the water baled out and the chamber generally cleaned. The fish were in the second chamber for only a couple of days. The fish were all right there.

By Sir Henry Juta: Witness could have gone out at month's notice. Notwithstanding that in November things were unsatisfactory, witness remained for two years. On the 3rd September, 1900, Kamp wrote to say that under the then circumstances of storing his (defendant's) room would be spoiled; while his (plaintiff's) fish could not possibly keep under the circumstances. After this a quantity of fish, of the value of over £500, was spoiled. Until August, 1902, witness did not say anything about claiming for damages. On the 26th June, 1901, Kamp wrote to witness asking for immediate payment of the account due to him for storage, and stating that he must ask them to leave on the following Monday if the account was not paid on Saturday. At that time, according to the present claim, witness had sustained damage to the extent of about £2,300. Witness left in March, 1902. In August the arbitrators met, and ordered witness to pay rent and costs. Witness did not put unfrozen fish in the chamber. Fish were taken from the chamber, and hawked round in a cart for sale, and the portion unsold was returned to the chamber at night and taken out again next morning. At first Kamp burned the bad fish in the furnace for witness, but afterwards the bad fish increased too greatly to allow of this being done. Through an oversight on one occasion, bags, which had contained fish, were allowed to remain in the chamber. Fish, with water running off them, had not been placed in the chamber. Witness did not know that in April, 1901, a third feeding pump was installed. Witness did not keep the air-lock closed. The air-lock chamber was used by Kamp.

By Mr. Benjamin: The question submitted to arbitration was that of the rent of a chamber for cold storage. Witness had frequently complained by letter of the condition of the chamber. When Kamp wrote saying that he could repair the leakage through which the water came, if he had control of the chamber, witness replied that Kamp had free access to the room daily, and that he could therefore have control of the room so as to do away with this nuisance. The air-lock had all along been used by Kamp as an ice-room. The unsold fish, when returned, was put in a position of its own, and specially dealt with. As soon as it was found that that particular fish was not quite sound it was destroyed.

Francis H. Tallent, chief engineer in charge of the Imperial Cold Storage at Woodstock, said he had previously been third engineer of the Bullard liner Johannesburg, and had had charge of the cold storage chambers. Witness had been to Kamp's. Mr. Kamp called him in to see the machinery in 1901, in about June. He was informed that there were slight difficulties. Witness saw the machinery, which had stopped. The driver told witness the pump would not work. Witness found the pump was completely out of order, and would not supply the boiler. Witness did not see other pumps. Witness put the pump in order as far as he was able, and saw the machinery started. About a hour and a half later the machinery was again stopped, the pump being smashed. Witness did not think it was looked after as it ought to have been. Witness recommended that a new pump be purchased. If water got to the insulation, the damage could not be repaired without taking up the insulation. The air-lock was a convenience for the temporary placing of goods. Witness did not see how bags in a room could affect the temperature. In witness's opinion fish could not be kept in too low a temperature. At any rate, the temperature should not exceed 20. Rotting bags or fish could not affect the insulation. If a wet bag were left in the chamber at 20 degrees, it ought to freeze.

Edward Erickson, a former foreman in the plaintiffs' employ, said the plaintiffs' fish were hard frozen when taken to the chamber at Kamp's. There used to be much water in the chamber, and the men had had to use buckets to bale it out. Witness had seen Mr. Kamp looking at the place frequently, and had heard him say he would have the defect attended to. Witness had seen the thermometer at 32, 33 and 34.

By Sir Hy. Juta: In the first fortnight Kamp complained about the packing of the fish. It was not until November that plaintiff had reason to complain.

John Garcia, formerly employed by Mr. Kamp as engine-driver, stated that the engine had stopped many times while he was there in 1901. He had seen ice kept in the air-lock by Mr. Kamp.

G. Berghstead gave similar evidence. The inner door was always kept closed; the door of the air-lock was usually open.

Oscar Alyhr, sale agent for the plaintiff, was also called, and gave evidence to the same effect.

Frederick E. Greenstreet, engineer, said that in October, 1900, Mr. Ericksen asked him to inspect the chamber he had rented from Mr. Kamp. Witness saw the room. The temperature was very high. Witness believed the door was open for him to go in. Witness believed the temperature was above freezing point. There was water in the room. In case of fish storage, the temperature should never be allowed to go over 20 degrees.

By Sir Henry Juta: Fish which was rotting would not affect the insulator, but would affect the boards.

James Henry Robinson, secretary to the plaintiff company, produced the company's books, showing a record of the fish destroyed.

Philip Essler, assistant to Erickson, the foreman was also called for the plaintiffs. In cross-examination, he said that frozen fish was sometimes taken out in the morning for sale, and was returned bad.

This concluded the evidence for the plaintiff.

Elias Mahl, in the employ of the Imperial Cold Storage Works, said that he occupied the room in question for some time, and found the room in good order. The machinery was quite capable of doing the work, and since then Mr. Kamp had added four more rooms. When the Pieter Faure made a haul the fish was always placed on the rack. The principle was that the air must circulate round each fish. Fish arriving in bags should be taken out at once. Tainted fish in a cold chamber would affect the good fish. Fish which the customers refused in the summer months would do a great deal of harm if returned to the cold storage room. As long as the temperature was below freezing point it would be good enough for the fish. Receiving gangs dealt with the fish, and the men only remained half an hour in the cold storage room. It would require eight or ten men to deal with 250 bags of fish at Kamp's.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He could not say hether the wagons drove up to the door of Kamp. The machinery was generally worked during the night, and the average temperature at his place was between 20 and 22 degrees. If anything went wrong with the machinery the temperature might be maintained for a day if the doors were immediately closed, and the fact of water lying about would prove that the temperature was not at a proper stage.

Albert Frederick Cooper said that in October, 1901, he started as a fitter at Ericksen's works at Kamp's place. It was part of his duty to carry fish into the chamber. Up till February, 1902, only two men had carried in the fish. The fish sometimes arrived hard and sometimes soft. He had known the fish to arrive in such a condition that he wouldn't eat it, but he would not say it was bad, as some people might have a different taste from him. When the fish arrived it was not placed on the racks, but was dumped down on the floor. The fish would lie in a heap all night, and it would take them from one to three days to sort it out. While he was carrying in the bags all the doors were open, and he could not possibly keep opening and closing the doors with a bag on his back. Witness himself had dealt with a consignment of fresh fish. When the bad fish was returned by the carts he placed it in the same chamber as the frozen fish. Ericksen tried to get the sanitary people to remove the fish, but did not succeed. The engine stopped towards the end of 1901, and witness had to complain of the temperature. He left the place because he was asked to bury bad fish.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He was not dismissed by Mr. Ericksen for drunkenness. All the bad fish was allowed to remain in the chamber, and went on accumulating, and when witness left there would have been five or six tons of bad fish.

Thomas Henry Jones said that in November, 1901, he was in Mr. Ericksen's service at Kamp's Cold Storage. He had fishery experience in Alaska and British Columbia. Witness and Cooper carried in the fish, and at times the number of carriers would be increased. Sometimes the fish would be very hard, but at others very soft, and the bags would be very wet. The bags would be dumped down overnight, and it would take them one to three days to sort it on the racks. When Kamp's stopped the burning, the fish was put in the cold chamber, and Ericksen knew of this. The bags were charred from the generation of heat inside.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He would swear that he did not go to Mr. Robinson and offer himself as a witness.

John Wm. Fraser, a carpenter, stated that he had about six years' experience of cold storage insulation. He was engaged for some time in Kamp's Cold Storage, and gave a description of the insulating material in the Ericksen chamber. The boards of the chamber were very much decayed through bad fish.

Levinson Jenkinson said that he was in the employment of the Corporate Fisheries. When he was in Kamps, he saw fish brought in in a soft condition, and on one occasion it was very soft. Ice was stored in the air-lock room, winter and summer. He found the temperature 27, 28, and 30 degrees. He had had one complaint about the temperature of the chamber, and he told them that he would look into the matter. Fish was improperly stocked in the chamber. It would be incorrect to say that the doors of the chamber were constantly left open. Mr. Kamp gave instructions regarding the door being kept shut.

Antonio Latto, a fitter, said he was engaged to repair Kamp's refrigerating machinery. The breakdown mentioned by the plaintiff would not affect the temperature.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He was a certified fitter, and had several testimonials, but it was true that a Mr. Taunton had been called in to fix the pump.

George Groatwold, an engine-driver, said that he had control of the engine at Kamp's, when there were only four rooms. At present there were nine rooms, and the same plant was being used as on the former occasion. He had noticed bad fish there which remained for several days. Witness had to stop the burning of the fish, as it affected the boilers.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: He complained to both Mr. Ericksen and Mr. Kamp that the air-lock was open. He never remembered seeing the temperature at 32 degrees.

The witness Fraser, recalled, stated that the joints of the air-lock were properly soldered.

Henry Kamp, proprietor of the Cold Storage at Woodstock, said that he was the first to start in Port Elizabeth and Johannesburg, and was the first to start cold storage successfully in Cape Town. He had an ice-making machine working summer and winter. Water would spoil fish in either summer or winter, but witness never allowed any water to enter the chamber from the air-lock. The soldering had never been touched since the plaintiff left. The machinery was absolutely newly imported from England. It was to his interest to keep the door of the ice chamber locked. With the exception of a few ice cream vendors from Woodstock, the ice was generally sent out to the suburbs in large quantities. He had drawn Mr. Ericksen's attention to the bags of fish lying about for days. When the men brought the fish in both doors were usually left open, and in the summer months, during a south-easter, the snow would immediately commence thawing on the pipes. He pointed out to Mr. Ericksen that the insulation was becoming spoilt through the moisture from the bags. He had seen bad fish brought back and placed in the store. That would naturally affect the good fish. Some of the fish was buried in his garden, and it was in a frightful condition.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: About May last year he stored meat at Mr. Ericksen's place at Prestwich-street, and it went bad in the cold storage. It was true that he had a considerable number of customers, but they mostly came in the morning.

By Maasdorp, J.: He didn't object to the fish being a trifle soft on arriving from the Docks, as the machinery would be able to put it right.

This closed the evidence for the defence, and after counsel had addressed the jury, Maasdorp, J., in summing up, said that there was really no point of law in the case. Counsel had pretty well agreed as to the liabilities of the parties under the contract, and, consequently, there was no abstruse point of law which he was called upon to elucidate. If they found that the defendant had caused the loss, the plaintiff could only claim up to the time he discovered that the place was in an unfit condition, and after that he himself must be responsible for the loss. Regarding the delay in proceeding with the case, his lordship said the jury would have to consider whether under the circumstances each party did not think he was himself somewhat to blame in the matter. The defendant had admitted a claim for £108, and the jury must in any case find for that amount.

The jury retired at ten minutes to five, and returned at a quarter past five with a verdict for the plaintiffs on the claim for £108 7s. 9d., with costs up to date of plea, and for the defendants in reconvention. No further order was made as to costs in the case.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

GREENING v. MOSS. { 1903. May 29th.

Mr. Rowson, on behalf of the plaintiff, asked that this case should be postponed, inasmuch as he had not been sufficiently instructed.

Mr. Alexander said he was engaged for the defendant, along with Sir Henry Juta, and he opposed any postponement.

[De Villiers, C. J., pointed out that it would be extremely difficult to put the case on a later date, and said that the case would be called later in the morning, and if the plaintiff were not present, then the Court would grant absolution from the instance.]

When the case was called later in the day the plaintiff appeared, and said he was sorry to have to ask for an adjournment, for the reasons set forth in his affidavit. The plaintiff read his affidavit, which was to the effect that he was an attorney of this court, and that he instructed the attorney whose name appeared on the record to take this action to trial. About three weeks ago he instructed his attorney to give the necessary notices to inspect documents and to confer with witnesses, etc. Since then his attorney had suffered from indisposition, which had prevented him giving attention to the matter, and he had referred deponent to his clerk, who had also been unwell. A few days ago he discovered that nothing had been done. He himself had made every effort to serve subpœnas, but it had been of no avail. It would take deponent a few days to put matters right, and he asked the Court to allow the case to stand over until later in the list.

William Gordon Coulton, the attorney referred to, then stepped forward, and said that he denied in toto the statements made by the plaintiff in his affidavit.

[De Villiers, C. J., said that plaintiff had made some serious charges against another attorney, and that attorney now came forward and said that he denied the charges which had been made. He did not see how the Court could accept the affidavit without some notice having been given to the other attorney as to these statements.]

Plaintiff: I have let him know verbally from time to time.

Mr. Alexander, for the defendant, said that he objected most strongly to a postponement. He would like to point out to the Court that the plaintiff was at present insolvent. He had surrendered his estate, and a second meeting of creditors had been held. The only result of a postponement would be that his client would be mulcted in a large amount of costs, because it would be hopeless to get any costs out of the applicant.

[De Villiers, C. J., (to the plaintiff): The Court cannot postpone the case now, and will proceed to hear it.]

Plaintiff: I am sorry to say I cannot proceed.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Then there must be absolution. Cannot you give evidence yourself? Why are your witnesses not here?]

Plaintiff: Because they have not been subpœnaed. My chief witness will not come without subpœna.

Mr. Alexander: He alleges slander, but it is not slander at all. He has been put on the black list, because he has not paid his fees.

Mr. Coulton was called, and, in answer to the affidavit of the plaintiff, he said the arrangement between them was that he should have so much money in order to bring the case into Court. The plaintiff had not supplied him with money.

De Villiers, C. J., after hearing further statements, said: The case is set down for to-day, and the plaintiff is not prepared to go on with it. He produces no evidence in support of his case, and therefore there must be absolution from the instance with costs.

GRUNBERG V. GARDINER AND EASTON.

This was an application on notice of motion, calling on the liquidator in the defendants' estate to show cause why an interdict should not be granted restraining him from parting with any assets of the firm of Gardiner and Easton, or of the joint venture with one Calgo, pending an action to be brought in this Court. The case, it appeared, arose out of the lease of a certain farm on Mowbray Flats, entered into between the plaintiff and the firm of Gardiner and Easton. Mr. Gardiner appeared for the applicant, and the respondent was represented by Mr. Close.

Affidavits having been read on both sides,

Mr. Gardiner said that there was no denial that the lease was entered into by Gardiner and Easton for twelve months, a large portion of which period was still to run.

Mr. Close contended that the applicant had no right to take this special class of remedy, an interdict.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Is Mr. Syfret willing to give an undertaking that he will retain the proceeds of any of the cattle that he sells pending a further order of Court?]

Mr. Close: I suppose he would be, but I am not specially instructed. He says in his affidavit that he places himself entirely in the hands of the Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Such a course ought to satisfy the applicant.]

Mr. Gardiner said that there was still to accrue under the contract an amount of £400 for rent. The rent of the farm was at the rate of £60 a month.

De Villiers, C. J.: There will be no order, on condition that Mr. Syfret gives his undertaking that he will retain a sufficient amount of the proceeds to meet the claim of the plaintiff, the question of costs to be reserved for argument.

WATSON V. VON DURING.

Mr. Rowson, as a matter of urgency, applied to the Court to fix a day for the hearing of this trial, as the plaintiff wished to proceed to Europe as early as possible.

Mr. Gardiner, for the defendant, said he thought it was only fair that he should explain that the case was previously postponed on account of his temporary absence when the Court was sitting in two divisions.

It was directed that the case should be set down for the 10th June.

THOMAS V. THOMAS.

This was an action for divorce and division of the property of the marriage, brought upon edictal citation. Mr. Upington appeared for the plaintiff. defendant was in default.

The plaintiff, Thomas Rowland Thomas, said he was living at East London. He was married to defendant, Mabel Jane Thomas (born Price) at Bloemfontein in August, 1898, in community of property. For three or four months they lived fairly happily together, and then one day his wife asked to go to Queen's Town, where she had some relatives. She went away that day He next heard from her from Springfontein, whence she wrote a letter saying that she had no intention of returning He had written to her very frequently, asking her to return to him. Just before the war broke out he came to Cape Town and took a position. He went to Wales in 1901, and remained there until December last year. He then returned to South Africa and proceeded to Queen's Town to make inquiries as to his wife. He afterwards proceeded to East London and inspected the passenger list of the steamship Scot. In consequence of that and other information he received he instituted proceedings for divorce. After his wife had left him for some time he sent notes to the amount of £10 to £15 per month to her, care of Price Brothers. Queen's Town. He also sent to her through J. G. Fraser, £750, her half share of the sale of a house, which was bought with her money, for £800, and which he sold for £1,500. He had applied for an interdict against the Standard Bank to restrain them from parting with moneys standing in his wife's name.

Mr. Upington said that an affidavit had been filed by Mr. Price, denying that petitioner had sent any money through him to the respondent.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Witness had not seen his wife since October or November, 1898. He identified the photos produced.

Mr. Upington said that a letter had been received from respondent admitting that she had received the intendit and the citation, and that she had travelled as Mrs. Ballaster and in another name.

Evidence taken on commission was also read, showing that respondent had voyaged home in the Scot in January of this year with a man named Ballaster, and that she had represented herself as Mrs. Ballaster.

The Court granted a decree of divorce, with costs, and an order for a division of the property in community, Mr. Syfret being appointed receiver.

ROSENSTEIN V. ROSENSTEIN.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers, for the plaintiff, said that this was a proceeding for divorce by edictal citation. The Court had ordered that the papers be served in Brazil, but the papers had not yet been returned, and counsel asked that the case should stand over sine die.

The Court acquiesced.

KOENIG V. LANDESHUT.

This was an action in regard to a partnership account, Mr. Searle, K.C., being for the plaintiff, and Mr. Upington for the defendant.

Mr. Searle applied for a postponement on account of the illness of Koenig, who was certified by his medical attendant, Dr. Griffiths, to be totally unfit to attend Court.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Is not this a case of an account simply?]

Mr. Searle said that there had been an award of arbitrators, which had been made, a rule of the Court, and the only question now was what was a reasonable amount for the defendant to pay to the plaintiff in respect of the plays.

Mr. Upington mentioned that he had in attendance a witness from Natal Mr. Harry Hall, whose connection with a theatrical enterprise necessitated his return as early as possible, and the defendant, Mrs. Landeman, was also anxious to proceed to the Transvaal.

De Villiers, C.J., stated that the case would be postponed, and the question of costs reserved. He added, in reply to counsel, that he did not see how the case could possibly come on this term.

KINNEAR v. HUXHAM. { 1903. May 29th.

Sale—Breach of contract—Damages—Quanti minoris.

The plaintiff, who lived at K. in the Transvaal, ordered from the defendant, a manufacturer in the Cape Colony, three wagons of different qualities at different prices and paid the full price. The defendant sent the wagons by railway to K. and on their arrival the plaintiff accepted two of them, but although he took charge of the third he refused to accept it on the ground that it did not answer to the description ordered.

Held, that although under ordinary circumstances the plaintiff would be entitled to claim a wagon such as that ordered, or on refusal might retain the wagon and claim back the purchase price as well as damages, yet that, under the special circumstances, as the defendant refused to deliver a wagon such as that ordered, as the plaintiff did not by his declaration tender the wagon delivered, and as the expense of returning the wagon to the Colony would be very great, the proper course was to let the plaintiff retain the wagon and recover damages—the measure of damages being the difference in the market values at K. between a wagon of the description contracted for and a wagon of the description actually delivered.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff, who resides at Krugersdorp, Transvaal, against the defendant, who resides at Claremont, Cape Division, for delivery of a certain wagon, according to agreement.

The declaration set out that while plaintiff was residing at Claremont the defendant agreed to make and deliver to him certain delivery wagons. One of the wagons delivered was not in accordance with the specification agreed upon. Plaintiff had paid £40 upon it. The same wagon, with two others, was forwarded to Krugersdorp, Transvaal, and after it had been unloaded he discovered that the said wagon was of 1⅞ in. axle instead of 2¼ in. and of 10 ft. length instead of 10 ft. 6 in. The defendant wrongfully refused to supply a wagon of the specified dimensions. Plaintiff prayed for delivery of the wagon, according to the said agreement, or, in the alternative, return of the sum of £40, with £6 1s. 9d., one-third of the sum paid by the plaintiff for railway carriage, £3 15s. paid by the plaintiff for import duty, and unloading the said wagon, and costs of suit.

The defendant, in his plea, said that in November last he agreed to make and deliver to the plaintiff six delivery wagons, according to instructions. About the 4th December plaintiff requested defendant to accept the purchase price partly in cash and partly in promissory notes. Plaintiff selected three wagons from some standing in the defendant's premises. Defendant denied all knowledge of the allegations as to the sums said to have been expended by the plaintiff on the wagon. He admitted receiving a demand from the plaintiff for another wagon, but said he did not understand its tenor.

The replication of plaintiff said that the demand was made in accordance with the agreement of the 1st November, 1902, and that the agreement was subsequently cancelled in regard to three of the wagons, but that it continued as to the other three.

[Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers for plaintiff; Mr. Gardiner (with him Mr. Bisset) for defendant.]

The plaintiff, George Alexander Kinnear, said he was now a carriage builder, at Krugersdorp, Transvaal, and that he formerly lived in the Cape Peninsula, between November, 1900, and December, 1902. While at Claremont, in November, 1902, he placed an order with the defendant for six trolley wagons, four of which were to have 2¼ in. axles and 10 ft. 6 in. bodies, and the other two 2 in. axles and 9 ft. 6 in. bodies. He signed the order in the defendant's order-book. On the 3rd November he confirmed the order by letter, agreeing to pay £40 for each of the four larger wagons and £36 10s. for each of the two smaller ones, the wagons to be delivered by the 20th November. It was arranged that he should pay £133 in cash and a bill at 30 days for the balance of £100. This arrangement was entered into prior to his giving the order. By the 20th November the wagons had not been completed, but he did not mind, as there was a scarcity of trucks at the time. He saw the wagons in the latter part of November. On the 3rd December last year he met the defendant, who told him that three of the wagons had been trucked for him that morning. Defendant was to send two 2¼ in. and one 2 in. wagon. Witness went in to pay the defendant, but the latter was busy with a lady and gentleman. He subsequently paid defendant £133 in cash and a promissory note dated December 3, payable at thirty days for £100. He demanded a receipt for the payment for six trolleys, which, however, was refused. After a long argument, the defendant still refused, and witness demanded back the money and note, which were returned to him. Witness destroyed the note. On the next day —December 4—the defendant spoke about the money, and witness then paid the man's brother £130. The brother usually received the money from the defendant, but he paid in the defendant's presence. Witness was given a receipt for £130 "on account, being part payment for six trolleys." A day or two later he paid defendant £3 and a promissory note for £100. Witness saw the second batch of wagons still standing. Defendant demanded a surety on the back of the bill. This witness refused to give this in principle. They had a further interview on or about the 13th of December, when they came to terms. The defendant, it was arranged, should make a refund from the £133 upon the three wagons actually sent—two at £40 and one at £36 10s. Witness cancelled the order for the three other wagons, and defendant returned to him £16 10s. by cheque and his promissory note. Witness went to Krugersdorp on the 16th November. When witness unloaded the wagon, the railway clerk and eight or ten boys were with him. Witness found two of the wagons to agree with his specifications. He measured the wagon in the presence of witnesses. One of the wagons, marked "H," had a 1¾-inch axle. Witness paid £3 duty on that wagon. He paid £18 5s. 5d. railage on the three wagons. Witness put the matter in the hands of his attorney, who sent a letter of demand (produced). In this letter it was pointed out that the wagon was of wrong size and dimensions, was painted brown, instead of green, and was marked "H" insted of "K," which was the letter appearing on the other two. Witness paid the boys 24s. or 26s. for unloading the wagon. There was a difference of about 3,000 pounds between the carrying capacity of a 1¾-inch axle and a 2¼ inch. Witness would not have bought a wagon with a 1¾-inch axle; it would have been absolutely unsaleable. If he had wanted such a wagon, he would not have paid more than £32 for it.

By Mr. Gardiner: The wagon was consigned to a certain Kruntling, witness's friend, to whom he directed defendant to send them. The wagons had not been sold to Kruntling. Witness did not pick out these particular wagons in the yard. He did not superintend the loading up of the wagons on the trucks. He saw the wagons after they had been trucked. Witness saw a brown wagon at defendant's weeks before witness's carts were finished. When the first lot were sent away, witness saw four green wagons left. He saw a boy taking one of these away, and witness, believing it was his, stopped the boy. He was, however, told not to interfere.

A. B. Burchman, carriage builder, said the difference in the carying capacity of a 1¾-inch axle wagon and 2¼-inch axle wagon was about 3,000 pounds.

John Wilson, railway checker at Claremont, produced consignment notes of wagons sent to Heidelberg and Krugersdorp on the 3rd December, 1902.

Mr. De Villiers said this would, perhaps, explain why plaintiff got the cart marked "H," which should have been consigned to the parties at Heidelberg. "K," he suggested, stood for Krugersdorp.

Kotze, J.: Do you say the railway people made a mistake?

Mr. De Villiers: No, we do not say there was any mistake by the railway.

Witness said the marks "K" and "H" were placed on the carts by the consignors.

Mr. De Villiers read certain evidence taken on commission in support of the plaintiff's claim, and closed his case.

Mr. Gardiner called

Charles Huxham, the defendant, who said he used to see Kinnear often when the latter was living at Claremont. Witness remembered the order being given, and confirmed by letter. Nothing was said about a promissory note. Witness expected cash. Afterwards Kinnear asked witness to take a promissory note for three. Witness said he would take the note if Kinnear could get a guarantor He came to witness later, saying he could not get a guarantor, and witness told him it was all right, as he had customers for the wagons. Kinnear then said he would take three wagons, and witness told him to select them. This was on the day the wagons were trucked. Kinnear saw all the wagons in the yard, and picked three. He asked witness to assist in the trucking, and witness agreed. Kinnear went to the station with the wagons and saw to the trucking of them. Witness got the consignment note made out. Kinnear picked out two green wagons and a brown one. These were the three which were sent off. The two large wagons were sold at £40 each, and the other at £36 10s. Witness told Kinnear the prices of all the wagons in the yard. Witness considered that a 1¾ inch axle could be replaced by a 2¼ at a cost of about £4 or £5.

By Mr. De Villiers: The sale was cancelled about six or eight days before the cheque was given.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Did the cancellation take place before or after he selected the three wagons?]

Witness: He cancelled the order for the six wagons, and then he selected three.

By Mr. De Villiers: The originally stipulated contract price for a 2 inch axle wagon was £36 10s. Defendant picked out a wagon of this axle measurement, and agreed to give him £40. Witness took no measurements himself.

By Mr. Gardiner: Although plaintiff cancelled the original order, he left a balance with witness, intending to try further to get security for the promissory note.

The witness John Wilson (recalled) said he could not remember whether plaintiff came to the station with the wagons. They were brought by Huxham's men.

James Penfold, blacksmith at defendant's wagon works, said he saw plaintiff with defendant in the yard, picking out wagons. Witness could not say which he picked. He looked over all the wagons, not the green ones only. Two green wagons and one brown wagon were sent to the station. Kinnear went to the railway station.

Cross-examined: Witness did not hear Kinnear speaking when he was looking at the wagons.

William Grill, one of the defendant's employees, deposed that Kinnear was at the station when the wagons were sent off. Witness did not know the date.

Edward Beamister, wagon builder, said it would cost about £3 or £4 to replace a 1¾ inch axle with a 2¼ inch axle.

Cross-examined: In order to strengthen the carrying capacity, the springs would have to be altered.

Mr. De Villiers said that he would be able to call witnesses to prove that plaintiff the 3rd December, and therefore could not have been at the station when the wagons were sent for.

Mr. De Villiers called

Louis Henri de Beers, articled clerk in the employ of Van der Byl and Van der Horst, who said he saw plaintiff in the office on the 3rd December last. Mr. Kinnear was in the regular employ of the firm as a bookkeeper at the time. He fixed the date by a dispute they had in regard to a penholder.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: In cases where there is a conflict of evidence, it is always a safe principle for the Court to be mainly guided by documentary evidence which is admittedly authentic. The order book and the plaintiff's letter book show that he ordered wagons with 2¼ and 2 inch axles, and not with 1¾ axles. One of the three wagons forwarded to Krugersdorp had 1¾ axles, and the plaintiff was not bound to accept an article which he had never ordered. He has claimed from the defendant delivery of a wagon of the description purchased by him, or, in the alternative, the return of the purchase price, and damages for non delivery; and the defendant has refused to comply with either demand. It would no doubt be competent for the Court to make an order of specific performance, but the more usual course is to award damages for breach of contract, and the question to be determined in the present case is what should be the measure of damages. The plaintiff did not inspect the wagons before they were forwarded from Claremont to Krugersdorp, and it was the defendant's own act to despatch the wagons by train to their destination. The damages to be awarded should therefore be such damages as were sustained by reason of the delivery of a defective article at Krugersdorp. If this were treated as an action quanti minoris, the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover so much of the price as represented the difference between the value of a wagon as bought, and the value of a wagon as actually delivered (ut restituatur ex pretio quanti minoris valet res). It was not intended in the case of Irvine v. Berg (Buch. 1879, p. 198), to confine this action to cases where the purchaser has resold at a loss. In that case the plaintiff had bought a cargo of mealies, which he resold at a considerable profit, and he claimed damages on the ground that some of the mealies were found to be unsound. The judges found, as a matter of fact, that the mealies were sound when delivered, but proceeded to discuss the question whether the plaintiff would have been entitled to damages if the mealies had been unsound. The obiter dicta on this point were not very accurately reported. There had been an acceptance by the plaintiffs of the mealies, with a knowledge of whatever defects they had, and the actio quanti minoris was clearly not applicable. I made some further remarks as to goods bought in bulk, but they were not intended to extend the doctrine laid down by Voet in his Commentaries (21. 1, 5). In the present case. the wagons were not sold in bulk at a lump sum for the lot, but at a fixed price for each wagon. The fact therefore that the plaintiff accepted and may have dealt at a profit with the two wagons would not debar him from the right of claiming a return of part of the purchase money of the third wagon. But, in strictness, the action quanti minoris is only applicable in the case of a latent defect in the article purchased and delivered. Most of the sales referred to in the Dutch books are sales of specific goods. which the purchaser has inspected, or had an opportunity of inspecting, and which after delivery are found to contain a defect which was latent at the time of sale. Considering that the Dutch were a commercial people, it seems strange that there should be such a dearth of authority in regard to sales other than those of specific chattels. The purchaser of such a specific chattel was entitled to claim delivery, and, failing delivery, to claim damages for non-delivery, but very little is said as to the rights of a purchaser who has bought, not specific articles, but goods answering to a certain description. The practice of this Court, in such a case, has been to award damages to the purchaser, on failure by the seller to deliver goods answering to the description and the measure of damages has been the difference between the price and the market value of such goods. Where, however, the goods were, to the knowledge of the seller, required by the purchaser for a special purpose, special damages have been awarded. In the present case there is no question as to special damages, but the plaintiff claims a return of the purchase price and of the charges paid by him for the conveyance of the wagon to Krugersdorp. Under ordinary circumstances the plaintiff would have been entitled to succeed in his claim, in addition to obtaining damages, but only on delivery by him of the wagon in his possession, and the declaration does not tender such delivery. The expense, moreover, of returning the wagon by railway would be great, and, under these special circumstances, a fair measure of damages would be the market price of a wagon of the description contracted for, and the market price of a wagon such as that actually delivered. There is clear evidence that the market value of the former at the date of delivery was £65, and that the latter could have been resold for £50. Judgment will therefore be given for the plaintiff for £15, with costs, he retaining the wagon.

FEHRSEN V. FEHRSEN.

Mr. Close drew the attention of the Court to this matter, which was standing over, and said that his client, the defendant, who had come down from Somerset East, had been in Cape Town since Saturday last. He was a doctor, and was urgently required up-country, and counsel asked the Court if an early day could be appointed for the trial.

Mr. Buchanan said that the plaintiff also was wishful that the trial should be taken as early as possible. The action was one for judicial separation, brought by Mrs. Fehrsen against her husband, Dr. Fehrsen. The plaintiff said that she had to leave the defendant on account of his conduct, and the defendant said that his wife had deserted him.

Mr. Close said that the parties had been living apart for a couple of years.

The case was directed to be set down for trial on June 2nd.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J H. DE VILLIERS, P.C, K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

PROVISIONAL ROLL.

PHILLIPS V. POOLE. { 1903. May 30th.

Mr. Benjamin moved for provisional sentence on a promissory note for £100 17s., dated 17th February, and payable to the African Banking Corporation.

Order granted.

GARLICK AND OTHERS V. HILLIER.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers said this was an application to make final a provisional order of sequestration, but he was instructed that the parties had now come to a compromise, and he therefore asked that the provisional order be discharged.

Order granted as prayed.

WESSELS AND CO. V. RICCI.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the provisional order of sequestration granted in this case to be made final.

Order granted as prayed.

ROSE V. WOJCEICHOWZKI.

Mr. Upington moved for a decree of civil imprisonment upon an unsatisfied judgment of this Court, by which defendant had been condemned to pay costs of a certain application which he had made. Judgment was put in, return of nulla bona, and taxed bills of costs. The amount of the costs was £15 17s. 9d.

Defendant said he would be prepared to pay the money in six months, and in the meantime he made an offer of 10s. a month. He admitted having sold a promissory note in his posession in order to pay merchants.

Mr. Upington said the Court would remember that the case arose out of a building contract, in which the defendant accused the respondent of fraud.

Decree granted as prayed, to be suspended pending payment of £1 a month, the first payment to be made on the 2nd June, right being reserved to the plaintiff to apply again on proof that the defendant had means.

ROSENBLATT AND OTHERS V. JACKSON.

Mr. Russell moved for provisional sentence on a mortgage bond for £2,700 dated 24th February, 1902, with interest at 6 per cent. from the 1st January, 1903, and costs, and also asked that the property specially hypothecated be declared executable.

Mr. Searle, K.C., for the defendant, read his client's affidavit, which was to the effect that he had purchased from the plaintiffs a certain piece of ground, with the buildings thereon, for £17,000 sterling. The arrangement was that he should pay plaintiffs a deposit of £1,000, and instalments of £500 per month for three months, until the sum of £2,500 had been paid, and then they would find a mortgage bond for £14,500. This the plaintiffs failed to do, and they raised the money in four bonds instead of one. The defendant was now in negotiation for the sale of the property, and he expected to complete the sale shortly, when he would be in a position to pay the £2,000. He was willing to deposit £50 in order to obtain an extension of time until the end of June.

Mr. Russell said he was authorised to accept stay of execution, provided plaintiffs were given judgment, and the £50 were immediately paid.

Provisional sentence was granted, execution to be stayed until the 30th June, provided that the defendant forthwith deposit with the plaintiffs the sum of £50.

THERON AND CO. V. LE SUEUR.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for a decree of civil imprisonment on an unsatisfied judgment, and stated that the defendant had tendered to plaintiffs £5 a month, and plaintiffs were willing to consent to stay of execution provided that the £5 a month were paid, the first payment to be made on the 15th June.

Order granted in terms of application.

ILLIQUID ROLL.

S.A. BREWERIES, LTD. V. BLOMSON. { 1903. May 30th.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers said that this was an application, under Rule 329d, for a certain sum of money, for goods sold and delivered, but he was now instructed that the sum had been paid, and he merely asked for costs.

Order granted in terms of application.

BRODIE V. BRODIE.

Mr. Upington moved for judgment, under Rule 329d, for the amount of certain promissory notes, which plaintiff had signed as surety for the defendant, and which he was compelled to pay up, the amount being £310 9s. 11d.

Order granted as prayed.

LIBERMAN AND ANOTHER V. HOOLE AND CO.

Mr. Benjamin moved for judgment for costs in this matter, under Rule 329d, for the sum of £22 10s., in respect of which an action had been instituted for goods sold and delivered. Counsel now applied for judgment for costs.

Order granted in terms of application.

GEISSLER V. MORRIS.

Mr. Gardiner moved for judgment, under Rule 319, in default of plea. The matter arose out of the sale of certain land at Wynberg for £1,300, the conditions of sale being that £100 should be paid on the 1st April, £100 by promissory note, and the balance on or before the 31st June. The first instalment had not been paid, and counsel asked for judgment for £100, with interest a tempore morae and costs of suit.

Order granted as prayed.

PFEIFFER V. CARRE.

Mr. Upington, for the defendant, applied for removal of bar, and for leave to file his plea.

Mr. M. de Villiers, for the plaintiff, said he applied for judgment, under Rule 319, and he must strongly oppose the present application. Ample time had been given to the defendant to file his plea. The declaration was filed on the 14th May, the plea was due on the 21st, and notice calling upon him to file his plea was not given till the 26th. No notice was taken, however, and on the 28th defendant was barred. Defendant, in his affidavit, blamed his attorney for telling him that the case would not be tried until August, and thus leading him to believe that there was no urgency as to filing the plea. He also said that the transactions entered into by the plaintiff on his behalf were of a speculative and gambling nature. They were only so in the sense that all transactions in shares were of a speculative nature. The plaintiff simply acted as broker on the defendant's behalf, and on this account there appeared to be due £1,400 3s. 4d., which the defendant neglected to pay.

Mr. Upington read the defendant's affidavit, which stated that the plaintiff induced him to go into certain share transactions of a speculative and gambling nature. The plaintiff purchased stock in his (defendant's) name, and sold it in most instances at his own discretion, and without any reference to deponent. Deponent further said that the delay in filing his plea had been caused by an attack of influenza, and his attorneys also told him that the case would not be tried until August.

De Villiers, C.J., said he thought the attorney should make an affidavit in support of these statements, but

Mr. Upington informed their lordships that the attorney who had charge of the case was out of town at present.

De Villiers, C.J.: Very well, the case may be mentioned on June 2nd. In the meantime, the letters will be verified by affidavit.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

ALBRECHT v. ALBRECHT. { 1903. May 30th.

Mr. Gardiner stated that this was the return day of an order granted in this Court, calling upon the respondent to restore to plaintiff conjugal rights, and, failing compliance, to show cause why the bonds of marriage should not be dissolved, with forfeiture of benefits of community and custody of the child of the marriage. The affidavit of plaintiff stated that the defendant had not obeyed the order to restore conjugal rights.

The Court granted a decree of divorce in terms of the prayer.

NAIERMAN v. NEWMAN.

Mr. Buchanan moved for the rule nisi restraining the respondent from removing certain bricks and other articles from a farm in the district of Somerset West to be made absolute. Mr. Gardiner appeared for the respondent.

The affidavit of Louis Lyons stated that he was the agent of the plaintiff, who was at present out of the Colony, and that he held his general power of attorny. Plaintiff was the registered owner of a piece of land at Eerste River, on which there were a large quantity of bricks, certain household furniture, and farm implements. Israel Newman (plaintiff's brother-in-law) was at present living on the farm, and he had removed certain goods and intended to sell the other goods, asserting that the said Naierman was indebted to him in a certain sum of money. There were certain other people who had claims against Naierman.

The affidavit of the defendant, Israel Newman, admitted having removed certain goods and intending to remove others, but said that on the 6th April he bought for £200 all the movable property on the said farm. He annexed a receipt given to him by the plaintiff. On the 10th April he informed Lyons of this.

The replying affidavit of Lyons denied that Newman had informed him of the said purchase. Lyons further asked to be joined in the present application with the plaintiff. He said that he purchased 25,000 bricks for £60 from plaintiff, and it was agreed that the said bricks should remain on the farm. Naierman gave him a receipt. On the 20th February last he advanced £107 10s. to Naierman in consideration of which he was to deliver to Mr. A. Wilmot, to deponent's account, 50,000 well-burnt bricks. The said Newman was fully aware of the sale of the aforesaid bricks to him. Defendant had received a letter from Naierman, vesting him with his general power of attorney and adding that he had gone to England in response to a cable from Sir Samuel Montague. Naierman added: "As you know, I am not working for my own, but for the benefit of all the Jews."

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: Lyons, acting on behalf of the applicant, did not bring to the notice of the judge all the facts necessary to enable him to arrive at a correct conclusion, but I am satisfied that there was no intentional concealment on his part, for if there had been, I should certainly have been in favour of discharging the rule altogether. Lyons was not aware at the time that the respondent held a receipt from Naierman himself, by which this alleged sale took place, Lyons in his individual capacity had already purchased certain bricks from Naierman, and, according to Lyons, Newman was aware of that fact. Under all the circumstances, the Court is of opinion that the rule should be made absolute, but only in regard to the bricks, which respondent must be interdicted from removing, with leave, however, to the respondent to apply for the discharge of the interdict, the question of costs to stand over. The parties I hope will now come to terms, and if they do not come to terms it might perhaps be the best course for Lyons to have the estate sequestrated, and in that way have the rights of all the creditors determined.

MCKAY AND ANOTHER V. MCKAY. 1903. May 30th.

Partnership — Dissolution — Misconduct of partners—Direction by will to carry on business.

A testator by his will directed his shop business to be carried on after his death, and bequeathed it to the two applicants and the respondent on certain conditions, which indicated a desire on the testator's part that the business should not be discontinued without the consent of all the partners. The legatees accepted the bequest and carried on the business in partnership, but after about eighteen months the applicants became dissatisfied with the respondent's conduct in occasionally absenting himself during business hours, and they offered to purchase his share if he would retire from the firm On his refusal they applied, by motion, for a decree of dissolution and the appointment of a receiver.

Held, that in the absence of any evidence of such misconduct as would render the continuance of the partnership practically impossible, the Court should not interfere with the directions contained in the will by decreeing a dissolution against the wish of one of the partners.

This was an application on notice of motion for an order to dissolve the partnership existing between the plaintiffs, Eliza Ellen McKay and John Peter Bischoff, and the respondent, Clarence Albert McKay, carrying on business as music dealers in Church-street, Cape Town, and to appoint Mr. E. R. Syfret as liquidator. Mr. Close appeared for the respondent.

The affidavit of Eliza Ellen McKay stated that she was the widow of the late J. T. McKay. who died in March, 1901, and respondent was her son. Her husband formerly carried on business in Church-street, and under his will he directed that the aforesaid business should be disposed of as to one-half to his widow, and as to the other a quarter each to his son and Bischoff, on condition that the said business should remain under the control of his widow and Bischoff. The said Bischoff, respondent, and deponent had since the 18th March, 1901, carried on the business under the terms of the will. From the commencement of the partnership the respondent had taken no interest in the business. His attendance at the office had been most irregular. Although requested by Bischoff and deponent to take more interest in the business, he had failed to do so. Not only that, but he had been assisting in conducting concerts in opposition to those arranged by the firm. He had done various acts which had alienated custom from the firm. He continued to disregard the lawful orders of Bischoff and herself. There had been negotiations, but no terms of dissolution could be arranged. Deponent was very desirous that the partnership should be dissolved.

The affidavit of J. P. Bischoff corroborated the foregoing statements. Deponent added that respondent when spoken to had treated him in an abusive manner. Respondent had refused an offer to purchase his interest in the business.

The affidavit of applicants' attorney described the unsuccessful attempts to secure a friendly dissolution.

The affidavit of Clarence Albert McKay denied the allegations that he had not taken a proper interest in the business. He declared that his attendance had been regular, and contradicted the statement that he had acted prejudicially to the business. As to the concerts, it had not been the practice of the firm to promote concerts since his father's death until this season, when his mother had decided to organise concerts. He had agreed to take part in other concerts, but only as a performer, and that would in no way affect the business of the partnership firm. As to Bischoff, he had a dispute with Bischoff about his hours some time ago. The said Bischoff was a young man of about thirty years. He wanted to get deponent out of the business, and he replied that Bischoff would not get him out of the business as long as he lived. Deponent was twenty-one years of age. He considered the offer made to him insufficient. He desired to continue as a member of the firm, and prayed this honourable Court to adjudge that the said Bischoff be no longer a member of the firm.

The replying affidavits of the applicants repeated the charges of neglect of business on the part of the respondent.

Mr. Gardiner for applicants; Mr. Close for respondent.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

De Villiers, C.J.: The late J. T. McKay by his will directed that his shop business should be disposed of as follows: one half share to his wife, one quarter share to Bischoff, one quarter share to his son, the respondent, the whole control and business remaining with his wife and Bischoff, who are the present applicants. The will next proceeds to direct that neither Bischoff nor the son shall dispose of his share of the business to any one, "nor shall they be entitled to any amount from their co-partners in the event of their wishing to discontinue as a partner, the share held by such partner shall devolve upon my said wife." The will contains other indications of the testator's desire that the business shall not be discontinued without the consent of all the partners. It is common cause that the applicants and respondent accepted the bequest on the death of the testator in 1901, and by their acceptance became partners in the business formerly carried on by the testator. The partnership thus entered into was not one which could be terminated at the will of any of the partners. Unless, therefore, all the partners have agreed to a dissolution, or unless circumstances have arisen which render a continuance of the partnership impossible, it is not competent for two of the partners to claim a dissolution. The applicants by motion ask for a decree for a dissolution of the partnership and for the appointment of a receiver to liquidate the partnership. Before making the application they offered the respondent the sum of £1,000 to retire from the partnership and accept that amount as his share of the assets. It is clear from the evidence that their object in asking for a dissolution of the partnership is to get rid of the respondent and to carry on the business without him. I quite agree that if the respondent had been guilty of misconduct which would make the continuance of the partnership practically impossible it would be the duty of this Court to come to the assistance of the applicants, and grant the decree asked for. But what is the conduct complained of? He has occasionally absented himself from business, and on Saturdays he has gone to his lunch earlier than the applicants considered for the advantage of the business. If there are other serious acts of misconduct the applicants have failed to enumerate them. I am not prepared, therefore, on motion, to grant the order asked for, and the applicants must be refused with costs.

ORPEN V. CELLIERS.

This was an application on motion calling on respondent to show cause why a certain supplementary petition, filed on behalf of Robert George Hadley, should not be withdrawn, and why an order should not be made authorising access to the rejected ballot papers in the recent election at Prieska. Mr. Upington appeared for the plaintiff, and Mr. Burton was for the respondent.

Mr. Burton read the affidavit of Paul de Villiers, respondent's attorney, who craved a postponement, as he had not been allowed sufficient time to receive instructions from his client. Mr. Burton added that the present petition went further than the one of Robert George Hadley, and asked, not only that the respondent should be ousted from the seat, but that the seat should be awarded to the petitioner.

Mr. Upington urged that the petition should be taken on Tuesday.

De Villiers, C.J.: It will have to come on with the motions when they are heard in the ordinary course. All the motions will be heard some time next week; we will fix a date, but we cannot fix a date now.

Ex parte PRETORIUS.

This was an application for an order confirming the sale of certain property in the district of Middelburg.

The petition of Maartin J. L. Pretorius shewed:

1. That your petitioner and one Stephanus J. van der Walt signed a certain petition on or about May 4th, 1903: the former in his individual capacity, as well as in that of executor testamentary to the estate of his late wife Martha J. L. Pretorius (born van der Walt), and the latter in his capacity as executor testamentary to the estate of his late wife Maria J. van der Walt (born Pretorius) and as guardian of his minor children: and your petitioner is informed that the same has already been forwarded by post to Cape Town.

2. That since the signing of the said petition your petitioner has considered it advisable to make an amendment to Section C. of the prayer of the said petition (hereinafter called the original petition), and by way of this supplementary or additional petition to ask your Lordships also for an order whereby your petitioner may receive the balance of the purchase price referred to in Section 8 of the original petition, with the consent of the said Stephanus J. van der Walt and of all the other major children and major grandchildren interested in the said balance of purchase price under the codicil referred to in section 2 of the original petition, it not being the intention of your petitioner and of the said majors so far as your petitioner is aware, that the said balance of purchase price should be paid over to a trust company or other responsible person, either during your petitioner's lifetime or temporarily, as your petitioner and the said majors, so far as your petitioner is aware, wish to save the expense and usual commission connected with such administration, and are desirous of arranging the administration of the said balance of purchase price among themselves and your petitioner.

3. That your petitioner has already obtained the consent of some of the said majors, and anticipates no difficulty in obtaining the consent of the others as soon as he has an opportunity of communicating with them personally, as they are not all resident in the same district with your petitioner.

4. Your petitioner has respectfully to submit that the rights of the children and grandchildren interested under the aforesaid codicil vested at the death of the testatrix, the above-mentioned Martha J. L. Pretorius, so that with the consent referred to in section 2 of this petition your petitioner may receive the said balance of purchase price.

5. That your petitioner is desirous that section 8 of the original petition be taken as amended in terms of this petition and that the costs of petition be also paid out of the said purchase price.

Wherefore your petitioner prays that your Lordships may be pleased to also grant an order:

(a) Authorising your petitioner to receive the said balance of purchase price on your petitioner filing with the registrar of your honourable Court the consent of the said Stephanus J. van der Walt and of all other aforesaid majors.

(b) Authorising the costs of petition to be paid out of the said purchase price.

The usual verifying affidavit was annexed.

The Master's report was as follows:

It appears that it would be for the benefit of the minors concerned if the sale be confirmed by this Honourable Court.

The balance of the purchase price, after payment on the mortgage bond, which includes the minors' portions, should, I think be paid to one of the Trust Companies on the best terms obtainable, reserving the right to petitioner to draw the interest for life.

The minors would not be entitled to draw their money at majority, and it should not, therefore, be paid into the Guardians' Fund.

On the motion of Mr. Upington, an order was granted in terms of the Master's report.

SUSVEILA V. GARDINER AND EASTON.

Mr. Benjamin moved for a commission to take the evidence of the plaintiff, who was about to proceed to Brazil.

Application granted, Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers being appointed to act as commissioner.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.), and the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP.]

ROBERTSON v. MOSS. { 1903. June 2nd.

Partnership — Dissolution—Referee.

The defendant being the owner of a licensed victualler's business agreed with the plaintiff to admit him as a partner on payment of £1,000. The plaintiff borrowed the money with the assistance of the defendant, who became surety for the repayment of the loan. The money thus borrowed was paid to the defendant, and thereupon a bank account was opened in the name of the partners, notice of the partnership was published in the newspapers and sent to the customers, and the plaintiff took an active part for three months in the business of the firm. He failed, however, to repay the loan, and the defendant was obliged, as surety, to pay it. The defendant thereupon repudiated the existence of any partnership, and the plaintiff brought an action for the dissolution of the partnership and the appointment of a receiver to liquidate the concern.

Held, that as a partnership had in fact been created, the circumstance that the defendant had to pay the £1,000 as surety did not entitle him to repudiate the existence of co-partnership, and that the plaintiff was entitled to his share of the assets, including the goodwill, after deducting from such share the sum of £1,000, but that as the business belonged to the defendant at the time of the plaintiff's admission, the defendant should retain the business with the goodwill on payment to the plaintiff of his share.

No written agreement of the partnership had been signed, but a document was produced at the trial which had been prepared by the solicitor of the parties on their instructions for their signature. By this document the defendant purported to cede the whole business to the plaintiff, who admitted, however, that it was understood that the defendant should retain a half interest in the business.

Held, that as a partnership can be constituted without any writing, the existence of a colourable document such as that agreed upon did not prevent the creation of the partnership if the facts showed what the real nature of the transaction was.

This was an action instituted by Mr. Frederick Robertson, ex-licensed victualler, Cape Town, against Alfred Moss, proprietor of the Cafe Royal, Cape Town, for dissolution of partnership between plaintiff and defendant, and the appointment of a receiver, for £10,000, or such other sum, as the Court might adjudge to be his share of the partnership, and for costs of suit.

The declaration set out that in May, 1902, the defendant, in conjunction with one Raymond Savage, was charged with a criminal assault upon one Captain Brandon Kirby, and was committed for trial. Certain negotiations took place between defendant and plaintiff in view of the danger that the defendant's licence and lease were placed in in the event of conviction. The licence would have been cancelled had the defendant been convicted of the charge preferred against him, and sentence of imprisonment had been passed without option of fine Thereupon the defendant requested the plaintiff, who was carrying on business at the National Hotel, Caledon, to go into co-partnership with him at the Cafe Royal, to give the defendant one moiety in the Caledon interest, and requested the plaintiff to sell the Caledon business immediately, and take over the business of the said defendant, and go into partnership with him. To this plaintiff agreed. An agreement was entered into between the parties whereby the defendant agreed, in consideration of the payment of £1,000, to transfer the business to the plaintiff. A secret trust agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and defendant by which the plaintiff was to hold half-share in trust for the defendant until the result of the trial was ascertained. Thereupon the plaintiff assumed charge of the business as joint proprietor, and the partnership was advertised in various papers, and notice was given to the merchants to send their accounts to Moss and Robertson. Defendant was in due course found guilty of common assault and sentenced to imprisonment for four months, or, in the alternative, to a fine. On his return from the trial at Paarl the defendant denied that he entered into partnership with the said plaintiff, and refused to recognise his just and lawful claims.

In his plea defendant admitted the formal paragraphs, and said he was charged with the assault, but denied that he committed it. He admitted that he was convicted of common assault. He said that in order to increase his business he entered into negotiations with plaintiff, and it was agreed between them that plaintiff should pay him £1,000 in cash and £1,800 within three weeks; the plaintiff was further to pay a sum equal to defendant's outstanding liabilities, and also value of half the stock. The plaintiff borrowed a sum of £1,000 from the Van Rhyn Co., for which the defendant became surety, and for which he was to be re-paid on the sale of the National Hotel. The National Hotel was sold, and realised so much less than anticipated by the plaintiff that he was absolutely unable to carry out his said contract, and thereupon the defendant became entitled to and did cancel the said partnership. As to the draft and trust agreements, he admitted that such agreements were submitted to him, and that he refused to sign them. He said he had not signed the secret agreement, though he could not actually say whether that was the secret agreement. In regard to this trust agreement, one Robert Greening, his attorney in the defence, advised him to execute this to defend himself. Defendant acknowledged all advertising as to the partnership, but said this was before the plaintiff neglected to carry out his contract, and before the said agreement became cancelled.

The plaintiff, in replication, excepted to paragraphs 6 of the plea, but counsel did not press the exception. The replication proceeded to set forth that the defendant was convicted of this assault, and that with regard to the sum of £1,800, referred to in the plea, this sum was not to be paid within any specified time, but he said it was to be paid out of the proceeds of the partnership. In regard to the surety undertaken, as to the repayment to the Van Rhyn Co. of £1,000 borrowed from them, the defendant voluntarily agreed to take upon himself the responsibility of surety, being moved thereto by fear of losing the Cafe Royal licence, and one-half of the proceeds of the business being preserved to him.

Mr. Burton (with him Mr. Rowson) for the plaintiff; Sir H. Juta (with him Mr. Alexander) for the defendant.

The plaintiff, Wm. Frederick Robertson, said he was at present out of business. He had been laid up with illness during the past five months. He was a licensed victualler, and had carried on business in London, Australia, and Cape Town. He had known the defendant as a waiter at a restaurant and a barman at St. George's Hotel. In July last he received a wire from Moss asking him to come down to Cape Town for business concerning the Cafe Royal. He was proprietor of the National Hotel, Caledon, at that time. Moss came to see him at Caledon on or about the 8th or 9th July, and told him that he was in trouble, that he had been arrested, and let out on £2,000 bail. He had also been two days in Roeland-street Gaol. Since this trouble his business had fallen off considerably, his credit had practically been stopped, and he wanted witness to go to Cape Town and help him, and to take over the business. Witness came down to Cape Town on or about the 12th or 13th of the same month. Defendant said that he would see Mr. Hall, husband of the lady with whom Moss had an agreement to take the hotel, and ascertain if everything could be transferred to witness. Mr. Hall, however, kept putting him off, saying that he wanted to be settled up in full for what was owing to Mrs. Hall before he consented to a transfer. They tried to raise money from various merchants and the South African Brewery to the amount of about £3,700, to the best of his knowledge. The arrangement was that Moss should transfer everything to witness. When witness pointed out to Moss that he had only just taken over the National, and that it would mean his neglecting that business, Moss said: "Oh, sacrifice the place at any price, and come to Cape Town as soon as possible." Witness had only opened the hotel at Caledon on the 24th June. When he came to Cape Town he took full charge of the business. The place was in a terrible state, doing practically no business, and witness pulled up the trade from £18 a day to about an average of £75 a day. Witness was well known as a licensed victualler in Cape Town, and he had a large following. Some time after witness had come down from Caledon and taken charge of the business, Moss received a letter from Captain Kirby's solicitors threatening him with a suit for £2,000 or £4,000—he had forgotten which—as Captain Kirby's eyes had been affected. Then Moss came to the conclusion that it would be best for him to transfer everything to witness, and it was arranged that he should pay to the defendant £1 000 and discharge all liabilities. They met Mr. Greening, Mr. Moss's solicitor, and then Mr. Greening left them together to arrange things between themselves. They finally agreed that witness should pay to the defendant £1.000 under a secret trust. Witness produced copy of the final agreement, but said that it was not signed, the reason being that they were trying to raise the money to pay off Mrs. Hall to get the hotel in their own hands, so that it might be sublet. Witness borrowed the money from the Van Rhyn Company, and the defendant stood surety for repayment. Witness did not ask him to do so, but Moss wanted money at the time, as there was a bill due to Mr. Mulvihal for mineral waters. Witness agreed to pay off at the rate of £50 a month as much as might remain to be paid after the proceeds of the sale of the National Hotel had been utilised for this purpose. The National was sold, and it realised £1,300. Witness lost £2,000 in connection with the National Hotel, owing to the neglect of business through his coming down to Cape Town. Moss's trial took place on the 15th October, and the day after he came back to Cape Town, and the business went on as before. Moss did not complain about his having repaid the £1,000 to the Van Rhyn Co., but some month or so later he one day asked witness to go to Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller's office, where they saw Mr. Fuller, who spoke about the money. After that witness was laid up for about four months with an ulcerated leg. The partnership had never been denied until they went to Silberbauer, Wahl and Fuller's office. As to the business, when he was there he considered the profits worth £400 a month, but he did not consider that the defendant was even taking £400 a month at the present time. They were taking between £65 and £70 a day on an average right through the month. He did not believe the business was now taking £30 a day. When they were in partnership, they arranged with a Mr. Day to act as bookkeeper, but Mr. Day could not get access to the only room that was available for the purpose. They could only enter the room occasionally.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: The partnership was entered into on the 12th July. He was to give £2,800, to be paid out of the business he had at Caledon. He had paid £1,000, which he borrowed from Van Rhyn's, on Moss's suretyship. He denied that Van Rhyn demanded the money in December. Moss was paying off the money. He had paid to the partnership exactly what he was brought down to pay. There was a secret deed of partnership drawn up between them. There was a partnership arranged between them in September. He was to pay £1,000, and he was to take over the hotel, and all the debts and liabilities. There was £3,300 due to Mrs. Hall, and there was a supporting account of £1.000. The latter was in September. There were other liabilities. Witness thought the total would be about £5.000. He had not paid anything off the liabilities, but they would have been paid off. The firm of Moss and Robertson had met part of the liabilities. Out of his own moneys he paid what he was liable to as his share of the profits. He considered that he gave a big consideration to the business, especially if Moss had been sent to the Breakwater for two years. The licence was not transferred to him. According to the agreement with Mrs. Hall, the licence could not be transferred without her consent until all that was owing to her had been paid up. He did not know that she would not give her consent until the money had been paid. Mr. Moss told him that. He did not ask Mrs. Hall about the matter. Mr. Hall told witness that he would prefer to see him in the place rather than Mr. Moss. He made a mistake in not approaching Mrs. Hall on the subject. He could have raised the money to pay Mrs. Hall, and had a promise of it from the South African Brewery. There was a secret trust, under which they were to be partners. This was arranged between Moss and his solicitor, Mr. Greening. After the sale of the hotel, Moss never asked witness when he was going to pay. Witness had to use all his money from the sale of the Caledon Hotel to pay his debts. After he had sold the National, and had paid certain of his debts, he still owed a lot. Writs had been out against him for a considerable time. The people he left in the hotel at Caledon ran him into serious debt. Had witness not left his Caledon business to come to Cape Town, it would have become a flourishing business. He could have made a good business of it if he had remained. It was not a fact that witness had to sell the National for less than he expected, and that he therefore was not in a position to carry out the agreement with Moss.

Re-examined: The hotel at Caledon had since become a very flourishing concern. Mr. Greening was not now witness's attorney.

By the Court: Creditors were notified by Mr. Moss that witness had become a partner.

Robert Greening, attorney, said that in 1902 he acted as defendant's attorney. Witness acted for him in connection with the criminal charge, and with the agreement between plaintiff and defendants. Moss had been committed for trial, and there was the risk that he might be convicted. Witness therefore advised him to get into communication with some friend or licensed victualler with an idea of entering into a partnership, so that in the event of anything unfortunate happening, his friend or partner could keep the business going, and look after his interests. Moss agreed, and as a result, Robertson was sent for. The parties had many interviews. The first agreement come to was that Moss should have half the National, and Robertson half the Cafe Royal. This was in the beginning of July. The idea of this arrangement was that if Moss were not convicted of the charge, or was convicted of common assault, he would not like to be about Cape Town for a time, and could look after the Caledon business. Witness prepared several agreements, and then Moss began to think he was giving Robertson too good a bargain. The parties discussed matters between them without reference to witness, and they agreed to leave out the Caledon business, and that Robertson should pay £1,000 for a half-share in the Cafe Royal. It was also agreed that if anything happened to Moss, Robertson should remain in possession of the Cape Town property, and go to Moss for half the profits. Both parties were present when witness drew the agreement, which was practically dictated by the parties. Witness gave Moss all the copies of this agreement.

Sir Henry Juta: You are still the attorney for the plaintiff?

Witness: No, I am not.

Are you sure you have no interest in this case as attorney?—Absolutely none; nor in any other way.

Who is supposed to be acting as attorney for the plaintiff?—Mr. Coulton is acting.

You issued the summons?—Yes.

And a certain little black list came in the way, which prevents you going on?—There is a black list in the way.

I notice that in December, when you were writing on behalf of Mr. Robertson, Mr. Brady was also writing on his behalf?—I hear of it to-day. I was not aware of it at the time.

What do you say was the agreement of the 5th September?—The agreement was that Robertson should take over the whole hotel, pay the debts, and pay Moss £1,000.

Where was the partnership agreement?—That was another agreement.

Where is that?—I gave it to Mr. Moss. Witness added that Robertson had told him that Mrs. Hall was quite ready to take him in place of Moss, and, indeed, would prefer to do so. Moss kept on promising to sign the agreement before his trial.

Wm. George Ross said that last year he was in the employ of Messrs. H. A. Bam and Co., who did business with Mr. Moss. The latter informed witness that after the 13th September the firm of Moss and Robertson would pay accounts. On the 28th October, the cheque for supplies subsequent to the 13th September was signed by Moss and Robertson

Henry Arnold Bam, wine merchant, said that in about June or July last year, Moss asked him his opinion as to taking Robertson into partnership. Witness told him that Robertson was the very best man he could get.

Herbert Wm. Day, accountant, said he was instructed by Mr. Moss and Mr. Robertson, in September last, to open a set of books for Moss and Robertson. Witness understood that after the 13th September all debts would be paid by Moss and Robertson. Witness kept the books for about a month, after which there was a dispute between the two (Moss and Robertson), and Moss refused witness access to the books. Plaintiff for some time managed the business.

Cross-examined by Sir Henry Juta: Witness opened the books by writing the different headings. He did not think he made any further entries, as he did not have particulars. Witness drew up statements to ascertain assets and liabilities, and to take the stock.

By De Villiers, C.J.: In the statements, he went into details as far as possible. He noticed that there was an item of £1,000 to the credit of Mr. Moss. This was put down to capital account.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: He began to make up some statements, but they were never completed. He arrived at most of the debts.

Wm. Otis Bullock, accountant in the National Bank, said he knew the parties to the suit. He produced the partnership form for opening partnership account, bearing the private signatures of the plaintiff and defendant, under the style of Moss and Robertson. The form was dated the 17th September, 1902. An account was opened, and it was operated upon. He could not produce any cheques of Moss and Robertson. A certificate had been given showing that the cheques had been given up, and it was signed by Moss. He could not say definitely whether the plaintiff operated on the partnership account.

Cross-examined by Sir H. Juta: There was no balance in December. The last cheque closed the balance, and was drawn by Mr. Moss.

De Villiers, C.J., said the last cheque was on the 27th November.

Mr. Burton closed his case.

George Alfred Moss, the defendant, said that in August he extended the business at the Cafe Royal, and he entered into negotiations with Mr. Robertson. The first idea was to increase from one bar to two bars, and to open a restaurant, and he proposed to take a partner in, in order to manage the whole business. The idea was that they should look, one after the victualling, and the other after the catering, or jointly. They had negotiations and the arrangement that they came to was the plaintiff should pay £1,000 cash down, and on the sale of the hotel at Caledon, witness was to receive a further £1,800, making £2,800 in all. Plaintiff was to take over the liabilities, pay witness cash for half the stock at valuation, and the debts of the firm were to be met jointly. This was some time in July. It was proposed at one time they should run both the Cafe Royal and the National, and change them alternately Mr. Robertson said he could not keep on the National Hotel, because he was so heavily in debt, and the place was not paying. Clearly, the plaintiff did not keep on the National Hotel. The plaintiff negotiated for the sale of the National Hotel. Witness stood surety for £1,000 to the Van Rhyn Co. for the money advanced to the plaintiff. The £1,800 was not paid after the sale of the National Hotel, plaintiff saying that he was in an awful muddle. Witness afterwards repaid the £1,000 to the Van Ryn Co., on receiving a demand from them. He asked plaintiff for the money, and ultimately he asked plaintiff to go over with him to see Mr. Fuller. Witness then ended the partnership. On the 6th December, he sent out a notification to the effect that, owing to Mr. Robertson not having fulfilled certain obligations to him, that he (witness) was alone responsible, and he held himself responsible for the whole of the liabilities of the Cafe Royal. Robertson did not put a penny piece into the business. When he spoke to the plaintiff about the partnership, the latter said: "I don't want to be thrown out like a dog; I have got a wife and two children to keep." Witness replied that he did not want to do any such thing, and he referred witness to Mr. Fuller. As to the alleged secret agreement, he put his signature to none of the documents submitted to him by Mr. Greening. Mr. Greening, he found, was acting as attorney for both himself and Mr. Robertson. He told Mr. Greening that he need not act for him any longer. Under the agreement that he had with Mrs. Hall, he could not have transferred the licence. He spoke to Mrs. Hall, and he afterwards reported to Mr. Roertson that she would do nothing whatever in the matter until her money had been paid, viz., £3,300

By De Villiers, C. J.: There was no ground whatever for saying that he proposed to enter into partnership on account of the charge that was pending against him. He could have raised any money that he required from the merchants.

As long as he paid off Mrs. Hall, he could have done what he pleased. He refused to sign the document. He knew of no secret document, as alleged in the declaration. He had not got this document. Several papers were submitted to him for signature, but they were not signed.

Sir Henry Juta said the defence had been wanting this document, and the answer they had received was that it was in the possession of Mr. Brady. It was only at the last minute that the other side turned round and said the defendant had it.

In further examination, witness said he refused to sign any document of partnership until he had received the money from Robertson. In view of the arrangements, witness had held out Robertson as a partner. Witness opened an account in their joint names, and he had complained in correspondence that cheques had been drawn by Mr. Robertson which were not in connection with the business. Correspondence took place with regard to these. Robertson drew no money for himself with witness's knowledge. In connection with the statement that the business was a bad one when Robertson came in, the witness said that he had been doing good business ever since he opened the Cafe Royal. He had been doing very well since Robertson ceased to have anything to do with the business. Last month his takings were £870 odd, and the previous month's takings amounted to over £929. After witness's trial at the Paarl, witness came back; he did not get rid of Robertson until the 16th December. It was on the notice issued to him by the Van Rhyn Co. that witness first took steps in connection with Robertson.

Cross-examined by Mr. Burton: Witness's pending trial had nothing to do with the arrangement. The trouble did not affect his business; it did not affect his credit in the least. No merchants in Cape Town pressed him for money then. Witness did not remember speaking to Mr. Bam in regard to getting a partner in consequence of his trouble. Witness's only consideration in getting a partner was to increase the business. Witness took Robertson to Greening in connection with the negotiations for a partnership. Witness instructed Greening to make a proposition. There was never an agreement that Robertson should take over the whole business. The agreement was that Robertson should come into partnership after Robertson had paid his share. Before he paid, witness thought he would fulfil his promise. Witness knew Robertson could not pay until the Caledon Hotel was paid. Witness asked Robertson to get a loan, and the Van Ryn Co. advanced the money on witness's security. Witness had repaid the whole amount to the Van Ryn Company. Witness employed Mr. Fuller as his solicitor in December. Robertson wanted to sell the Caledon Hotel because it was not paying. Witness had personally made an offer of remuneration to Robertson for his services in connection with the business. Mrs. Hall refused her consent unless she were paid her money. The takings during the time Robertson was there compared favourably with the present takings. The times were better then, as the soldiers were coming down from the front.

In reply to the Court, witness said that when the summons was served on the 10th December, the liabilities were between £5,000 and £6,000, and the assets, excluding goodwill, were about £900 or £1,000. Witness paid £6,000 for the goodwill.

George Scott Pargiter, manager of the Van Ryn Co., said £1,000 was lent to Robertson. When witness heard the National was sold, he went to Robertson for the money, and the latter said he could not pay. Witness then went to Moss. It was a distinct understanding that Robertson should pay when the National was sold. The £1,000 had been repaid.

Henry C. Fuller, attorney, said he acted for Mr. Moss towards the end of last year. At one time both Mr. Brady and Mr. Greening claimed to act for Moss. Witness asked Mr. Robertson if he was in a position to lay down any of the money. Robertson said he could not, and witness observed that he supposed everything was at an end between him and Moss. Witness told him Mr. Moss would be prepared to give him remuneration for his services. He asked Robertson to call on him with his attorney. Robertson seemed to acquiesce in the view that everything was at an end. He did not take up the position that he had paid the money.

Robertson was recalled, at the direction of the Court, and said that he considered the value of the goodwill was £16,000 at the time he left the place.

De Villiers, C.J.: £16,000! Well, you got it a very cheap share at £1,000.

Witness: I worked up the value. The place was not worth £4,000 before.

Defendant (recalled) said the books showing the receipts from July to the end of the year were not in Court. This was the time at which Mr. Day was supposed to make up the books.

De Villiers, C.J.: Where are the books from which the takings are to be made up? You were told before the Court adjourned that every book was to be here. Now send for every book.

Mr. Burton (for plaintiff): This was clearly a partnership. Moss (whatever his motives may have been) advised his creditors that he had taken Robertson into partnership, he had Robertson advertised as a partner on his menu cards, and a banking account was opened in the joint names of Robertson and Moss. The evidence shows that at the solicitation of Moss, plaintiff gave up a business at Caledon, which, with some little cultivation, would have proved very lucrative; and for what? He was not a salaried servant of Moss; there is no evidence that Moss ever paid him anything. He gave his services. He worked up the business, and if he did not actually pay cash, he, at all events, made himself liable to the extent of £1,000. I submit that the partnership is clearly established, and that the evidence shows that the plainiff has given ample consideration for his interest in this partnership.

Sir H. Juta (for defendant): This is a most extraordinary case. Here we have a man who claims to become a partner in a business, the goodwill of which was worth over £6,000 without putting one single penny into the business. He says he gave up his hotel at Caledon to join the defendant, and that he worked up the business. But the Caledon Hotel seems to have been a losing concern, and it would not appear that plaintiff's efforts materially improved Moss's business, or that the business declined when the plaintiff no longer gave his attention to it. I submit that there is no evidence of a partnership; the defendant refused to sign the deed of partnership which had been drawn up for his signature, and no consideration whatever was given for the alleged partnership in this valuable interest.

Mr. Burton (in reply): No written document is (in our law) required to constitute a contract, whether of partnership or of any other kind. We do not rely upon the document drawn up by Greening (since it was never executed), but upon the verbal assent given to its terms by both parties, and on the fact that the defendant held out the plaintiff as a partner. As to the question of consideration, it has not been denied that plaintiff rendered certain services to the defendant and to his business, for which plaintiff received no direct payment. That he gave up his business at Caledon at defendant's request, in order to assist defendant in his business, and that he, at all events, incurred liabilities to the amount of £1,000 in the interests of this business.

De Villiers, C. J.: The pleadings in this case are certainly open to criticism, but substantially I think that there is no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion as to what the plaintiff's declaration is founded upon. It is founded upon a partnership, and, in order to declare on the partnership, it is not necessary to state all the facts upon which the existence of which such partnership is founded. It would have been sufficient in this declaration to allege that on December 10, the date of the summons, the partnership was in existence between plaintiff and defendant, and that the plaintiff now claimed dissolution of the partnership and a division of the assets of the partnership and in that case there would have been no reference to all the facts upon which the partnership is founded. Unfortunately, the declaration, in going into details, has somewhat confused the issue between the parties. The plaintiff, in order to succeed, has to establish a partnership, and, in my opinion, he has clearly established the existence of such a partnership on the 10th December, 1902. A document has been put in, upon which the plaintiff mainly relies, which purports to be executed on the 5th September, 1902. That document never was signed by the parties, but I am quite satisfied on the evidence that that document embodies what the parties, not substantially agreed upon, but that it embodied what the parties wished to hold out to the world as the agreement between them. If that document stood by itself, then, undoubtedly, no partnership has been proved, but the plaintiff would be entitled to the whole of this business upon payment of the sum of £4,000. That is the document which the defendant ostensibly agreed to. But I think that the Court would never allow the plaintiff to get the full benefits of that document, because it was not intended to carry out the true agreement between the parties. The Court has repeatedly decided in very analagous cases that it must look at the real transaction between the parties. We have sometimes, for instance, had cases where a document is put in, in which there is a deed of sale between the parties. The Court has been satisfied that it is not intended to be a sale, that it purports to be a sale, but that the real transaction between the parties has been a pledge, and the Court has treated it as a pledge, notwithstanding the terms in which it has been ostensibly worded. In the present case, I am satisfied from all the facts which have come out that, although this agreement purported to be an agreement by which the plaintiff was to take over the whole of the business, the plaintiff is not to be entitled to the whole of the business, even if he is prepared to pay the money, but that he is bound by his own statement that it was intended that, instead of his having the whole business, the defendant should retain one-half share of the business of the partnership. I think that the real reason why this was done was that at that time the defendant was under a cloud; there was a prosecution against him at the Paarl; it was doubtful how that prosecution might end, and it was in order to secure himself against whatever the result might be that this agreement was entered into, and notwithstanding the defendant's denial, I am perfectly satisfied that was one of the objects of his entering into the agreement with the plaintiff. Then, it is not this document alone which should guide the Court in the present case, but all the other facts which have been proved. It has been shown that early in September a banking account was opened; the bank was requested to honour the cheques drawn by both the plaintiff and defendant; notices were sent to the creditors that in future the plaintiff would be a member of the firm of Moss and Robertson; and not only that, but the plaintiff entered upon the management of the business, and for some months took an active share in the management. An advertisement has also been put in, which shows that the plaintiff was held out to the world as a partner. Then we find that the agreement referred to a payment of £1,000 made on the date of that agreement, viz., the 5th September. On reference to the plaintiff's bank-books, it is found that on that very date he paid the sum of £1,000 to the defendant, in terms of this agreement. It is said, however, that that £1,000 had been borowed from Van Rhyn, and that ultimately the defendant had been called upon to repay that sum of £1,000. That does not affect the circumstance that the £1,000 has been paid in consideration of the partnership. If thereafter that amount was to be paid by defendant, it would be paid as a surety, who has been called upon to pay the debt of his principal. But the money, the original amount of £1.000, which was the consideration for allowing the plaintiff to come into the partnership, had been duly paid. On the 10th December, therefore, in my opinion, there was a partnership between the parties, and if the replication had not somewhat complicated matters. I should have had no doubt whatever as to the judgment which the Court should give. But, unfortunately, the replication again brings in an admission which is wholly inconsistent with the declaration. I think the only explanation of this replication appears to be that there was no admission that the £1,800 formed part of the final arrangement. that it was only an admission that it formed part of the previous negotiations which had fallen through, it would be wholly inconsistent with the declartion that this £1,800 was part of the consideration to be paid by the plaintiff in order to become a member of this partnership. The Court, therefore, must hold that there was a partnership, and must order a dissolution of the partnership. and the Court will appoint a receiver to ascertain the assets and liabilities of the firm on the 10th December, 1902, and to ascertain also the value of the goodwill as part of such assets, and in case the assets should exceed the liabilities, the defendant will pay to the plaintiff one-half of such excess, after deducting from the said one-half the sum of £1,000. As to the costs of this action, the Court will be in a better position to judge of that after receiving the report of the receiver. The parties will have to consider as to who will be a competent man.

Maasdorp, J., concurred.

Mr. Burton intimated that the parties agreed to the appointment of Mr. Maynard Nash as receiver.

Sir H. Juta said he supposed that the defendant would carry on his business as heretofore.

De Villiers, C.J.: Oh, I think the business should belong to the defendant. My suggestion is that the defendant should proceed with his business, and that there should be simply a payment to the plaintiff. Perhaps it would be better not to use the word "receiver," because a receiver might think that he should take over the business. We might call him a referee. The Court will appoint Mr. Maynard Nash as referee to ascertain the assets and liabilities, including, amongst assets, the goodwill, and order that in case the assets should exceed the liabilities, the defendant pay to the plaintiff one-half the sum in excess, after deducting from the said one-half the sum of £1.000, the question of costs to stand over.

ILLIQUID CASE.

PFEIFFER V. CARRE.

Mr. M. de Villiers appeared for the plaintiff; Mr. Upington for the defendant.

The case had been postponed on the previous Saturday, in order that certain affidavits might be prepared.

Mr. Upington now read an affidavit by Mr. Kayser, the defendant's attorney, who said that the defendant brought the summons to him with instructions to enter appearance. Deponent told him that if the case were defended, he did not think it would be brought on for trial during the May term. It was arranged that the defendant should give detailed instructions. When the declaration was filed, deponent wrote to the defendant. The plea was asked for, and defendant called at the office, but deponent was out. If the plea had been filed when asked, it would not have been practicable to comply with the rules of Court.

Mr. De Villiers read the affidavit of Carl Pfeiffer, the plaintiff, who emphatically denied that he induced the defendant to go into speculative transactions. Statements of acounts were rendered from time to time, and defendant never denied the debt. Letters were referred to in which defendant acknowledged liability, and told plaintiff that if he were given time he would pay all.

De Villiers, C.J., asked Mr. Upington what the defence was.

Mr. Upington said he had letters in his possession which were written by defendant, in which apparently there were admissions, but the only question was whether any of these admissions were so clear as to the whole of the debt that defendant would be estopped from disputing certain items. In regard to certain of the transactions, defendant alleged that plaintiff did not refer to him, and purchased at his own discretion. Then he went into other questions as to its being a gambling transaction. He (counsel) did not know what evidence defendant could adduce in support of that, but he supposed the main line of defence would be that portions of the items were not due by him.

De Villiers, C.J., in giving judgment, said: It is clear that it would be a waste of time and expense to allow any further litigation, and judgment must be given as prayed, with leave refused to purge the default.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

LAZAR V. TABLE BAY HARBOUR BOARD. } 1903. June 3rd.

Non-delivery—Clerk.

In an action for non-delivery of a case of merchandise or its value; an endorsement was made by defendant's clerk as follows, "less seven cases short; see baggage room."

Held, not to amount to an admission by defendant that the seven cases were in the baggage room.

This was an action brought by Hugo Lazar, importer and merchants' agent, Cape Town, against the Table Bay Harbour Board for the delivery of two cases or their value, £24 5s., £4 14s. 6d. freight and clearance dues, and £100 damages.

The declaration set out that in or about the month of February, 1902, the steamer Kildonan Castle arrived in Table Bay, having on board 30 cases consigned to the plaintiff, for which he held a bill of lading. The said cases were duly delivered by the said steamer to the defendant Board, who granted a clean receipt of same. It was the duty of the Board to deliver to the plaintiff the cases, but they only delivered 28, and they neglected and refused to deliver certain two cases. The cases contained samples for the plaintiff's business. Owing to their non-delivery he was prevented from carrying on his business, and was unable to carry out certain contracts. He claimed delivery of the said cases or their value, £24 5s., plus £4 14s. 6d. in the alternative, and a further sum of £100 as damages, alternative relief, and costs of suit.

The defendant Board in their plea admitted that 26 cases were delivered to the Board in or about February last year by the Kildonan Castle, and said that those cases were delivered to the plaintiff. No other cases were delivered to the Board ex the Kildonan Castle for or on account of the plaintiff. Defendants refused to of the plaintiff. Wherefore defendants prayed that the plaintiff's claim might be dismissed with costs.

The Replication was general

Mr. Benjamin for the plaintiff; Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Bisset) for the defendants.

Mr Benjamin informed the Court that one of the cases had since been found at East London, and had been delivered to the plaintiff, so that that particular case would go out of the action. The case was numbered 527, and it was in respect of case No. 700 that defendants were now sued.

Mr. Upington said that the case from East London was still at the Docks, and the Board had offered to allow plaintiff to remove the case.

Mr. Benjamin said the plaintiff admitted that the case was lying at the Docks at his risk. The plaintiff was a commercial traveller, and he required this case in connection with his business, and now it was found a year after it had been lost.

Mr. Benjamin called evidence for the plaintiff.

Sidney James Castleman, a clerk in the employ of the Union-Castle Steamship Company, produced the manifest of cargo brought to this port by the Kildonan Castle in February, 1902. According to this document, 30 packages were consigned to plaintiff. At that time the Harbour Board merely tallied the cargo. The Union-Castle Company tallied the baggage. The Harbour Board gave a short-landed list. On the discrepancy list the case No. 700 did not appear. The last entry was "Seven packages Hugo Lazar; see baggage warehouse." The company took this to mean that these seven packages were in the baggage warehouse. The Harbour Board took the goods out of the slings at the ship's side. Landing and shipping often took place at the same time. It was quite feasible that goods which had been landed might be shipped again. The baggage warehouse belonged to the Harbour Board.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: At that time the Harbour Board employed clerks to tally cargo as it came from the hold. The Customs tallied for revenue purposes at that time. They also made a short-landed list. The discrepancy list did not specify any numbers. Case No. 527 was carried to East London by the Kildonan Castle. Case 700 was landed here. His receipt was the discrepancy list. He would not be surprised to hear that the two cases were shown on the Customs short-landed list. It was quite possible that a case might appear on the ship's manifest without having been shipped.

By Maasdorp, J.: Five of the cases were found in the baggage warehouse.

The evidence of Hugo Lazar, taken on commission, was to the effect that he was a Hungarian. In November, 1901, he was in Vienna for business purposes. He arranged certain agencies that he should take up in South Africa. In one matter he was to carry samples, and he was to receive 800 crowns, equivalent to £40, a year, and, in addition, a commission of 5 per cent. The samples were of handkerchiefs. He selected the samples in Vienna. He saw both the cases in question being packed. He came out by the Kildonan Castle. He was assured that all the thirty cases had been put into the hold. All the cases were delivered in Cape Town except two. He was convinced that if he had had the samples he should have made £500 or £600 at least. Another man who had done business in the same line had had a turnover of £20,000, upon which he received 4 per cent. commission.

For the defence,

Frank Robb, assistant general manager of the Harbour Board, said he was well acquainted with the practice of the Board in the matter of landing cargo. The Harbour Board clerks at the time in question tallied cargo as it was taken out of the vessel. In addition, the Customs officials tallied cargo. The Harbour Board received a copy of the ship's manifest, they had their tally list, and then they furnished a discrepancy list to the shipping company. The entry on the discrepancy list about the baggage warehouse he understood meant that the tally clerk, who made up that list thought the packages might have found their way there, but they were short-landed. The entry was made by a tally clerk in the Harbour Board's employ. Since the action Cohen and O'Flaherty, two of their tally clerks had left. He had got their tally books. The Board did not know where the two men had gone.

Mr. Benjamin objected to the books being put in without the two men being called.

Mr. Upington said they would be able to get evidence on the point from the Customs official.

Witness, continuing, said that as a matter of fact, from his knowledge, goods were often over-carried at the Docks. The ship's manifest was no proof that the cases had been shipped.

[Kotze, J.: The assumption is that the cases were shipped.]

Mr. Upington said his position was that the case No. 700 was over-carried just in the same way as No. 527 had been.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: Only baggage was delivered in the warehouse. If cargo were put into the baggage warehouse, it would come out at the place at which the tally clerk was stationed. In regard to the words "See baggage warehouse," witness thought the explanation was that the clerk thought these packages might have gone to the baggage warehouse, and put the words as an instruction to the Union-Castle Co. to look in the baggage warehouse.

James Clark, tide waiter, in the employ of the Customs, said he kept a tally of part of the cargo delivered from the Kildonan Castle. Three others, Flowers, Hammond, and Harris were employed, each taking a hatch. Witness entered the number of each case as they passed to the best of his ability. On one side of the case were marked "H. Lazar"; on the other side "J.S.O.W.," with a number, and witness tallied them as J.S.O.W. The officer who relieved him tallied them as H. Lazar. Witness made out the Customs short landed list, showing two cases short, viz., 527 and 700.

By Mr. Benjamin: Cases occasionally missed the notice of officials. Witness was satisfied that the four experienced officers down there did not miss anything.

Harold V. Harris, Harry Flowers, and Kenneth H. Hammond, tide waiters, gave similar evidence.

After hearing Mr. Benjamin in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case alleges that certain two cases, amongst other goods, were consigned to him by the Kildonan Castle from Southampton, and that on the arrival of the Kildonan Castle, these two packages were delivered to the Harbour Board; that it thereupon became the duty of the Harbour Board to deliver the cases to the plaintiff; that the Harbour Board failed to make such delivery, and that, in consequence, the cases have become lost to him, and he has suffered damages in the sum mentioned in the declaration. When the declaration was drawn, the plaintiff claimed in respect of two cases, which he alleged had been delivered to the Harbour Board, and that the Harbour Board had failed to deliver to him, but he has abandoned his claim in regard to one case, because he has ascertained now that the Harbour Board is not responsible for the delay in delivering the one case, and the case is at his disposal at present in the custody of the Harbour Board. It has been said by Mr. Benjamin that the plaintiff is in a very difficult position in this case, because he has to depend for his evidence upon such information as he can get either from the shipping company or from the Harbour Board. It is very hard upon the plaintiff that he should be, in this respect, as it were, at the mercy of the shipping company and of the Harbour Board, but we cannot for that reason alter the rule of law, which requires that the plaintiff must give clear proof of his case before he can succeed. Now, it appears that the evidence which the plaintiff depends upon in this case consists of what he alleges to be certain admissions made by the Harbour Board, and also some information he has derived from the shipping company. I believe the plaintiff was largely led by the statement made by the shipping company when he determined to proceed with this case. It seems that during the correspondence he was told by someone in the service of the shipping company that the Harbour Board had given a clean receipt for these two cases, and that consequently there was absolute evidence, by virtue of this receipt, that the Board had received these two cases, and were therefore responsible for the safe custody and delivery thereof to the plaintiff. Now it appears that that information was based upon a mistake of a clerk in the shipping company's employ, because no such clean receipt was ever given by the Harbour Board to the shipping company. It seems that a certain discrepancy list was handed by the Harbour Board to the shipping company, in which we find an entry opposite the name of Hugo Lazar, referring to seven packages, which appear in the discrepancy list as short delivered, and there is a further memorandum, "See baggage warehouse." Here, again, it is quite possible the plaintiff was led wrongly as to the interpretation to be put on this memorandum. He contends that it conveys an admission on the part of the Harbour Board that there were seven packages short delivered, but that they were to be found in the baggage warehouse. If that admission were actually made by the Harbour Board, then it would amount to an admission of the receipt of these goods, and of their custody in this warehouse, and the Board would be responsible; but I think that was a mistaken interpretation. It seems to me quite clear it could mean nothing more than that there was some doubt as to whether these packages might not have been missed, and have gone with the baggage into the baggage ware- and not have been tallied out with the cargo; and that consequently, when the discrepancy list was made out, and seven packages were given as short delivered, there was a suggestion made that they might possibly be found in the baggage warehouse. The other interpretation, I think, would be ridiculous, because it would amount to this: that there were seven packages short delivered, and that these packages were in the baggage warehouse. It would follow, if this were so, that they were not short delivered, and the entry that they were short delivered would be wrong. Now, the plaintiff has produced evidence as to the delivery of these two packages to the Harbour Board. The officers of the Harbour Board and of the shipping company have been called, and they have informed the Court as to the manner in which their tally was made, and it seems that the shipping company wholly depends upon the result of that tally as proof of the delivery of goods to the Harbour Board. The company themselves kept no tally, and they are depending entirely upon the admissions of receipt of goods as they appear by the receipts signed for upon the discrepancy list. Now if the Court is thrown for its information upon the information contained in the documents put in by the tally clerks, then I think it is perfectly clearly proved that these packages were never delivered by the shipping company to the Harbour Board. The discrepancy list put in by the Harbour Board is rather vague in its terms, and in itself might have been very unsatisfactory evidence; but it is supplemented by the more precise evidence given by the Customs House clerks. According to the evidence given by the Harbour Board, we find that seven packages were short delivered, but which packages these actually were is not stated, either by number or by description. That might have left some doubt as to whether these seven packages included the two in respect of which the plaintiff now claims, but when we come to the evidence given by the tally clerks of the Customs department, we find the tallies were very carefully kept, and the result is that there is very clear proof upon the documents that these cases which are in dispute were not delivered by the shipping company to the Harbour Board. Under these circumstances it may be possible that some further evidence may be produced of a more direct character by someone who actually saw the delivery, independently of the evidence of the tally clerks, and if such evidence is produced, the plaintiff might still be successful as against the Harbour Board; but at present I think he has failed to prove that these cases were delivered, and that the Harbour Board became responsible for them to the plaintiff, and the Court should, under the circumstances, grant absolution from the instance, with costs.

Kotze, J., said he was of the same opinion. He thought that for the purposes of this suit they might take it that this particular case in question was placed on board the Kildonan Castle, and arrived at Cape Town in the ship. But then the main point was: Was that case delivered by the Union-Castle Company to the Harbour Board? And there it seemed to him that the plaintiff's case failed. It might be quite true that in a suit like this the Court should not exact the strongest possible evidence from the plaintiff, but should act on the preponderance of presumption and probality, due regard being had to the burden of proof; and it seemed to him that the weight of probability was on the side of the defendants. The plaintiff relied almost entirely on a note made by a clerk of the Harbour Board to the effect, "less seven cases short; see baggage room"; and the plaintiff wished the Court to infer from the words, "See baggage room," that this was an admission on the part of the Harbour Board that these seven cases were in the baggage room. He regretted he could not read that endorsement in the same way. It merely referred to the baggage room as a place where, possibly, these short delivered cases might be found. Mr. Benjamin had argued that five of these cases had been found there, but that was mere supposition, because Mr. Robb said that the five cases never came out of the baggage room, but out of what he called the ex-warehouse on the Loch Jetty. There was the further fact that, of the two cases which were lost, one was found on board the steamer Kildonan Castle at East London. It had been suggested by Mr. Benjamin that in the great confusion and hurry which existed when mail steamers came in, cargo might be landed and put back with the cargo loaded into the ship from the same quay. That might be possible, but it was far more easy to suppose that the particular case found at East London never came out of the ship when in the Cape Town docks. There was, therefore, no evidence to justify the Court in concluding that the particular case in respect to which the claim was made had ever been in the baggage room or delivered to the defendants by the shipping company.

[Plaintiff's Attorney: C. Brady; Defendants' Attorneys: Reid and Nephew.]

SCHERLICH V. SCHERLICH AND ANOTHER. { 1903. June 3rd.

This was an action for a decree of divorce, brought by Auguste Gustave Scherlich against his wife on the ground of adultery with one Hoeftmann, from whom £500 damages were claimed. The second defendant claimed in reconvention £100 for maintenance of the plaintiff's children.

The declaration set forth that the plaintiff resided at Cape Town, and the defendants at Woodstock. The first-named defendant was married to the plaintiff in community of property on the 4th November, 1878. There were four children of the marriage, and since 1897 the first-named defendant had been living with the second defendant as his wife, and had had two children by her. The plaintiff claimed against the first defendant a decree of divorce, and the forfeiture of all the benefits accruing from the community of property, and the custody of the children; and against the second defendant, £500 damages for loss of comforts and the society of his wife, with costs of suit.

The joint plea of the defendants admitted that they had been living as man and wife, but the second defendant denied that he had caused the plaintiff any damage. The first-named defendant stated that the plaintiff had contributed very little to her support ever since the marriage. With the exception of short periods in 1894 and 1895, the plaintiff had ceased to live with her since 1892. The second defendant, in a claim of reconvention, stated that he had contributed towards the maintenance of the children, and claimed £100.

The replication stated that the plaintiff left Cape Town in order to obtain more remunerative work, and that he had repeatedly remitted considerable sums of money to the first-named defendant, and that several of the children had been earning their own livelihood. The plea that the second-named defendant set forth that if money was advanced it was unnecessary, and the plaintiff denied having received the benefits of any such contributions.

Mr. Buchanan for plaintiff; Mr. Benjamin for defendants.

Auguste Gustave Scherlich said that he was married to the first-named defendant in Cape Town, in November, 1878. In 1890 he took his family to Johannesburg, and returned to Cape Town in 1892, but only remained a short time, when he returned again to Johannesburg alone. He left his wife in business in Cape Town, and provided her with a good stock. For the first eight months he was up in Johannesburg he sent his wife £30. For two years his wife never wrote for any money, but he had a letter from her stating that she had taken the part of a French lady at the theatre. In January, 1895, he came to Cape Town to start business, but his wife had no further propensity for kitchen work. Witness returned to Johannesburg, and came back to Cape Town in 1896, when he resided with his wife for a short period. In 1897 he wrote to his wife suggesting again to start business, but she advised him by return that business was bad, and that he had better stay in Johannesburg and make some more money. During his stay in Johannesburg he had sent his wife something like £500. His eldest girl and boy had been earning their own living for a considerable time, and the second boy had also been working for a considerable time. In September, 1901, he heard from Mrs Hoeftmann, the scond defendant's mother, and as a result he wrote to his wife at once. In his excitement he had written several letters, offering to forgive her if she would leave Hoeftmann.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: The defendant's mother was an invalid, but she did not require much support. He had been very fond of his wife. The amounts that he had sent to his wife he spoke to from memory. When in Johannesburg he made ginger-beer and vinegar. His wife had kept a boarding-house, and he had worked as a fireman in a mine. It was not true that she kept him for ten months. In 1892 they came down from Johannesburg, and they opened a small shop. In 1894, after he had gone back to Johannesburg, he wrote telling her that he would come down, but she said that he should not come down. He was not anxious to get rid of his wife. He admitted writing a letter to the defendant on March 11 asking her to procure two witnesses for him to make the divorce case "as short and easy as possible." He had no property in the Transvaal.

Willem Johann Schwann, of 1, Oxford-street, Woodstock, said he knew the parties. He met Mr. and Mrs. Scherlich in Johannesburg. Mrs. Scherlich was now living in Oxford-street, Woodstock. Witness lived in the same house. The first and second defendant lived together as man and wife. They had two children.

Cross-examined by Mr. Benjamin: As long as the boarding-house was kept by Mrs. Scherlich, her husband did no work outside the house.

Mr. Benjamin intimated that he wished to call Mrs. Scherlich on the question of the custody of the children.

Maasdorp, J.: Do you intend to insist on the claim in re-convention?

Mr. Benjamin: No.

Maasdorp, J.: It seems to me like adding insult to injury. First he harbours the man's wife, then the children are there and maintenance is asked for them.

Mrs. Scherlich, called by Mr. Benjamin, said she had four children still living by her first husband, aged 23, 20, 15, and 12 respectively. The youngest was a girl. The three elder ones were working, and the youngest was at Stellenbosch. Her husband left her in 1895, and he never asked her afterwards to go up to Johannesburg. When they came down in 1892, she came very reluctantly. Then she had a struggle with the shop. The money her husband sent her did not enable her to support herself and children. She did work at the theatre as a dressmaker, but not as a "French lady."

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Her elder child with the co-defendant was 4½ years of age. She had written to her husband while he was in Johannesburg, and told him about the children, and she signed herself "Your sincere wife." She was obliged to do that, because he wanted to know as to how the children were.

After counsel had addressed the Court, on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: The plaintiff in this case prays for a decree of divorce against his wife, on the ground of adultery committed by her with the co-defendant. That that adultery has been committed has been proved in this case, and is also admitted by the defendants. The plaintiff is, therefore, entitled to his decree of divorce. There is nothing that was done by him which would debar him from claiming that divorce. The plaintiff further claims that it should be declared that the defendant has forfeited the benefits arising from the community of property. As that is not pressed, no order need be given on that point. It does not appear there is any property in this case, and consequently that such an order will be of any advantage to the parties. The plaintiff further claims the custody of the minor children. There are three minor children, two elder boys, of the ages of twenty and fifteen respectively, and the younger girl of the age of twelve years. Now, by ordinary rule of law, the father is always considered to be entitled to the custody of the children. There have been cases in which children have been of such tender years as to specially require the care of the mother, and in these cases the Court left the children with the mother for the time being, but in this case, having regard to the age of the children, it does not appear that they require any special care on the part of their mother, and, as it has not been proved there is anything on the part of the plaintiff which would disqualify him from having the care of these children, the ordinary rule of law must prevail, and the Court will grant an order giving him custody of these three children. Not only has nothing been proved against the plaintiff in respect to his conduct towards his children, but it appears that for a considerable time past he has maintained the youngest girl, and paid all her expenses at the boarding school where she still remains. The next claim is one by the plaintiff against the co-defendant, in which he claims damages in the sum of £500 by reason of the wrong done to him by the defendant in depriving him, through his adultery for this period, of the "comfort, society, and affection of his wife." Now, it seems to me, from the evidence in this case, that for a considerable time back the plaintiff has been living in Johannesburg, and the defendant has been living in Cape Town, correspondence has taken place between them from time to time, and it has also been proved that small sums of money were occasionally remitted by the plaintiff to the defendant. Therefore, there is nothing to prove that there ever was any strong desire on the part of the plaintiff to return to cohabitation with his wife. For many years he neither visited her, nor the children, and it does not appear that he has laid very much store by the society and comforts of marriage, for the loss of which he now claims damages. Under all the circumstances of this case, it seems to me rather that the plaintiff may be taken to have largely renounced this very society and comfort he now alleges he lost through the conduct of the defendant, and that he had no intention in the very near future of returning to live with his wife. It is said that he wrote to her some years ago, offering to return, and that she advised him against taking such a step. Well, he seems to have been very easily persuaded not to come back and enjoy the home comforts which he says he was entitled to, and I think the real reason is not so much that he was persuaded by his wife, but that he really had no wish to return and live with her. That is the conclusion I come to from the conduct of the plaintiff in this case. However, there is no doubt that a wrong has been done by the second defendant to the plaintiff, and that, although the plaintiff is not entitled to any damages, because he is largely responsible for his wife having gone wrong as she has done, still, as the defendant is the cause of these proceedings, which have been forced upon him for the purpose of obtaining a divorce from his wife, who committed adultery, I think the second defendant should pay the costs of these proceedings. There is a further claim put in, made by the defendant as against the plaintiff, a claim in reconvention. He claims for the moneys which he has expended for the maintenance of the children during the time he lived with the defendant, and kept the children with him. Now, in my opinion, this is a most impudent claim, and counsel was quite right in abandoning it. He seems to be adding insult to injury. He harbours the plaintiff's wife and keeps her children in the house, so that he does the plaintiff a wrong, and he now claims compensation in the loss he has suffered through the consequence of the wrong that he did against plaintiff. The claim has not been pressed. Judgment must, therefore, be upon the claim in reconvention for the defendant in reconvention. The Court will grant a decree of divorce, giving the plaintiff the custody of the children, with leave of access to the defendant at all convenient periods, and give judgment on the claim in reconvention for the defendant in reconvention, and order the co-defendant in the case to pay the costs.

Kotze, J., concurred.

SPIEGEL v. EILENBERG. { 1903. June 4th.

Contract — Consideration — Animus contrahendi — Request — Vagueness of contract.

The defendant, a merchant in Cape Town, being on a visit to Chicago, U.S.A., was consulted by the plaintiff, a nephew of his residing there, as to the prospects for a young man at the Cape, and after the defendant had left Chicago the plaintiff wrote to him, making further inquiries. In answer, the plaintiff wrote: "If you care to come to Africa, I am prepared to find you employment as a traveller in town or any such work as you may be suited for." About seven months afterwards the plaintiff came to the Cape, and finding, as he said, that the defendant did nothing for him, he found employment for himself at £10 a month. Subsequently he lost this employment and brought an action against the defendant for damages for breach of contract. The evidence shewed that it was the plaintiff's own desire to come to the Cape to improve his position, and that beyond the terms of the letter the defendant conveyed no request to the plaintiff to come.

Held, that the alleged promise was too vague to be enforced, but that even if it had been more definite, it was not supported by sufficient consideration.

This was an action for damages brought by David Spiegel against Maurice Eilenberg for alleged breach of contract.

The declaration set out that the plaintiff was the nephew of the defendant, and that both parties at present resided in Cape Town. Plaintiff was in January of last year carrying on a small business in Chicago, U.S.A. The defendant visited Chicago, and a conversation took place between them. The defendant said that if plaintiff would give up his business and come to Cape Town he would find him employment as a traveller in town or other suitable employment. After due consideration, plaintiff agreed to give up his business, and he came out to this country. Defendant had refused to perform his said promise, or to find plaintiff the said or any other employment. In consequence of the breach of contract, plaintiff had suffered great loss in giving up his said business, and lost the profits thereof, and incurred expenses in coming from Chicago to Cape Town, and of living in Cape Town. Wherefore plaintiff claimed £500 damages, and costs of suit

The defendant, in his plea, admitted that he made a gratuitous promise that, in the event of plaintiff determining to proceed to Cape Town, he would find him employment, but he denied that he entered into any contract or that there was any consideration for the said promise. The defendant admitted that the plaintiff had incurred certain expenses in proceeding to Cape Town, but denied that the plaintiff had suffered any loss for which the defendant was liable.

Mr. Wilkinson for plaintiff; Mr. Upington for defendant.

David Spiegel (the plaintiff) said that at the present time he was earning £6 a month as a painter's labourer. In January of last year he was carrying on a wholesale grocery business in Chicago, for which he paid £350. He had been carrying on the business successfully for two years. In January last year Mr. and Mrs. Eilenberg visited Chicago, and the defendant seemed to take great interest in plaintiff's welfare. The defendant said that his parents had been very kind to his wife, and advised the plaintiff to come to South Africa, where the climate was good, and where there was a better prospect of success. He proposed to give him £6 a week as traveller in Cape Town, and plaintiff accepted his proposal. The plaintiff distinctly specified the position as town traveller. Subsequently, the defendant wrote from London, stating that he was prepared to find him employment as traveller in town, or any work he was suited for, and impressing on him the prospect of success. The defendant further added that if plaintiff could not pay his passage he would advance the amount on condition that it was repaid by instalments. Plaintiff wrote telling the defendant that he had got married, and his uncle replied that that was all the better. The defendant subsequently wrote from Austria congratulating him, and saying that there was a good opening for both of them. Plaintiff had the utmost confidence in his uncle, and immediately sold out his business. He left America on October 15, 1902, in company with his brother. Plaintiff and his brother drove up to the defendant's office, where Mr. Eilenberg asked him what kind of passage they had. Defendant then told one of the clerks to give plaintiff and his brother the addresses of his relations in Cape Town. Subsequently, they visited defendant's house, where plaintiff noticed that his uncle was very cool with them. About a week later they mentioned to him the question of work, and the defendant said that things had not come out as he expected, and referred the plaintiff and his brother to the Docks and the street cars. Plaintiff's aunt said that "beggars could not be choosers," and when he found that his uncle was not going to do anything, he took employment at £10 a month. When he told his uncle that he could not exist on £10 a month, his aunt said she did not wish to do anything for them, as their mother had been very nasty to her. He left the house, but a Kafir boy brought him back, and Mrs. Eilenberg said that if he wished to return to America, the defendant would pay his passage and give him £5. This the plaintiff refused to accept, because it was altogether too little. The last interview was at another uncle's, when the defendant, in reply to a question, said that it was for the plaintiff to find out what he (defendant) brought him to South Africa for. In Chicago he was making £5 a week, and on the business he lost £250 through selling it for £100. Had he waited, he would have got more, but through the defendant's pressure, he sold out at once. He also earned money from other sources. It took £40 to bring him to South Africa, and during his stay here, he had spent all the money he had. He estimated his entire loss at £500, and he did not think he could reinstate his business in Chicago under £500 or £600.

By De Villiers, C.J.: Witness was 24 years of age.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The terms of the conversation were in one sense embodied in the letter of March 27. The defendant in that letter did not set out what the amount to be paid him was. In the conversation defendant promised him £6 a week. His uncle distinctly offered him £6 a week as town traveller. Defendant offered his brother a similar position. His brother, he supposed, did not proceed with his action, because he had no money. He admitted that he did not mention the offer of £6 a week in his declaration. When Mr. and Mrs. Eilenberg visited Chicago, they sought out witness's mother, who was stepsister of defendant's wife. He was not at that time in a picture-frame manufactory. His business in Chicago was returning him £250 a year; he bought the business for £350, and sold it for £100. Witness based his claim upon what the defendant promised him verbally in America. He arrived in Cape Town in November, 1902. He obtained employment at Raphael's at £10 a month about a week afterwards, where he remained until March of this year, though in the meantime he had once been dismissed. Mr. Raphael took him back, because he could not get anyone else to do the work. He left Raphael because he was sick, and could not do the work. He then took a situation as a painter's labourer at £6 a month. He denied that he ever told his uncle that he would look round and get something to do. His uncle told him that things had not turned out as he expected, and said that there were lots of things in Cape Town for a young man to do—the street cars, docks, and so on. He had never demanded from his uncle that he should set him up in business. He and his brother had not been abusive towards their uncle. His uncle offered to send witness back to America. His uncle had no interest whatever in the sale of witness's business in Chicago.

Maurice Spiegel, brother of the plaintiff, said that he was present at some of the conversations between his uncle and his brother. Generally speaking, what his brother stated in evidence was correct. Witness also gave up his business in consequence of what Mr. Eilenberg had promised him. His brother's evidence with regard to the conversations in Cape Town was correct.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: Witness denied that the contents of the letter of March constituted the contract. The defendant also contracted with witness to give him £6 a week as a traveller. He was in the musical business, and sold it out for £150. It was untrue that his brother had told his uncle that he did not come to South Africa to work like a nigger.

Mr. Wilkinson closed his case.

Mr. Upington called,

Morris Eilenberg, the defendant, who said he was a merchant carrying on business in Cape Town. At the end of 1901 he went to Europe, and subsequently to America. In Chicago witness heard there were some relations of his wife. He found the two Spiegels and their mother. Mrs. Spiegel said her boys were working for a firm of picture-frame manufacturers, and she was afraid every day that the fingers of one of them would be cut off by a machine. Witness never made a contract to pay them £5 a week each as travellers. Witness knew nothing of their being in a flourishing business in Chicago. There was some mention made of Morris Spiegel making an attempt to open a small dry goods store. Witness told them they might improve their positions if they came out to the Cape. This was in reply to a question as to the prospects at the Cape. Witness promised to help them if they came out. Witness did not supply them with funds to pay their passage. Witness wrote letters on March 27, and in April, in answer to letters written by plaintiff. The brothers called on him at Cape Town in November. They did not call upon him to find them employment. David told witness he had found employment with Mr. Raphael. He saw them again in January. They came to his house on a Sunday afternoon. Morris said he would very much like to go into a picture-frame business on Sir Lowry-road. He told witness that he wanted credit to go into the business, and that if witness could support him there was a fortune in the concern. Witness told him that it was not his custom to give guarantees, but that if a few pounds were of any use he would willingly give it. Morris thereupon became very excited, and said he did not come here to work as a painter or a nigger, and would show witness what the justice of the country could do. David also joined him, and alleged that witness had brought them out to this country under false pretences. Witness said that they had no claim on him, but that he was perfectly prepared to give them their third-class fares and a few pounds in their pockets, after which he did not wish to see them again. If they had applied to witness for employment when they landed here he could probably have found them something to do. Witness had never employed a town traveller in his business, and had only recently employed a country traveller. Witness was interested at the time in a small confectionery manufactory at Woodstock, and he told David Spiegel that he might get employment there as town traveller, but that only small wages, about £8, would be paid.

Cross-examined by Mr. Wilkinson: In Chicago witness promised to do all he could for them if they came out to South Africa. All he said concerning employment as a town traveller was, as he had related, in connection with the business at Woodstock. Witness told David he would find him employment as a town traveller for this Woodstock business. When they came out, he did not find David such employment. He was never asked to do so. The Spiegels were respectable people of the working class. Witness had found hundreds of people in this country employment in the same manner as he had promised to do in respect to the Spiegels. Witness did not know of any intention on the part of the Spiegels to bring their family out.

Mr. Wilkinson having been heard in argument on the facts, without calling on Mr. Upington,

De Villiers, C.J. (after stating the facts) said: I am satisfied that no definite agreement was arrived at during the defendant's visit to Chicago. The plaintiff then consulted him as to the prospects of a young man at the Cape, and after the defendant had left Chicago the plaintiff wrote to him making further inquiries. In answer, the defendant wrote the letter of 27th March, 1902, and, if there was any binding contract at all, it must be found in the following terms: "If you care to come to Africa, I am prepared to find you employment as a traveller in town, or any such work as you may be suited for." The argument of the plaintiff's counsel has proceeded upon the assumption that there was an agreement by the defendant to find the plaintiff employment as a traveller in town, but the declaration does not allege any such agreement, nor does the evidence prove it. There can be no binding hiring of a man's services unless he is bound to render them, and unless some definite services are agreed upon; but it is admitted that the plaintiff was not bound under the alleged contract to come to South Africa, and that no definite services or salary were agreed upon. It is said, however, that even if there was no engagement of the plaintiff's services by the defendant, there was a distinct promise to find employment for the plaintiff, and that, as the defendant threw up his business at Chicago and incurred the expense of coming to South Africa, there was consideration for the promise. There would have been force in this reasoning if the plaintiff had thrown up his business and left Chicago in consequence of a request on the defendant's part; but the evidence clearly shows that it was the plaintiff's own wish to leave Chicago, and that the defendant's promise to assist him was induced by his own desire to befriend his nephew, and not by any desire that his nephew should come to South Africa. It is impossible, therefore, to believe that the defendant could have had any animus contrahendi; that is to say, an intention of entering into any agreement. Pothier (Obligations, section 3) defines a contract as "an agreement by which two parties reciprocally promise and engage, or one of them singly promises and engages to the other to give something or to do or to abstain from doing some particular act." He adds that the words "promise and engage" are used because those promises alone which are made with the intention of producing an engagement and of giving the party to whom they are made a right of demanding their performance, can amount to a contract and agreement. He proceeds to give the illustration of a father promising his son at College that if he is attentive to his studies there, he will give him money for a journey of pleasure in the vacation. "It is evident," says Pothier, "that in making this promise the father does not mean to contract what can properly be called an agreement." Under our practice, it would probably be held that the son's performance of a natural duty constituted no consideration for the father's promise. In the present case, the real question to be decided is whether the plaintiff's coming to South Africa constituted a consideration for the defendant's alleged promise to assist him on his arrival here. In my opinion, there was no connection whatever between the plaintiff's act and the defendant's promise. In the innominate contract facio ut facias the doing of a particular act by the one party is the inducement for the promise by the other party to perform his part, but the plaintiff's coming to South Africa was no inducement whatever for the defendant's promise. The plaintiff's counsel has relied upon the English case of Shadwell v. Shadwell (9 C.B., N.S. 159) as showing that a request to do a particular act for the promisee's own benefit may be implied where a person promises to pay him money upon his doing the act. In that case, it was held that the executors of a testator were bound to pay an annuity which the testator had promised to the plaintiff upon his marriage. The plaintiff was engaged to be married at the time of the promise, and yet a majority of the Court held that the marriage had taken place at the request of the testator, and was a sufficient consideration for the promise. The fact that the testator himself paid the annuity for several years may perhaps have influenced the Court, but the decision is not binding in this Court. The defendant in the present case has never recognised a legal obligation to find employment for his nephew, although he was quite willing to assist the plaintiff in finding such employment. In saying that he would be prepared to find employment for the plaintiff in case the plaintiff cared to come to South Africa, the defendant cannot be held to have conveyed a re-request, express or implied, that the plaintiff should so come. In the absence, therefore, of sufficient consideration for the defendant's alleged promise, the plaintiff is not entitled to succeed. Thus far, I have assumed that there has been a definite promise and a breach of that promise on the part of the defendant. The alleged promise, however, is so vague and indefinite as to be incapable of being enforced, and there is no evidence that the plaintiff ever called upon the defendant to find employment or would have accepted such employment when found. Upon every ground there must be absolution from the instance with costs.

GENERAL MOTION.

Ex parte HUDSON.

This was an application for an order restraining one Richard Steinbrook from selling certain property.

Mr. De Waal appeared for the applicant.

From the petition, it appeared that petitioner was one of the executors testamentary in the estate of the late B. J. Hudson. The respondent Steinbrook had rented certain two shops at Claremont belonging to the estate at a monthly rental of £14 10s., and had occupied the premises since the 1st December, 1902, since when he had paid no rent, notwithstanding that repeated applications had been made to him therefor. Steinbrook was now indebted to the estate in the sum of £87. Petitioner had been informed, and believed, that Steinbrook was about to sell the assets of his business by public auction, and petitioner now asked for an interdict restraining such sale until the rent had been paid or until action for the same had been instituted.

A rule was granted calling on respondent to show cause on the 12th June why an interdict should not be granted as prayed, pending action, the rule to operate as an interdict in the meantime.

PORT ELIZABETH TOWN COUNCIL v. RIGG. } 1903. June 4th.

Sale—Re-sale—Lex commissoria.

In 1860 the Town Council of P. sold two lots of land to G. on conditions (among others) that on failure by the purchaser to pay any instalment of the price within a certain time the vendors should be at liberty to re-sell the lots at the expense and risk of the purchaser. G. took occupation of the lots and paid the municipal rates thereon, but he failed to pay some of the promissory notes given by him in payment of the price. He sold the lots to the respondent, who for a time paid the rates, and was recognized by the vendors as the owner, but no transfer was ever passed. The respondent, after a few years, left P. and ceased to pay rates. The Town Council, forty years after failure of G. to pay the promissory notes, applied for an order cancelling the sale on the ground that the purchase price had not been paid in terms of the conditions of sale, and the respondent tendered to pay the price still owing and interest due thereon.

Held, that until re-sale by the applicants in terms of the conditions the respondent was entitled to tender the price and interest, and thus prevent any re-sale or cancellation of the sale.

This was an application to make final a rule nisi which was granted by the Court on the 18th March, and which had been duly published. The original petition alleged that the petitioners were owners of certain two lots of ground, numbered 58 and 60, situated in Middle-street, Port Elizabeth. These lots were sold on the 13th June, 1860, to one C. Green, who gave four promissory notes for the amount of the purchase price. Three of these notes were duly paid, but the fourth was never paid, nor had the rates on the property been paid by Green. On portion of these lots a Congregational Church had been built, and the Town Council wished to make transfer of the land to the church trustees, but were unable to do so, as the property was not registered in the name of the Council. The petitioners prayed that the Court would grant an order allowing the sale of the lots, by reason of the said Green not having paid the purchase price, and interest, or rates for the last forty years.

The respondent, Christopher P. Rigg, made affidavit, in which he stated that he was the sole surviving partner in the late firm of W. and C. Rigg, law agents, etc., of Port Elizabeth. One of the partners in 1876 purchased the two lots in question from Green, and an entry appeared in the firm's books showing a purchase for the sum of £25. Deponent could not say why the ground had not been transferred to Rigg, excepting that it was perhaps owing to the disappearance of Green. The property was shown in the name of W. C. Rigg on the Divisional Council roll in 1876, and rates were marked as having been paid from 1881 to 1886. In 1881 the property was registered in the Port Elizabeth Municipal roll in the name of W. C. Rigg, and the rates for that year were marked as having been paid. Respondent had not visited Port Elizabeth for the last fourteen or fifteen years, and had overlooked the fact that rates were due. Papers relating to the property had been destroyed by fire during the war. Respondent was willing to pay the balance due on the property by W. C. Rigg.

An affidavit made by a former rate collector was read in support of the respondent's allegations. The conditions of sale in 1860 provided that if the purchaser should fail to comply with the conditions, the property should be put up at the expense and risk of the purchaser, who must submit to any loss there might be on the re-sale.

In a replying affidavit on behalf of the petitioners, Gustavus Trollip, attorney, deposed that he had examined papers in the Master's office relating to the insolvency of Christopher Rigg, who became insolvent in 1881. On referring to the insolvent's schedule, he found it was therein stated that there was no immovable property belonging to the insolvent, while no immovable property was brought up in his account.

Mr. Russell for the applicants; Mr. McGregor for the respondent.

Mr. McGregor: The facts in this case have become somewhat complicated; the rates on this property having been paid by the Municipal Council.

[De Villiers, C.J.: Has transfer of the property been passed?]

No, but in paragraph 6 of our affidavit it is clearly set out that the Town Council have lain by for 44 years, and they surely cannot now come forward and deprive us of our rights. These people are mala fide. There is clearly a contract between ourselves and them, and if the money agreed upon has not been paid over that is no ground for the cancellation of the contract. See Pothier on Sales (Sections 450 and 455). Here the Divisional Council have our name in their books from 1876 to 1890 and from 1890 to 1903. The Church has held the property from 1896 to 1902. This case is not on all fours with that of White Bros. v. The Treasurer-General (2 Juta, 322; see especially the judgment at p. 326). We cannot be accused of lying by, for we asserted our rights and paid three instalments (more than half the entire purchase price of the property) in 1884.

[De Villiers, C.J.: But have you not lost your rights?]

My whole argument is that we cannot lose our rights; but if the Court finds that we have lost our rights to the property, surely the £29 we have paid for it should be refunded to us. We tender arrears and interest, and I submit are entitled to the property.

Mr. Russell (for applicants): The respondent has not shown any right to this property, and on the insolvency of this very man he denied that he had any immoveable property. Section 8 of the original contract provides that should the rates not be paid, the Town Council could put up the property for sale. Green had no jus in rem but only a jus in personam in respect of the £29, and a purchaser could have no greater right than that which he derived from the vendor. The property was re-vested in the Council, and all Green can claim is £29 8s. The entries on the Town Council roll are not acknowledgments of ownership, and I submit that the respondent has failed to show cause why the rule should not be made absolute.

[De Villiers, C.J., referred Mr. McGregor to Voet (18, 3, 4)].

Mr. McGregor (in reply): The Town Council had no power to sell unless we had refused to pay the rates. We are quite prepared to pay them; in fact, we have actually tendered them. The law does not order a forfeiture for non-payment of rates; and therefore all the Council can now do is to claim that payment which we have already tendered. This debt was a partnership debt, and any partner had a right to collect it. See Story on Partnership (p. 430 of 4th edit.).

De Villiers, C.J.: The sale in question took place as far back as the 13th of June, 1860. The lots were sold to Green, who gave promissory notes for the purchase price, and was recognised as the owner, although transfer was not passed in his favour. He paid rates to the applicants, and after he had sold the lots to the respondent the latter was recognised as the owner, and the rates were received from him. The respondent, however, left Port Elizabeth, and as no one was left in occupation of the lots the applicants allowed the Congregational Union to build a church upon the property, saying in effect, however, that the Union would do so at its own risk. The applicants now apply to have the sale to Green cancelled, on the ground, apparently, that the full purchase price has not been paid in terms of the conditions of sale, to which I shall presently refer. Any decision upon this application will, of course, not affect the rights of the Union, which will have to be considered quite independently of the rights inter se of the applicants and respondent. The 8th condition of sale reads as follows: "Should it happen that the purchaser shall fail to furnish promissory notes or fail to pay the same when due, or otherwise fail to comply with the conditions, the property will again be put up at his expense and risk, and he shall submit to any loss at the renewed sale without benefiting by any eventual profit thereof." The promissory notes must have fallen due more than forty years ago, and no advantage was taken of the 8th condition, and now, after all that lapse of time, the plaintiff asks the Court to cancel the sale on the ground of the non-payment of some of the promissory notes. During the course of the argument, reference has been made to Pothier, who states that according to the French law, the intervention of the Court is necessary to enable a vendor to take advantage of the so-called commissory pact, and that if the vendor is prepared to pay the price and interest thereon, the Court would not enforce the pact in favour of the vendor. If Pothier refers to the lex commissoria, then it is by no means clear that the Dutch law agreed with the old law of France. The lex commissoria is a pact or agreement annexed to a sale that if the price should not be paid within a certain time, the thing should be unbought (ut, nisi certo tempore pretium solvatur, res inemta sit. Voet 18, 3. 1). In the case of such a pact, Voet (18, 3, 4) declares that the lex takes effect by the mere effluxion of time, and that an interpellation is not necessary in order to constitute the purchaser in default. It is clear, however, that even under the Dutch law the vendor is bound immediately on the expiration of the appointed time to declare whether he will avail himself of the pact, and that, if he has once waived his right to do so, he cannot afterwards claim that the property shall be regarded as unsold (Voet, 18, 3, 2). There could not be a stronger proof of waiver of the vendor's right than the delay of forty years which took place in enforcing the applicants' right, if they had any, to treat the sale as if it had never been effected. But in truth the 8th condition of sale is not a commissory pact at all, for there is no agreement that the lots should be regarded as unsold on non-payment of the promissory notes. The agreement embodied in the 8th condition is that on failure of the purchaser to pay the promissory notes when due, the vendor should be at liberty to sell the lots at the expense and risk of the purchaser. The sale remains in force, and the vendor has no right to vindicate the property as his, but he is in the position of a person holding a power, coupled with an interest, to sell the lots on behalf of the purchaser. In the case of the pactum retrovendendo, where the agreement is that the vendor shall be allowed within a certain time to receive back the thing sold on restoring the price, the action by vindicatio is not allowed to the vendor, but he has only a personal action against the purchaser to carry out the re-sale. It would seem a fortiori in a case like the present that the vendors are not entitled to take up the position that the property has reverted to them in consequence of the non-payment of the promissory notes. It is not necessary to decide whether after this lapse of time the applicants could avail themselves of the 8th condition and sell the lots again, but the Court is satisfied that unless and until the right of re-sale was actually exercised, the purchaser was entitled, by tendering the price and interest, to prevent any such re-sale. Such a tender has been made by the respondent, but the applicants claim the right to have the sale cancelled altogether. They are clearly not entitled to succeed, and the rule must be discharged with costs.

SUPREME COURT

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

TRIAL CAUSES.

DOMINGO v. TONKIN. { 1903. June 8th.

This was an action for work done, in which Mr. Benjamin appeared for the plaintiff and Mr. C. W. de Villiers was for the defendant.

Mr. De Villiers said he regretted to have to inform the Court that the defendant, who lived at the Paarl, had not arrived yet, and it would be impossible for him (counsel) to go on in the defendant's absence. He did not know why his client had not put in an appearance; it was possible that he might have missed his train. He was afraid that the onus was upon him, as they admitted the plaintiff's claim, but they pleaded certain set-offs against that claim. Counsel asked the indulgence of the Court for the postponement of the case until later in the day.

Mr. Benjamin did not think his learned friend had given any satisfactory explanation why his client was not present. All plaintiff's witnesses had arrived by the train that morning.

[Maasdorp, J., asked for particulars as to the case.]

Mr Benjamin said that the action was brought to recover £50 18s. 9d., being £20 unpaid balance on a contract, and £30 18s. 9d. extras. The plaintiff entered into a contract to erect a certain building for £595, and only £575 had been paid. Both portions of the claim were admitted. The defendant, however, set off against the claim £4, the price of certain bricks supplied by the defendant. He also claimed £1 for alleged damage to a fence, but this had now been abandoned. He further claimed £2 10s. 6d. overpaid; this plaintiff admitted. The case really came down to this: the defendant filed a set-off for £4 for certain bricks, and £13 7s. 10d., which was said to have been lent to the plaintiff. Defendant also claimed in reconvention the sum of £49, on account of alleged delay in the completion of contracts, in the one case 28 days, and in the other 21 days. Tonkin said it was agreed by the terms of the contracts that the plaintiff should pay £1 per day for every day beyond the time specified for the completion of contract. With regard to that, the plaintiff stated that the delay was caused in completing the contracts by alterations and additions that were made to the contract during the time of the performance. The defendant, in reconvention, said that the bricks were used in place of his own for the erection of a certain w.c., which was extra work. He repudiated the alleged loan, and as to the alleged delay in the completion of the contract, he said it was consequent on alterations ordered by Tonkin after the contract had been completed.

The case was ordered to stand over until later in the day.

On the Court re-assembling, Mr. De Villiers applied for a postponement of the case, and put in an affidavit of the defendant's attorneys to the effect that a telegram had been received from the defendant at the Paarl instructing them to apply for a postponement, owing to two material witnesses being unable to travel through illness.

Mr. Benjamin offered to put the plaintiff's attorney in the box to swear that the defendant had been seen at the Paarl the previous night.

The case was allowed to stand over until to-morrow (Tuesday), the defendant to pay the costs of the day.

GENERAL MOTIONS.

BOLTKER V. ASHBURNE AND OTHERS. { 1903. June 8th.

Mr. De Waal moved for a rule to be made absolute restraining the respondents from proceeding with the erection of a certain fence until the arbitrators had given their award.

Order granted as prayed.

MDLANKOMO V. MDLANKOMO.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for leave to sue in forma pauperis for divorce. Mr. Benjamin had certified in the matter.

Rule granted, to be returnable on the 12th July.

ATKIN AND PECK V. DALTON AND REID.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for leave to sign judgment against plaintiffs on the ground of their failure to file their declaration within the time specified by rules of Court.

Judgment accordingly, with costs.

WEPENER V. WEPENER AND ANOTHER.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence of plaintiff and another witness in the divorce suit brought by plaintiff against his wife on the ground of adultery. Petitioner said he was a poor man, and could not afford to attend in Cape Town, and he prayed that a commission should take his evidence in the district of Aliwal North, and also that of a witness in the district of Elliott.

Mr. Justice Maasdorp thought it would be more satisfactory if this case were dealt with in the Circuit Court, but

Mr. De Villiers pointed out that the Circuit Court would not sit probably for another six months.

Commission granted, directing the evidence of the petitioner to be taken before the R.M. of Aliwal North, and that of his witness before the R.M. of Elliott.

DOMAN AND LEWIS V. THE MASTER. { 1903. June 8th. „ 9th.

Will—Codicil—Beneficiary interest—Sec. 4 of Act 22 of 1876.

A testator had by will appointed I. P. and A. D. to be her executors and A. D. to be the guardian of her minor children. By a subsequent codicil the testator revoked the appointment of I. P. and appointed A. L. to act with A. D. in his stead. This codicil was witnessed by A. D.

Held, that as the will and the codicil must be treated as two distinct instruments, the fact that A. D. had attested the codicil did not invalidate his appointment as executor and guardian under the will and that Sec. 4 of Act. 22 of 1876 did not apply.

This was a motion for an order directing the Master to issue letters of administration to the applicants and letters of confirmation as guardian of the minor children of the testator to the first applicant.

The Acting Master relied for his refusal on the terms of Section 4 of Act 22 of 1876.

The affidavit of Andries Johannes Jacob Dorman was as follows:

Deponent makes oath and says:

1. That by the last will and testament of the late Francina Dorothea Johanna Perold (born Enslin), widow of the late Josua Francois P. Perold, bearing date 11th of November, 1901, to a copy which hereunto annexed to which I crave leave to refer this Honourable Court, Isaac Abraham Periold and myself were appointed executors of the will of the said late Francina D. J. Perold and administrators of her estate.

2. That by the said last will and testament the said Francina D. J. Perold appointed me guardian of her minor children.

3. That thereafter, on 15 March, 1902, the said Francina D. J. Perold, by a codicil, copy whereof is annexed hereunto, and to which I crave leave to refer, cancelled and revoked the appointment of the said Isaac A. Perold as one of the executors of her last will and testament, and appointed Alexander John Lewis as joint executor with myself of her said last will and testament.

4. That the said Alexander J. Lewis and myself have made application to the respondent for issue to us of letters of administration as executors under the last will and testament of the late Francina D. J. Perold, and that I have made application to the respondent for issue to me of letters of confirmation as guardian of the minor children of the said late Francina D. J. Perold, but that the respondent has neglected and refused to issue to the said Alexander J. Lewis and myself such letters of administration as executors of the last will and testament of the said late Francina D. J. Perold, and has neglected and refused to issue to me such letters of confirmation as guardian of the minor children of the said late Francina D. J. Perold.

After various bequests, the will proceeds:

"I nominate and appoint my son Isaac Abraham Perold and Andries J. J. Doman to be the executors of this my will and administrators of my estate, and I nominate and appoint Andriese J. J. Doman to be guardian of my minor children."

Witnesses:

Maria Adams.

A. J. Lewis.

In a subsequent codicil, the testator says:

"I now concel the appointment of my son Isaac A. Perold as one of the executors of my will, and appoint Alexander John Lewis to be joint executor with Andries J. J. Doman in the place of my son Isaac A. Perold."

Witness:

A. J. Doman.

Mr. Close (for applicant): The whole question is whether the executor can be appointed after his son has signed the codicil as a witness.

The Master: The question is whether the Master would be justified in granting letters of administration under the circumstances.

Mr. Close: I anticipated that the Master would take his stand on Sec. 44 of Act 22 of 1876, but see Sec. 3 as to witnesses who are beneficiares. In the English Act there is a clause corresponding to our Sec. 3 of Act 22 of 1876.

[Kotze, J.: How do you get over Sec. 4?]

See Jarmen on Wills (Sec. 15—Vol. 1, p. 72). The English Act has nothing corresponding to our Sec. 4, though it has something corresponding to our Sec. 3. A witness to the codicil does not forfeit his right to a legacy under a will, see Gurney v. Gurney (3 Juta 208). Mr. Lewis has no interest under the codicil, and therefore cannot be debarred from acting.

The Master: These two witnesses have received benefits, and are therefore not impartial witnesses.

Postea (June 9th).

Maasdorp, J.: It appears in this matter that the testatrix, Francina Perold, executed her will on the 11th November, 1901, and in it appointed Isaac Perold and Andries Doman executors, and she appointed the latter guardian of her minor children. The will was attested by Maria Adams and A. J. Lewis. Thereafter, on the 15th March, 1902, she executed a codicil whereby she cancelled the appointment of Isaac Perold as one of the executors, and appointed A. J. Lewis to be joint executor with Andries Doman. This codicil was attested by Andries Doman and D. Doman, of Lewis and Doman, who have applied to the Master for letters of administration as executors, and the latter has also applied for confirmation of his appointment as guardian. The Master has refused these applications, on the ground that Lewis and Doman have attested a will, or other testamentary instrument, whereunder they are appointed executors and guardians, and that, under section 4 of Act 22 of 1876, such appointments are null and void. The Master has treated the will and codicil as constituting one document or instrument, and consequently is of opinion that the witnesses to either are witnesses to the other also. I do not think the section should be so construed. The codicil is a distinct and separate instrument from the will. The one may be invalid, whilst the other remains in full force. The execution of the will and that of the codicil are entirely distinct acts. The section in question enacts that if any person has attested the execution of a testamentary instrument, and is thereunder appointed executor, such appointment shall be null and void. In this case Lewis attested the execution of the will, and is not thereunder appointed executor. Doman attested the execution of the codicil, and is not thereunder appointed executor, or guardian. Each is appointed under an instrument, the execution of which he did not attest. In the case of Gurney v. Gurney, cited at the bar, in Drewry's Reports, 3, page 208, the Court held, under a section similar to the third section of our Act, that the word "thereby" must be construed to mean the same testamentary instrument which is attested, and that, consequently, a legacy by a will is not void because the legatee attests a codicil which gives him nothing. In the section in question the word "thereunder" must be construed in the same way as the word "thereby" in Gurney's case. In this case also each of the attesting parties attested an instrument which gave him nothing. I am of opinion that the appointment of the applicants as executors and guardians is good, and they are entitled to letters of administration and confirmation of the guardianship. The order prayed for will therefore, be granted, costs to come out of the estate.

Kotze, J.: So far as I am aware, there is no reported decision in this Court precisely bearing on the present question. It seems to me, however, that on the authority of Gurney v. Gurney (2 Drewry, p. 208), the fact that Doman is a witness to the subsequent codicil does not invalidate his appointment as executor and guardian under the prior will. In the same way, the appointment of J. A. Lewis by the subsequent codicil is not affected by the fact of his being a witness to the will. The codicil and will are to be regarded as separate instruments, made at different times, although executed by the same testatrix, and relating to the same estate. Neither Doman nor Lewis takes any benefit, or receives any appointment as executor or tutor by the separate instrument, which each of them has witnessed. Section 4 of Act 22 of 1876 does not apply, and the application for letters of administration to be issued to Doman and Lewis, and for letters of confirmation as testamentary guardian to be issued to Doman should therefore be granted.

BARLOW V. BARLOW. } 1903. June 8th.

Mr. Alexander moved for leave to sue for divorce by edictal citation. The rule granting leave to the plaintiff to sue in forma pauperis had been made absolute, and the return day had been extended from 1st May till the 22nd May. The original petition had been presented at Oudtshoorn. The petition set forth that there were seven children issue of the marriage, and the respondent had been living in adultery with a woman at Johannesburg for a number of years.

Leave granted as prayed, the return day being fixed for the 12th July.

Ex parte THE EXECUTORS IN THE ESTATE OF THE LATE JOHN ANDRIES MEYER.

Mr. Close moved for an order authorising the removal of one Hendrik Jeremias Meyer from executorship. It was deposed that when the rule nisi was served on respondent, he said: "I am satisfied to be removed, as my head will not allow me to think or do anything."

The application was granted, costs to be paid out of the estate.

DAY V. DAY.

This was an application for leave to sue by edictal citation.

Mr. Buchanan, who appeared for the applicant, David S. Day, said the matter had been before the Court before. The application was made in connection with an intended action for restitution of conjugal rights, failing which for divorce. When the case was originally before the Court it was ordered to stand over pending further proof of applicant's domicile. Applicant now deposed that he had resided in the division of Victoria West for the last year, and intended to remain there for some time. He had requested his wife, who was at Durban, Natal, to return to him at his present domicile, but she had refused to do so.

Leave was granted to sue by edictal citation, personal service to be effected and the return day being fixed for the 12th July. Leave was also granted to serve intendit and notice of trial with the citation.

Ex parte THE EXECUTORS IN THE ESTATE OF SWANEPOEL.

On the motion of Mr. Close, the rule nisi granted by the Court in this case was made absolute. The application was for the amendment of certain letters of administration.

CAPE TOWN COUNCIL V. CAPE GOVERNMENT RAILWAYS.

Mr. Close moved for an award of the arbitrators to be made a rule of Court.

In the notice of motion application was made for interest on capital sums, such interest not being included in the award.

An affidavit was made by Mr. Reid, attorney for the Government, in which he objected to the motion being granted as concerned the interest.

Mr. Close said he would abandon that part of the petition, and would simply ask that the award be made a rule of Court.

The Court ordered the matter to stand over until to-morrow (Tuesday) morning, in order that the Government attorneys might be communicated with.

BOBBINS V. LE ROUX.

This was an application on notice of motion calling upon the respondent to show cause on the 22nd May why an order should not be granted compelling him forthwith to remove certain building and other material deposited by him in a certain lane, the property of the applicant, situated in the Camp Ground, Rondebosch, and for an interdict restraining him from using the lane as a right of way, and from trespassing thereon in future. The affidavit of Sarah Bobbins, the applicant, stated that she was the owner of certain property bounded on the north by land belonging to the respondent. Immediately adjoining the property of the respondent there was a private lane within applicant's boundary, being her property. Counsel pointed out that, as a matter of fact, this allegation was not correct, but by her deed of transfer applicant had free and uncontrolled right to the use of the lane. It was not, however, included in her property. The affidavit went on to state that in connection with certain building operations, respondent, or his servants, or contractors, had been using this lane, and had deposited building and other material there, causing an obstruction whereby great inconvenience was caused to the petitioner. The affidavit of J. P. Murphy, conveyancer, stated that he had made a search through the deeds relating to the respondent's property, and had found that on a transfer to respondent's predecessor, dated 16th November, 1886, the following special condition was endorsed: "That the present and future owners of the property hereby transferred shall not have any right of way over or be allowed to make any use of the private road running along the southern boundary of the property, nor shall they be allowed to cut a way or in any way interfere with the row of oak trees situated on the southern boundary of the said property." This condition had never been cancelled or withdrawn. John H. Scholtz deposed as to the obstruction.

The affidavit of Carl H. le Roux, the respondent, stated that prior to his purchasing the property, he had rented it, and had resided there in all twelve years, during which period he had used this lane. He had removed some of the material, and had issued instructions to the contractor to have the rest removed. Applicant had been caused no inconvenience by the material having been left there. Deponent had been informed by several old residents that he had a right to the use of the lane, and that the matter had been previously before the Court, at the suit of other persons. Since notice of the application had been given he had not had time to get this evidence. Counsel said that this affidavit was made before the 22nd May, when the matter was first put down for hearing, and was made with a view to an application for postponement. He had not received further instructions in the matter.

Mr. Upington for applicant. Mr. C. W. de Villiers for respondent.

Mr. Upington asked leave to refer to the papers in the case of Bobbins v. Hills, which arose out of the same matter, and in connection with which an affidavit was made attaching the title deed of the applicant. Counsel then referred to the title deed, which showed that the applicant was forever entitled to have the free and uncontrolled right and use of the lane in question.

Maasdorp, J. said he thought the information was insufficient. The applicant's affidavit did not disclose any bar to the use of the lane by respondent. The applicant referred to an agreement between the respondent and another party, but she could not avail herself of that agreement unless she were privy to it.

The case was ordered to stand over.

MUMFORD V. MUMFORD. { 1903. June 8th.

Mr. Alexander, for the applicant (Charles Herbert Mumford), who is the defendant in an action brought by his wife, Ada Mumford, for maintenance, applied for the appointment of a commission to take the evidence of defendant's witnesses in the Transvaal.

The applicant's affidavit set forth that he was in too poor circumstances to bring witnesses from the Transvaal.

Mr. Close (for the respondent) put in her affidavit, in which she stated that the applicant had not supported her for five years, and that his attempt at a postponement was merely in order to delay the payment of maintenance. As manager of the Field Force Canteens in Waterkant-street, the applicant had been earning £80 per month, and for two years he had been living with another woman. By a private deed of separation, the applicant was to pay £20 per month to the respondent, and the action which was standing over was brought for a recovery of arrears of maintenance.

An answering affidavit by the applicant denied that he had received a salary of £80 per month, or that he had been living with any other woman.

Counsel having been heard in argument,

Maasdorp, J.: The defendant in this case makes application to take evidence of his witnesses, who are supposed to reside in the Transvaal. There is no mention in the affidavit of the witness whom the defendant proposes to bring before the commissioner. This is merely a vague statement that in the plea to the plaintiff's claim the defendant has set up a defence of adultery. In that plea no time is fixed when the adultery was committed, no place is stated where it took place, and it is impossible for the Court to grant a commission for the examination of witnesses upon facts of which the particulars have in no way been brought to the notice of the opposite party. A good deal more information is required in reference to the alleged adultery committed by the plaintiff in this case before the Court can entertain an application for a commission of this nature, and upon that ground the Court will refuse the application upon the affidavit as it now stands, with costs. If the applicant is in a position to put further information before the Court he may apply again. There is a further application for a postponement of the case, and for the same reason the Court would have refused the application of the applicant for the postponement of his case to any lengthy date, but it appears there is no date available upon which this case can be heard out of the term, and upon that ground the Court will order that the case shall stand over until some day next term upon which the applicant can set the case down. The application must be refused, with costs.

Kotze, J., concurred.

REVIEW CASE.

REX V. SAVAGE AND ANOTHER. { 1903. June 8th.

Implements of housebreaking—Section 8, Sub-section 1, Part I, Police Offences Act, 1882.

An accused found walking at night in a public street in company with another person in whose pocket two skeleton keys were found, and overheard to say to such person, "if we had a jemmy with us we might have lifted the sash."

Held, not to be in possession of implements of housebreaking.

Kotze, J.: During the week a case came before me in which two persons were charged with a contravention of section 8, paragraph 1, of the Police Offences Act, and the charge against them is that they were found in possession, without lawful excuse, of housebreaking implements on a certain night, the 26th May. Two constables watched the two accused, named Savage and Swift, in the neighbourhood of Roeland-street during the dead of night. When passing along the street, Swift was overheard saying, "If we had had a jemmy with us, we might have lifted the sash." Thereupon the two policemen rushed forward and arrested the two men. Two skeleton keys were found on Savage, but nothing was found on Swift. Savage pleaded guilty to the charge, and Swift pleaded not guilty. Each was sentenced to six months' imprisonment, with hard labour. Under the circumstances, there is certainly a very great amount of suspicion through Swift being in the company of this man called Savage, but there is no evidence to show they were out to commit anything unlawful, or had actually done so, or that they were out to commit any act of burglary. We do not know what led up to or caused the remark made by Swift, nor to what occasion it referred. Although there is a great amount of suspicion against Swift, I think the case stops there. It would be rather a strained inference to hold that Swift must have known or did know that Savage had skeleton keys in his pocket. The evidence fails to my mind in that respect, and the conviction therefore against Swift must be set aside. The conviction of Savage will, of course, stand.

ORPEN V. CILLIERS. { 1903. June 8th. „ 9th.

Election petition—Signature of agent—Act 9 of 1883.

The language of Section 4, Sub-section 1 of Act 9 of 1883, is peremptory. Where, therefore, an election petition was signed by the agents of the petitioner and not by the petitioner personally.

Held, that the petition was invalid.

This was an application arising out of a recent election of a member of Assembly for the Division of Prieska, as a result of which respondent was returned as member for the Parliamentary division, being the candidate for whom the majority of votes were returned to have been given.

The petition of Redmond N. M. Orpen, of St. Clair, Douglas, in the Division of Herbert, was as follows:

1. Your petitioner was a candidate at the election of a member to represent the Electoral Division of Prieska in the House of Assembly consequent upon the retirement of the Rev. Christian W. H. Schrader.

2. Your petitioner is a registered voter, and was duly nominated at the Court or meeting convened and held according to law on the 20th February, 1903.

3. At the said Court there was also nominated Petrus S. Cilliers, and a poll having been demanded, the 28th of March, 1903, was duly fixed for the taking thereof.

4. By Proclamation 119 of 1903, appearing in the Government Gazette of the 10th April, 1903, the return of the returning officer was reported as follows:

Petrus S. Cilliers, 222 votes,

Redmond N. M. Orpen, 215 votes; and the said P. S. Ciliers was accordingly declared the candidate to whom the majority of votes had been given, the duly elected member of the House of Assembly for the Electoral Division of Prieska.

5. Your petitioner has been informed that one Robert G. Hedley, on 23rd of April, 1903, lodged a petition with the Registrar of this Honourable Court, challenging the qualification of the said P. S. Cilliers to be returned, and to retain the seat aforesaid, alleging that he held certain offices of profit under the Crown which vacated his election and seat.

6. Your petitioner has further been informed that on 11th of May, 1903, a further and supplementary petition was lodged by the said R. G. Hedley, alleging that certain disfranchised persons had voted, and asking for a scrutiny and recounting of the votes, in order to have it determined whether the said P. S. Cilliers was legally and properly returned.

7. Your petitioner has instructed his representatives in Cape Town to make enquiries, and to inspect the marked copies of the list of persons entitled to vote, kept by the presiding officer at the various polling stations, with a view to the lodging of a petition asking for a scrutiny and the claiming of the seat.

8. Your petitioner's representatives have discovered that the marked copies of the list of voters belonging to the stations undermentioned are not available for inspection at the Colonial Office, viz.: In the fiscal division of Kenhardt, Ward 6, field-cornetcy Zeekoe, polling station Bland Guand South. In the fiscal division of Gordonia, Ward 3, polling station Keimoes. In the same fiscal division, Ward 7, polling station Rietfontein, making three marked registers that are missing.

9. Apart from the names mentioned in the schedule attached to the supplementary petition filed by the said R. G. Hedley, your petitioner has been informed that votes have been recorded on the name of voter No. 1,258 at two places, viz., at Upington and Kenhardt, and also on the name of voter No. 960, who voted at Onbeep and Koppiesvlei, and further, that voter No. 201, who is reported to have been convicted of treason, is stated to have recorded his vote at Keimoes, one of the stations for which the marked copy of the register is not available for inspection.

10. Your petitioner has received a communication, written from Keimoes, in which there appears the folowing remark: "If any names are required for petition, send here, you will get a lot." Your petitioner's representatives are desirous of inspecting the marked registers relating to Keimoes and the other two polling stations before concluding the schedule of objections.

11. Your petitioner's representatives have applied to the Colonial Secretary for access to these three marked copies of the registers, and are informed that telegraphic enquiries are being made in regard thereto.

12. On investigation of the marked copies of the registers available at the Colonial Office, it appears that crosses in red ink have been placed opposite to the names of a number of persons who were convicted of treason and other political offences, and disfranchised, but there are many names of convicted persons that are not so marked; and it is desirable that the three missing marked registers be inspected, to see if any of the convicted persons whose names have not been asterisked, recorded their votes.

13. Your petitioner has caused the said R. G. Hedley to be approached, and it has been arranged (subject to the confirmation of this honourable Court), that the supplementary petition, filed on the 11th of May at the instance of the said Hedley, be withdrawn, and that in lieu thereof this petition be substituted.

14. Your petitioner annexes hereto a schedule setting forth the result of the investigations up to date, which are, however, incomplete owing to the absence of the marked copies of the registers, and your petitioner apprehends that it will not be practicable to go to trial on the 11th of June, 1903.

15. Your petitioner is informed that at the counting of the votes, the returning officer discarded twenty ballot papers, six of which are returned as having been rejected for bearing a mark identifying the voter, and fourteen alleged to be void for uncertainty.

16. Your petitioner is desirous of having the decision of the returning officer on these rejected ballot papers brought under review before this Honourable Court, and in order to enable him to set forth his claim and include them in the schedule, it is necessary to obtain access to the rejected ballot papers at an early date.

17. Your petitioner has telegraphed to his attorneys in Cape Town, requesting them to lodge a petition on his behalf claiming a scrutiny of the votes recorded at the recent election at Prieska, and also claiming the seat, and has at the same time advised them that the usual warrant authorising proceedings in the Supreme Court has been posted.

18. Wherefore your petitioner pray: that it may please your Lordships:

(a) To allow the supplementary petition filed by the said R. G. Hedley on 11th of May to be withdrawn, with a view to preventing a multiplicity of claimants.

(b) To fix another date for the hearing of this petition, other than 11th of June, 1903, leaving that date available for the determination of the questions raised by the said Hedley in the petition lodged by him on the 23rd April

(c) To make an order allowing your petitioner's representatives access to the rejected ballot papers, in order to enable them to insert in the schedule annexed to this petition the rejected votes claimed on behalf of your petitioner.

(d) To allow your petitioner to supplement the schedule annexed to this petition when the missing copies of the marked registers shall have been available for inspection.

(e) To hold an enquiry into the votes rendered, and upon a searching thereof and of the rejected ballot papers, to award to your petitioner the seat as member of the House of Assembly for the Electoral Division of Prieska.

(Sgd.) VAN ZYL & BUISSINE,
Attorneys for R. W. M. Orpen.

There was an affidavit sworn to by Cyril Alexander Owen-Lewis, stating that he had been in telegraphic communication with the petitioner and his agents and representatives, and that to the best of his knowledge and belief the allegations set forth in the foregoing petition were true and correct.

The schedule referred to in the aforegoing petition stated that three voters (Nos. 201, 363, and 871) whose votes had been recorded had been convicted of treason, and that Nos. 691, 960, 1258, 1290, and 1403 had recorded votes at both of two places.

The original petition of Robert George Hedley (supported by affidavit sworn April 23rd, 1903), stated inter alia that in the Government Gazette of April 10th, 1903, Petrus Stephanus Cilliers had been gazetted as the elected member for the House of Assembly for the division of Prieska, but that inasmuch as the said P. S. Cilliers held divers offices of profit under the Crown, the petitioner said he was disqualified from being returned as a member of the Legislative Assembly, and the petitioner therefore, in accordance with the provisions of Act 9 of 1883 complained of the return of the said P. S. Cilliers, and prayed that the said return might be set aside as null and void, and that the seat might be declared vacant.

In a supplementary petition supported by affidavit sworn to May 9th, 1903, the said R. G. Hedley further disputed the validity of the aforesaid return, on the ground that sundry persons who had been disfranchised for political offences had recorded their votes at the Prieska election.

The affidavit of Stephanus Z. Grove, of Prieska, retired farmer, stated that at the taking of the poll for the Parliamentary election for Prieska, held in March, 1903, deponent acted as scrutineer on behalf of P. S. Cilliers. R. N. M. Orpen, personally, together with two others, acted for himself as scrutineer, and examined twenty ballot papers which had been rejected by the returning officer, and did not make or lodge any objection against the rejection of all or any of the papers so rejected.

Mr. Upington (for the applicant) said that in regard to the exception taken to the form of the petition, he submitted that, where the Act said that the petition was to be signed by the petitioner or petitioners, it meant nothing more than that the document must be signed in the same way as any other legal document. If Mr. Orpen had signed a promissory note through his attorneys, he surely would not be able to escape liability. The petitioner had ratified the acts of his agents. He submitted that, in the case of an election petition, there was no possible reason why the petitioner should sign in his own handwriting, any more than any other species of petition that was presented to the Court. He submitted it was a full and good signature within the terms of the Act. Security had been lodged by his agent, and he could not see what earthly object there could be in compelling the petitioner, who was a long way from Cape Town, to actually sign the document. As long as the signature was binding, he submitted that the provisions of the Act were fulfilled. He would apply for the withdrawal of the supplementary petition filed by Hedley on the 11th May.

Mr. Burton (for respondent) applied for postponement on ground of short service. I cannot oppose the application for an order on the Under Colonial Secretary directing him to search for these missing ballot papers—Sec. 60 of Act 9 of 1892. The envelopes containing ballot papers can be opened only by order of the Legislative Council, the House of Assembly, or a Superior Court. In 1898 some applications similar to that now before the Court were made, and then the Registrar of the Court was appointed to open the envelopes containing the marked voters' lists. I do not oppose the inspection of these lists, but I am not prepared to assent to that of the ballot papers. I should, however, wish to say a few words regarding Orpen's petition. Sec. 17 of this petition shows that it is really presented by his attorneys. It is drawn up and signed by Messrs. Van Zyl and Buissinné, but we have no information that Orpen himself signed the petition—see Sec. 4 of Act 9 of 1883. As to the presentation of an Election Petition see Sub-sec. 3 of Sec. 4, Act 9 of 1883. The petition must be signed by the petitioner, and this is no mere legal technicality. Sub-sec. 2 of Sec. 4 is of very great importance. The defeated candidate must present his petition within 42 days: so that the elected candidate may not have a petition hanging over his head indefinitely. In the present case, the very last of the 42 days expired on May 22nd, the day the so-called petition was put in by the attorneys. Then it was not signed by the petitioner. It is therefore not an Election Petition in proper form, and I submit that the Court will not go out of its way to grant any extension of time. No doubt Hedley's petition was filed in sufficient time, but its prayer is quite different from that of Orpen's. Hedley only asks that Cilliers should be declared disqualified, but Orpen claims the seat. The Act is imperative that the petition must be signed by the petitioner himself. Even if this petition be held to be in form in other respects, it is now too late for the petitioner to sign it, since the 42 days have expired.

Mr. Upington (in reply): As to the form of the petition: where the Act says it must be signed by the petitioner, nothing more is meant than that the document must be signed like any other document—that is to say, either by the principle or his agent. In this case Orpen has ratified the act of his attorneys. If the Act of 1883 is peremptory, there must be some reason for this, but there can be no reason why an election petition should be signed by the petitioner propria manu. A man's agent is always justified in signing on his behalf.

[Kotze, J.]: An agent's act is often taken to be that of his principal, particularly where the principal can ratify the agent's acts, but the question is, can he do so in the present case?]

I know of no case to show that he cannot. The only point is whether the petitioner is bound by this document signed by his agent. I submit that he is so bound. Another point to be borne in mind is that this petition comes from a very sparsely peopled district, a long way off. The only object in getting the petition signed is to bind the petitioner to the respondent as to costs, but the signature of the attorney is sufficient for that purpose.

[Kotze, J.: Suppose the Act had said "by writing under his hand"?]

That would have been ambiguous. If the petitioner had himself to sign, the Act would have said "by writing under his own hand." If a warrant had been signed when this petition was filed, it would have been quite legal.

[Maasdorp, J.: But when your petition was filed, no warrant was filled with it. No warrant has been filed even yet.]

I was not aware of that, but I would contend that with regard to Sub-sec. 2 of Sec. 4, although the petition must ordinarily be presented within 42 days, the Court has discretion even in regard to that matter. So here, if owing to no fault of his own the applicant had been prevented from presenting his petition within 42 days, Sub-sec. 2 of Sec. 4 still gives the Court power to deal with it.

Mr. Burton (in reply): As no warrant has been filed, this petition is presented without any authority as to costs, see Sections 19, 24, and 27 of the Act. This, however, is not a case of substitution, for Orpen is not substituted for Hedley.

Postea (June 9).

Maasdorp, J.: The applicant in this matter applies for an order which will enable him to obtain inspection of certain election papers connected with a contested election between him and the respondent for a seat in the Legislative Assembly, which are now in possession of the Colonial Secretary. He also moves for leave to withdraw an election petition filed by Robert Hedley against the election of the respondent, and for other matters mentioned in his petition. He claims these orders upon the ground that he, as the unsuccessful candidate, has lodged a petition in this Court against the election of the respondent, and that for the purposes of the trial of his petition he requires, and is entitled to, the inspection asked for, and other relief he seeks. The application is opposed upon the ground, amongst others, that the applicant's petition has not been duly drawn up and filed in accordance with the provisions of the 4th section of Act 9 of 1883, and that it is consequently invalid, and the applicant is not entitled to proceed further with it. The petition appears to be signed by Messrs. Van Zyl and Bussinné, a firm of attorneys, who sign as the attorneys of the applicant. The section of the Act in question provides as follows: (4) "With respect to the presentation of an election petition under the Act, the following provisions shall apply: (1) The petition shall be signed by the petitioner or all of the petitioners if more than one." This provision is very clear, and in form and time appears to be imperative. It is very often difficult to decide whether words in an Act, which are apparently imperative, may not in reality be merely directory. Maxwell, in his "Interpretation of Statutes," says that in some cases the forms prescribed by a Statute are regarded as essential, and their omission has been held fatal to the validity of the thing done, but in others they have been regarded as merely directory. He adds that the principle of regarding them as merely directory has certainly been adopted, but that its propriety has been questioned. He says further, in page 521, "Where powers and rights have been granted with direction that certain regulations and possibilities shall be complied with, it seems neither unjust nor inconvenient to exact a rigorous observance of them essential to the acquisition of the right and authority conferred, and it is therefore probable that such was the intention of the Legislature." Taking this class of cases, it seems that where a Statute confers a right, privilege, or immunity, the regulations, or forms and conditions, which it prescribes are imperative, in the sense that the non-observance of them is fatal. It seems to me the case now before us answers this description. It must be borne in mind that the presentation of petitions to the Court are of common occurrence, and if the Legislature had no special purpose in view, they might have allowed these petitions to be presented in the ordinary manner, in which case the signature of a duly-appointed attorney would have been sufficient. Instead of that, the Legislature has made this special provision for the signature of the petitioner himself. It is certain that the signature of the petitioner himself removes all difficulty and doubt which might arise as to the nature and validity of the power of attorney where an attorney might have acted. Such doubt might cause serious trouble to the parties interested in the trial of the petition. This very case is an illustration in point, when we consider what difficulty there seemed to be in the discovery and production of the power of attorney. The want of the petitioner's signature to the petition is, in my opinion, fatal to the validity of the petition presented by the applicant in this case, and he cannot proceed further with it. The application must be refused, with costs.

Kotze, J.: By Section 4 of Act 9 of 1883, it is provided that when an election petition is presented, it shall be signed by the petitioner, or all the petitioners, if more than one. These words are, I think, peremptory, and do not allow of a petition being signed by an agent on behalf of the petitioner. The intention of the Legislature, whatever its reasons may have been, must be gathered from the language which it has thought fit to employ. The Legislature has indicated how the right which it creates of presenting a petition is to be prosecuted, and has provided in what way this is to be done. It has chosen to say that the petition shall be signed by the petitioner, and this is equivalent to providing that it must be so signed. We cannot depart from the clear and exact language of the Act. I am therefore of opinion that the application should be refused, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. LE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.).]

GENERAL MOTIONS.

SAMPSON V. SAMPSON. { 1903. June 9th.

Mr. Rainsford applied on notice of motion for a decree of divorce, respondent to be declared to have forfeited the benefits of community, and to be ordered to pay the costs of suit. Counsel said that the applicant's affidavit stated that the respondent had failed to restore to her conjugal rights within the period appointed by Court.

Decree granted in terms of prayer.

BRAWN V POWRIE. { 1903. June 9th. „ 10th.

Servitudes, urban and rural—Non-user — Prescription — Right of way—Iter—Actus.

Rural servitudes are lost by non-user during the period of prescription, whereas urban servitudes, such as that of lights, are only lost by non-user if, in addition to such non-user on the part of the owner of the dominant tenement the acts of the owner of the servient tenement have been inconsistent with the existence of the servitude.

Where a person, who is entitled to a right of way for vehicles as well as for going on foot, uses the road only for going on foot, he does not on that account only lose the servitude by non-user.

Sed quaere where, although the road is used by foot passengers, it is blocked by an obstruction and trees were allowed to grow on it for the period of prescription which prevented the road from being used for vehicles?

This was an application for an order calling upon the respondent, Mrs. Herman Powrie, of Osborne Lodge, Cape Town, to remove all fencings and other obstructions on the roadway on the north side of her property, by which the applicant claimed that he was entitled to have access to Breda-street.

The affidavit of the applicant, Julius Brawn, said that he was the owner of a piece of land in Breda-street, and he had been prevented from using a roadway, 14 feet 6 inches in width which he had a right-of-way over as owner of his property. He was consequently interfered with in carrying on the building operations for which he had arranged.

The affidavit of the respondent said that the road had been used as a fowl-run. The applicant proceeded to cut down some trees on the road, which must have stood there for 40 years when he became the owner of the adjoining ground. She denied the right of the applicant to use the road, as she verily believed that the said road had not been used for thirty years by his predecessors in title. People living in the neighbourhood of Breda-street declared that, to their certain knowledge, the road had been closed for the last thirty years and more, and never opened.

Two further affidavits were also read in one of which deponent swore that, to his knowledge, the road had been closed for the last thirty years, and had never been opened to traffic, and in the other, deponent said that, to his knowledge, the road had been closed for 23 years.

The replying affidavit of Frederick Myburg, son of a former owner of the adjoining property, stated that, although the said roadway was never used for vehicular traffic by their family, they always exercised their right-of-way over it by passing backward and forward over it into Breda-street whenever they pleased. It was never used for vehicular traffic, because his father had access over another and more convenient road.

Other affidavits were also read, to the effect that the owner of the property now belonging to the applicant had a right-of-way over the road in dispute.

The affidavit of W. A. Currey, secretary of the Estate and Orphan Chamber, stated that he sold the property, Osborne Lodge, to the respondent, and he explained to her at the time that the owner of the adjoining property had a right-of-way over the road.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for applicant; Mr. Close for respondent.

Sir H. Juta said that from the documents it was clear that there was a servitude. The respondent said that a right had been acquired by prescription. The evidence, he submitted, was such as could not prevail against the clear grant that appeared to have been made to the applicant's predecessors in title.

Mr. Close submitted that the applicant had lost all right over the roadway in question owing to non-user during the period of prescription. He urged that whatever remedy the applicant had was by way of action, and that the applicant had not established a clear right to an interdict.

Sir H. Juta argued that the plaintiff's right was clearly set out in the title, and that it was for his learned friend to show that that right had been abrogated.

De Villiers, C.J., said he would like to read the affidavits over again before giving judgment.

Postea (June 10th).

De Villiers, C.J.: This is an application to compel the removal of an obstruction to a right of road claimed by the applicant over the respondent's property. The transfer to the respondent's predecessor in title, dated 14th October, 1861, reserves the right of road in favour of the applicant's land, and, therefore, unless the right has been lost in any of the modes in which a rural servitude may be lost, the respondent had no right to obstruct the road. Her case, however, is that the road has never been used as such for over thirty years, and that the applicant, who has only recently become the owner of his tenement, broke down an obstruction which had existed there for thirty years or more, and cut down three old oaks on her land, now claimed for a road. The applicant does not deny the latter statement, and I am bound to say that as the respondent was in peaceable possession, the proper course for the plaintiff was to apply to the Court in the first instance instead of taking the law into his own hands.

That a rural servitude may be lost by non-user alone on the part of the owner of the dominant tenement without any adverse act on the part of the owner of the servient tenement is a clear rule of the Dutch, as it was of the Roman law. In this respect rural servitudes differed from urban servitudes, such as the servitude of lights, which could only be lost by non-user, if, in addition to such non-user on the part of the owner of the dominant tenement, acts which are inconsistent with the existence of the servitude had for the period of prescription been done by the owner of the servient tenement (Digest, 8, 2, 6, Voet, 8, 6, 7, and 11). This distinction arises from the circumstance that urban servitudes are negative in their nature, while rural servitudes are affirmative. If no one actively uses a right of way for the period fixed by law, the right of way is destroyed, whereas a servitude of lights consists in the owner of the servient tenement not doing something, and, as justly remarked by Hunter (Roman Law, 252), "so long as that is not done the servitude is kept fully alive." It is impossible upon the affidavits in this case to arrive at a definite conclusion as to whether, for a period of thirty years, there has been such an entire cessation of the use of the road on the part of the applicant's predecessors in title as to destroy his right of way. Some of his witnesses say that although the roadway was not used for vehicular traffic, it was used for passing backwards and forwards into Breda-street. If the roadway was open, and was used by persons going to or from the applicant's land as a footway, the fact that it was not used for vehicles would not deprive the applicant of his right to use it for vehicles. Upon this point the digest citing Paulus says, Qui iter et actum habet, si statuto tempore tantum icrit, non perisse actum, sed manere, Sabinus Cassius Octavenus aiunt, and Voet cites the passage without disapproval. There is a lack of evidence, however, as to the manner in which the roadway was approached and used by foot passengers. According to some of the respondent's witnesses, the road has been closed for the last thirty years or more and never opened in the interval. According to the respondent herself, when she bought the property last year she found that the entrance had been closed up with galvanised iron, and that the road itself had been used as a fowl run. There were, she says, several oak trees on the road, which she considers to be over forty years old. If the road was kept closed for thirty years by the respondent's predecessors in title, the fact that the applicant's predecessors in title went through or over the obstruction without removing it would not necessarily prove that they used the road on foot in the exercise of their right to use the road either on foot or with vehicles. On the whole, I am of opinion that the applicant's case has not been so clearly made out as to justify the Court in giving him the relief asked for on motion. It is quite possible that the respondent may be able to prove that the obstruction to the road was placed there by her predecessors in title, and kept there for thirty years, and that the applicant's predecessors in title did not openly use the road even for going on foot, in which case the servitude could no longer be claimed. On the other hand, if the obstruction was placed there by the applicant's predecessors in title for their own protection, and if they continued to use the road, notwithstanding the obstruction, the respondent would be well advised in not incurring the expense of further litigation. As the matter stands there will be no order on this motion, but the applicant must proceed by action, the notice of motion being allowed to stand in lieu of a summons. The question of costs is reserved.

Ex parte EXECUTORS OF THE ESTATE OF THE LATE MOODIE.

Mr. Searle, K.C., on behalf of the executor testamentary, moved for the appointment of a curator ad litem to assist the heirs in the preparation of a special case to be brought before the Court to determine the construction of a certain clause in the will of the late George Pigott Moodie. Testator died in 1891, leaving a widow and four children. The said widow died in 1896. One of the children, aged about 17 years, died in 1903. The surviving children were all minors, and their guardians were resident in England. By his will the testator made certain bequests to his children, payable when they reached the age of 21 years, and the point to be determined was whether the legacy of £20,000 left to the deceased daughter devolved on her heirs, or fell into the estate along with the rest of the money.

An order was granted as prayed, Sir H. Juta being appointed curator ad litem.

CAPE TOWN TOWN COUNCIL } 1903.
V. CAPE TOWN RAILWAYS. } June 9th.

This was an application to have an award of arbitrators made a rule of Court with costs. The applicants had originally asked for interest on the capital sum of the award, and upon this the respondents had entered an appearance to oppose, but that claim was withdrawn on objection being brought to the notice of the applicants. The only question was with regard to the costs of the opposition to the application in so far as it concerned interest on the capital sum of the award.

Mr. Close for the applicants.

Mr. Searle, K.C., for the Government, said that part of the application was only withdrawn just before the matter was coming on in Court.

De Villiers, C. J., in giving judgment, said that the award would be made a rule of Court with costs, excepting the costs of opposition, which would be paid by the applicants.

ANNEAR V ANNEAR.

Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers moved on behalf of the applicant for leave to sue by edictal citation for divorce from her husband on the ground of his malicious desertion. The applicant's statement was that she was married at Johannesburg in 1890, that there were three children of the marriage, and that without lawful cause or excuse her husband deserted her in 1898, and he was now residing at Fordsburg, Transvaal, beyond the jurisdiction of this Court.

[De Villiers, C. J.: Where are they living?]

Mr. De Villiers: They used to live at the Paarl. She is now suing in forma pauperis.

De Villiers, C. J., said that the case must stand over, so that an amended petition could be presented. The particulars were too scanty; there was nothing even to show that the respondent had ever lived in this colony.

WEINTROB V. SCHAVEREIN.

This was an application to have a rule nisi granted on the 20th May made final. The respondent had on the 30th May filed certain affidavits, to which the applicant had not yet been able to reply.

Mr. Bisset for applicant; Mr. Gardiner for respondent.

Mr. Gardiner pointed out that his client was under a temporary interdict.

[De Villiers, C.J.: There has been ample time to have the replying affidavits prepared.]

Mr. Bisset said that his attorneys had been led by the other side to believe that a postponement would be applied for until the 12th June, and accordingly his attorneys had not yet prepared the affidavits. The applicant's attorneys had now sent to the Paarl, and they hoped to have the affidavits ready to-morrow (Wednesday).

Mr. Gardiner: Under these circumstances I shall not oppose.

The matter was ordered to stand over.

WIENER V. KUKARD.

This was an application against the respondent to have him declared guilty of contempt of Court. Mr. J. E. R. de Villiers appeared for the applicant, and Mr. Close was for the respondent.

Mr. De Villiers said that the respondent sold to the applicant certain property, and the latter afterwards obtained judgment against him for the transfer of the property on tender of the purchase price. On the 16th April last an application was made on notice of motion to this Court to authorise the High Sheriff to pass transfer to the applicant, seeing that the respondent had failed to pass transfer; but then, on its being mentioned that the respondent could not pass transfer, because the title deeds were in the possession of his wife, their Lordships thought it would be better to grant an order calling on him to show cause why he should not be committed for contempt unless he passed transfer before the 30th May.

Mr. Close said he appeared to show cause, and he proceeded to read the affidavit of the respondent, Christian Frederick William Kukard, who said that he was married in community, but he had been living apart from his wife during the last fifteen years. He had been the owner of certain property at King William's Town. His wife had occupied that property free of rent. Deponent sold the property on condition that the purchaser undertook to get the title deeds from his wife, as he did not wish to approach her in their strained relationships. He further agreed to accept £100, and allow her to take the remainder of the purchase price, on condition that she paid the rates and taxes due. He afterwards received a letter from Messrs. Yates and Murray, in which they stated that his wife refused to pass transfer, unless she received £150, rates and taxes to be paid by the respondent, leaving a balance due to deponent of somewhere about £55. He replied to that letter, stating that he agreed to pay the rates and taxes due, and that he would be prepared to let his wife have £125 clear in order to settle the matter. Without having had a reply to that letter, he next found that an action had been instituted against him to compel him to pass transfer. Having no means to defend the action, he was obliged to let it go by default. He was a working mason, and he had no means to institute an action against his wife to compel her to pass transfer.

Mr. De Villiers contended that the sale was unconditional, and that it lay upon the defendant to sue his wife. If he could not sue her in any other way, then he should do so in forma pauperis.

Mr. Close submitted that the applicant's remedy was to sue the wife of the respondent.

De Villiers, C. J., said that the Court would order the respondent's wife to hand over the title deeds to Messrs. Yates and Murray upon payment to her of the sum of £112 10s., less £18. He considered that there should be tender to the wife of half the purchase price, less what was bound to be paid, and that the costs of the proceedings should be paid by the respondent, who had entered into contract that he had failed to fulfi

LOGAN V. COLONIAL GOVERNMENT. { 1903. June 9th

Expropriation for railway purposes—Brick-making.

The applicant had obtained a judgment of the Supreme Court, declaring that the respondents were not entitled to use certain land save for necessary railway purposes. Against this judgment the respondents had appealed to the Privy Council. Applicant now asked for an interdict to restrain them from making bricks on the said land.

Held, that the respondents might burn the bricks already made, but that pending the judgment of the Privy Council they must be interdicted from making any further bricks.

This was an application on notice calling on the Government to show cause why the Railway Department, their contractors, and servants should not be interdicted from trespassing on part of the farm De Dries at Touws River, for the purpose of making bricks.

The affidavit of the applicant stated that in May, 1901, he obtained judgment against the Railway Department, the Supreme Court declaring that the Department was not entitled to use land at Touws River for other than necessary railway purposes. An appeal had been noted, and was down for hearing on the 21st inst. While away in Scotland, the applicant was asked by the Railway Department for permission to use the land for a native location. Applicant intimated that the matter must remain in abeyance pending the decision of the Privy Council on the appeal; and in the meantime he allowed the land to be used at a native location. The Department, however, had exceeded the leave and licence given by him, and had used the land for purposes of brickmaking.

The answering affidavit of Allan G. Dobson, acting engineer, stated that the land in question was expropriated by the Railway Department for railway purposes on the 5th November, 1902. The notice of expropriation was attached.

Sir H. Juta, K.C., for the applicant; Mr. H. Jones for the respondent.

In the course of argument, Sir Henry Juta said that if the Railway Department had taken up the position that they recognised their liability to pay compensation, the applicant would not have come to the Court.

Mr. Jones said that the question of compensation was left open in the notice of expropriation. Whether compensation had to be paid would be determined by the appeal to the Privy Council.

Sir Henry Juta argued that the making of bricks was not a railway purpose.

De Villiers, C.J.: It is to be regretted that the applicant did not, upon receiving the notice of expropriation from the Railway Department, at once raise his objection to the expropriation, and to the land being used for any purpose connected with the railway. It is impossible to say how far the expropriation has gone, but it is reasonably clear that the land has not yet been transferred to the Government. In the meanwhile it would appear that important questions will be raised in their appeal before the Privy Council which would have an important bearing on the present application. It is quite possible that the effect of the Privy Council judgment may be to render it illegal for the Railway Department to excavate on the land now in question. I consider, therefore that the respondent ought not to proceed with the excavating of any more clay. The bricks that have already been made may be burned and removed, but there should be no more excavation until the decision of the Privy Council has been given and the rights of the parties determined. For the present the Court will grant an interdict restraining the respondent from excavating clay for the purpose of making more bricks pending a further order of the Court. This interdict is not to prevent the burning or removal of bricks already made. As to the question of costs that will stand over until the decision of the Privy Council has been given.

In reply to Mr. Jones, His Lordship said that, if the decision of the Privy Council were in the Government's favour, it would be for the Government to apply to have the interdict removed.

[Applicant's Attorneys: Van Zyl and Buissinné; Respondent's Attorneys: Reid and Nephew.]

Ex parte GREENBERG. { 1903. June 9th.

Mr. Russell applied for leave to petitioner to pass certain transfer without the assistance of her husband, who is confined in a lunatic asylum in America.

Granted.

MAXWELL AND EARP V. VAN DER MERWE

Mr. Russell moved to attach certain moneys and to have the same declared executable in satisfaction of a judgment of the Court.

Granted.

STORK V. STORK.

On the motion of Mr. Russell, leave was granted John Dry Stork to sue his wife for divorce by edictal citation, personal service to be effected, and the return day being fixed for the 1st August. Leave was also granted to serve intendit with notice of trial.

MILLER V. KOTZE.

This was an application on notice calling on respondent to show cause why a decree of civil imprisonment granted against applicant should not be removed.

Mr. Close appeared for the applicant; Mr. C. W. de Villiers for the respondent.

The original action was brought by the respondent for damages for seduction and for maintenance of a child, of which applicant was alleged to be the father. Judgment for £50 damages and costs, and for the payment of £1 10s. a month as maintenance was given. Subsequently a decree of civil imprisonment was granted.

Mr. Close now put in an affidavit, in which applicant stated that when the decree was granted he was in the Criminal Sessions, under the misapprehension that that was the Supreme Court. He had then intended to appear before the Court and make an offer. He was only earning £4 a month, and offered to pay 5s. a month in liquidation of the debt.

In an affidavit for the respondent, Mr. Pearson, attorney, stated that after having been arrested, the applicant was, through the fault of the Sheriff, or his officers, or the gaoler, allowed to go free.

The Master had taken up the position that having once been arrested and liberated the debtor could not again be arrested on the same decree.

The Court suspended execution of the decree pending the payment of 10s. a month, the first payment to be made on the 15th of June, with leave to applicant to apply for an increase.

His Lordship said that this would revive the decree of civil imprisonment, and there would be no occasion for a fresh decree.

SECOND DIVISION.

[Before the Hon. Mr. Justice MAASDORP and the Hon. Mr. Justice KOTZE.]

DOMINGO V. TONKIN. { 1903. June 9th.

This was an action to recover £50 18s. 9d., being £20 of an unpaid balance of the contract price for the erection of certain buildings, and £30 18s. 9d. for extra work done.

Defendant claimed damages in reconvention for breach of contract.

Mr. Benjamin was for the plaintiff, and Mr. C. W. de Villiers for the defendant.

The case had been postponed from the previous day on a telegram from the Paarl that two material witnesses for the defence were ill and unable to travel.

Mr. De Villiers said that a messenger had been sent to the Paarl, and it appeared that the persons referred to in the telegram were the defendant and his wife, and although it would be impossible for the defendant's wife to be there that day, he would not say that it was impossible for the defendant to be there. He would leave the matter in their lordships' hands.

Judgment was entered for the plaintiff for £45 8s. 3d., with costs on the claim in convention, and absolution from the instance on the claim in reconvention, with costs, plaintiff declared to be a necessary witness.

BLACK V. KAISER.

This was action brought by W. Black, architect, of Cape Town, against Abram Kaiser, a land speculator, for the recovery of £350 for work done.

The declaration set forth that in February, 1901, the defendant employed plaintiff as an architect to prepare plans and specifications of certain buildings situated at the corner of Sir Lowry-road and Stuckeris-street. The defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff the customary and usual remuneration, which was 5 per cent. The plaintiff entered into the agreement, and he was further requested to alter and enlarge the premises. Thereafter one McNaughton, a builder, proceeded with the erection of the building, and it was specially agreed that the plaintiff was only to pay occasional visits to the building, and in consideration the defendant agreed to pay 3 per cent. on the total cost of the said building. The plaintiff had duly carried out his duties, and the defendant refused to furnish the commission.

The plea admitted the formal allegations. The defendant was dissatisfied with the estimate of £11,000, which he considered too high, and he decided to sell the premises. About April, 1901, the premises were sold to one James McNaughton, and the plans made by the plaintiff were handed to him by the plaintiff. In July, 1901, the plaintiff and McNaughton entered into an agreement whereby McNaughton agreed to pay 3 per cent. on the total cost of the building. The total cost of the building was £4,700, and the defendant tendered 3 per cent. on that amount. If the plaintiff was entitled to any more money he must recover from McNaughton.

The replication set forth that at an interview between plaintiff, McNaughton, and defendant, it was expressly agreed that the altered claim upon the defendant should not interfere with the claim referred to in the declaration. Plaintiff admitted the tender, but said it was wholly insufficient.

The rejoinder was general.

Mr. Upington (with him Mr. Alexander) for plaintiff; Mr. Buchanan (with him Mr. Bissett) for defendant.

William Black, the plaintiff in the case, said that he was a qualified architect, practising in Cape Town. Early in 1901 the defendant requested him to furnish plans and specifications for a two-storied building at the corner of Sir Lowry-road and Stuckeris-street. Witness was to get 5 per cent. on the total estimate. Subsequently, the defendant asked witness to prepare the enlarged plans and requested witness to increase the estimate. and he would pay him on the total amount. All the plans were signed by the defendant. The 5 per cent. included the usual 2½ per cent. for supervision. In July the defendant came to him with McNaughton, and Kaiser told him that he had disposed of the property to Mr. McNaughton, and, at the same time, that he had taken Mr. McNaughton into partnership. Witness told the defendant that he would look to him for payment, but, if McNaughton cared to pay, he would accept the money. The 3 per cent. was arrived at through the defendant saying that McNaughton was a builder, and that the plaintiff would only require to make occasional visits. The defendant did not carry out the plans as witness specified. At the interview nothing was said about the cost of the building. Subsequently witness wrote to McNaughton accepting the 3 per cent., but specifying that the agreement would, in no way, interfere with the defendant's agreement. A letter of demand was sent through witness's attorneys on the 19th November, 1902, and on 4th December defendant's attorneys replied that there was a written agreement between McNaughton and the defendant that the cost of the buildings would be £4,700, and tendering payment of 3 per cent. on that sum. Witness's attorneys replied that it was incredible that buildings which were estimated by an architect of Mr. Black's standing at £11,000 could be erected for £4,700, and asking for a duly accredited statement of the total cost of the building.

By Maasdorp, J.: Witness did not think the buildings could have been erected for double the amount stated by the defendant.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: Supervision was not charged for if the building was not proceeded with. He admitted that the defendant was a comparatively illiterate man, but he was one of the smartest men in the community, as he had accumulated a fortune. Defendant asked witness to give a higher estimate, and witness agreed to include his fees in the amount. Witness refused to enter into any partnership on the building. At the interview on the 26th July defendant said that he was taking McNaughton into partnership, but witness did not believe that any sale took place, and although the agreement was drawn up before Mr. Arderne, witness thought that possibly Mr. Arderne knew nothing about it. Witness knew nothing of transfers or anything else, and all the documents produced in court were news to him.

By Maasdorp, J.: He would estimate the building at £10,000. In his occasional visits he noticed that the work was not proceeding in the same substantial way as he had specified.

James McNaughton, builder and contractor, said that the defendant asked him what he would undertake certain alterations for, and witness replied that he estimated the outlay at £4,300. It was only the positions coloured red on one of the plans that he had anything to do with. He never saw the plan with the two-storied houses. His subsequent estimate of £4,783 was verbally accepted From his books the cost was £8,682, exclusive of profit, and he used the plaintiff's plans. In July he was brought to the plaintiff's office by the defendant, who told the plaintiff that as witness was interested in the building it would be unnecessary for the plaintiff to visit the building. The plaintiff, in reply to defendant, said that if witness paid the commission he would accept it, but that he would hold the defendant liable for the money. The property, which was transferred for £18,000, was bonded to the extent of £25,000.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: The witness did not repudiate the agreement. He did not think that he was liable for more than a half per cent. for supervision.

R. F. McNaughton, partner in the firm of McNaughton and Son, said that he kept the books of the building, showing the total cost at £8,682 1s. 8d. The defendant was constantly at the building, and gave several instructions with regard to alterations.

Cross-examined by Mr. Buchanan: He could not say where his father got the £3,000 from to complete the building.

For the defence, Mr. Buchanan read the defendant's evidence, which was taken on commission. The defendant denied that any terms were mentioned in January, 1901, and that the only understanding was that the usual customary architects' charges would be paid. When the plaintiff estimated at £11,800, defendant made up his mind to sell the property and not to rebuild. The property was sold to Mr. J. McNaughton, and the plaintiff was aware of the sale. In May, 1901, the plans and specifications made by the plaintiff were handed over to Mr. McNaughton, and the plaintiff was aware of that. At the interview the plaintiff said nothing about the plans, but he could not remember whether any arrangement was made in his presence. He never engaged the plaintiff to reconstruct the building. On his return from England, he was surprised to get a letter of claim from the plaintiff.

Cross-examined by Mr. Upington: The plaintiff had prepared further plans, but not at his request. He would adhere to the statement that he did not agree to pay 5 per cent. before the sale to McNaughton. He could not remember whether he had spoken to the plaintiff about three additional shops. He had nothing to do with the matter of 3 per cent. between McNaughton and the plaintiff in the latter's office.

Counsel having been heard in argument on the facts,

Maasdorp, J.: It appears from the evidence in this case that an agreement was made between the plaintiff and defendant by which the plaintiff agreed to furnish the defendant with plans and specifications for a building which he then contemplated, and also to supervise the erection of the building. The defendant on his part agreed to pay the plaintiff the usual remuneration, which both parties understood to be 2½ per cent. for the plans and specifications, and 2½ per cent. for the supervision of the work. This agreement is virtually admitted by the defendant in the evidence which he gave on commission. Thereafter, the plans and specifications were made and furnished to the defendant, and the building was commenced. The plaintiff undertook supervision of it, and continued to do work in respect of this building for some five or six weeks. Some time after the building was commenced, the defendant sold the property to Mr. McNaughton. Mr. McNaughton seems to have been the builder who was engaged in building the property before the sale took place, and then the parties modified the agreement they had entered into before it was contemplated that Mr. McNaughton would be himself interested in the building, and that no close supervision would be required. The parties then came to the understanding that the plaintiff should in future only pay occasional visits, and as his labour was in respect of the building very much reduced, he agreed, instead of taking 5 per cent. upon the total cost of the building, as was originally agreed upon, to take 3 per cent., which was estimated at 2½ per cent. for the plans and specifications, and ½ per cent. for his labour in supervision. At the time when this contract was entered into the question arose as to who should be liable to the plaintiff for this remuneration for his work. It was suggested by the defendant that as the property had been bought by Mr. McNaughton, the plaintiff should thereafter look to Mr. McNaughton for his remuneration. This the plaintiff refused to do, and stated at the time that though he was perfectly willing to take such remuneration from Mr. McNaughton he would hold the defendant to the contract, and would look to him for the payment of the 3 per cent. There is some conflict of evidence on this point. The defendant in his evidence denied that he was a party to this agreement. Upon this point we have some valuable evidence in a letter written at the time by the plaintiff to Mr. McNaughton, in which he sets forth the whole of the understanding arrived at between the parties. He there states that he was prepared to supervise the work for the future, and that he expected payment for his past work at the rate of 3 per cent., and that he would accept such payment from McNaughton, at the same time, reserving his right in the agreement he entered into with the defendant himself. It seems to me that the contract which then existed between the plaintiff, and the defendant was for the payment of 3 per cent. upon what should turn out to be the actual cost of the building. That, I take it, is proved by a letter written by the defendant himself, when the plaintiff made claim upon defendant, in his letter of the 19th November, 1902, in which he placed his demand at £354, which would be 3 per cent. upon what he estimated then, in his ignorance of the real facts, to be the actual cost—that is, the sum of about £11,000. In answer to that the defendant writes a letter, which virtually amounts to an admission that he was liable for 3 per cent. upon the actual cost of the building, but he adds, as such actual cost had been fixed at the sum of £4,700 he was then prepared and actually tendered the sum of 3 per cent. upon £4,700. If the point is once established that the 3 per cent. was to be paid on the actual cost of the building then it has been clearly proved that £4,700 was not the actual cost, and it has not been proved that the plaintiff was a party to any agreement in which the cost was limited. That amount seems to have been arrived at from a tender which was made from Mr. McNaughton for a portion of this building, that portion being about one-half of that which was subsequently built, and supervised by the plaintiff The actual cost of the building ultimately turned out to be £3,682, and I think we can come to the conclusion that the 3 per cent. was to be paid upon such actual cost. That would mean the amount of the sum of £260. The plaintiff will, therefore, be entitled to £260, and judgment will be entered for that amount, with costs.

SUPREME COURT

FIRST DIVISION.

[Before the Chief Justice (the Right Hon. Sir J. H. DE VILLIERS, P.C., K.C.M.G., LL.D.].

GENERAL MOTIONS.

Ex parte VORSTER. { 1903. June 10th.

Mr. Russell moved for an order authorising the Colonial Orphan Chamber to sign the necessary documents to release certain land mortgaged by the petitioner in the division of Middelburg from the operation of a mortgage bond in favour of one W. H. Maskew, and subsequently ceded to his widow, subject to the terms of an ante-nuptial contract. It appeared that the petitioner and two others passed a mortgage bond for £1,100 upon certain farms, and that petitioner had now reduced the bond by £500, and he had sold part of the land mortgaged, and was desirous of passing transfer and raising a loan on the remainder.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte HAUMAN.

Mr. Russell moved on behalf of the applicant, who lives at Frenchhoek, for an order confirming the sale to him of certain landed property in the estate of his late mother, Frances Magdalena Hauman (born Hugo). The petition set forth that applicant was executor testamentary of the estate of his mother, who died in 1901, and that by her last will and testament she instituted her seven children, all majors, as heirs. The heirs were convinced that it would be better for all concerned that the said property should be disposed of by public auction, and accordingly a sale was held, the total amount realised being £2,266. Petitioner bought certain of the lots, and before transfer could be passed to him, it was necessary to obtain consent of Court. The petitioner's co-heirs consented to the sale and purchase. The difficulty (counsel pointed out) was that one of the heirs, who appeared to have consented at the time of the sale, had since become insane, and she could not now, of course, sign the consent paper.

Order granted as prayed.

Ex parte WOOD.

Mr. C. W. de Villiers moved for an order authorising the Master to pass transfer in his name of a tenth undivided share in certain property held by the applicant as executor under a will. The property in question adjoined the town commonage of Graham's Town, and was acquired by the petitioner in his capacity as executor along with nine other persons for £1,025, with a view to its being handed over to the Town Council of Graham's Town. The Council were now prepared to take it over, and the owners were prepared to let the Council have the property without taking any profit for themselves, the Town Council paying the purchase price of £1,025, plus certain expenses. The transfer was proposed to be made solely with a view of benefiting the said town.

Order granted as prayed.

APPEALS.

REX V. BELINKEN.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Resident Magistrate of King William's Town.

The appellant, who was the proprietor of the "Metropole" in King William's Town, had been convicted under the 22nd section of the Licensing Act of 1883 of selling liquor to a native in a prohibited area, and he had been fined £10, or in default, two months' hard labour. The charge was "in that on or about the 9th day of April, 1903, at or near King William's Town, in that district, he did wrongfully and unlawfully supply to an aboriginal native, Mary James, one-half bottle of brandy for other than medicinal purposes, in the prohibited area of King William's Town."

Mr. Benjamin (for the appellant) said that the appeal was brought on the ground that the conviction was against the weight of evidence. The witnesses for the prosecution were the woman herself, to whom the liquor was alleged to have been sold, and two police constables, Walkers and Cooper. The evidence as to the sale to the woman was only that of the woman herself. Walkers and Cooper were not there at the time. They said they saw the woman come out of the Metropole, and she had a bottle of brandy with her, but there was no proof that the brandy was ever sold to her.

[De Villiers, C.J.: The evidence is distinct that she bought it, and the magistrate believes her. Then she is found with the liquor in her possession.]

Mr. Benjamin admitted that that was so, but said that there was the evidence of the accused himself, a man named Levy, and also the barman, that they did not sell liquor to the woman, and that they never sold to anyone else than registered voters. The appellant relied on the fact that this conviction was against the weight of evidence, and also on the technical ground that the sale was to the son and not to the woman.

Without calling upon Mr. Jones,

De Villiers, C. J.: There is no ground whatever for disturbing the verdict of the Magistrate. Upon the question of the credibility of witnesses, the Magistrate is the best judge, and he was satisfied that the witnesses for the prosecution spoke the truth, and he was not satisfied that the witnesses for the defence spoke the truth. If the evidence is correct, then there is no doubt as to the appellant's guilt. The woman who bought the liquor was a Kafir, apparently having all the appearances of a Kafir, and the accused sold liquor to her, knowing that she was a Kafir. It is said, however, that she bought the liquor on behalf of her son, but she never informed the accused that she bought the liquor on behalf of her son. So far as the accused is concerned, he sold it to the Kafir woman. In regard to the statement in the defence that the son was entitled to buy the liquor, accused, at all events, knew at the time whether or not the woman said that she bought for her son, and if the accused had wished to raise the defence, she might then and there have raised it, if it were a defence at all, that the son was a registered voter and entitled to buy the liquor. That question was not raised, no evidence was given on the point, and the Court is therefore bound to uphold the judgment. The appeal must be dismissed.

REX V. BAILEY.

Scab Act—Hand dressing of sheep—Dipping—Res judicata—Autrefois acquit.

The owner of scab-infected sheep does not in terms of the 21st section of Act 20 of 1894 "make proper and diligent efforts to cleanse them," if he dresses them by hand without curing them.

The accused was charged in a Resident Magistrate's Court with failing on a certain date to make proper and diligent efforts to cleanse his sheep, and was acquitted. A week afterwards he was charged in the same Court with committing the same offence between certain dates, including the date mentioned in the first summons, but the offence, if any, was proved to have been committed at that date.
